PREFACE.

The following work was not undertaken as either a literary or commercial speculation; the sole motive of its originators (whose labours from first to last were wholly gratuitous) was a desire to promote the cause of religious truth, by bringing before their fellow-countrymen, in a readable form, such a knowledge of controversial theology and ecclesiastical history, as is necessary to enable a man of ordinary intelligence and education to form an independent judgment between the rival claims of the Churches of England and Rome.

The originators were not satisfied with the prevailing tone and spirit of religious controversy in Ireland, and aimed at improving it; and, while doing so, desired to facilitate the researches of the student or religious inquirer, by rendering more easy of access the learned writers usually referred to in such controversies, and by furnishing those who have not a ready access to extensive libraries with extracts and authorities, on the accuracy and honesty of which they might safely rely.

The conviction that some such work was needed was based upon the known facts, that good theological libraries are not everywhere accessible to general readers, and that the parochial clergy, even when themselves possessing the necessary collection of books, are generally so much occupied by their laborious pastoral duties, that they have not the leisure needful to enable them to give their personal assistance in guiding religious inquirers to the sources from which an accurate knowledge on such subjects can alone be derived.

It was thought also that it would be more easy to render such subjects generally interesting by treating of them in a monthly periodical, than by publishing at once the same amount of matter, in a more elaborate and systematic form, in a volume which would, from its very bulk, have been more likely to deter than attract the general reader.

It also occurred to the originators of the work that the novelty of the experiment of opening the pages of such a periodical freely to the best writers on both sides of the questions in dispute, without any restriction, except that the combatants should preserve a kindly tone and Christian temper, would tend not only to secure a fair and accurate discussion of the great questions at issue, but to excite attention and public interest, without rousing bad passions or sacrificing Christian charity.

In these expectations they were not disappointed. The work attained such extensive popularity that, (had the object partaken in any degree of the nature of a pecuniary speculation,) it might have been profitably continued at the very time of its voluntary termination; inasmuch as for the year preceding it had attained the almost unparalleled circulation of 16,000 copies monthly. As the writers, however, had accomplished, to the best of their powers, the task they had imposed upon themselves, the success and popularity of the periodical afforded no inducement to them to continue it; and they deemed it more consistent with the character of the work to close its pages while its popularity and success were at the highest, than to wait until either failing health on the part of the Editor, or satiety on the part of the public, might compel its termination with a more questionable success.

The spirited manner in which able Roman Catholic Controversialists from time to time responded to the challenge thrown out to them, as well as the general tone and spirit in which their communications were conducted, have been the subject of very general approbation. And if the impartial reader should arrive at the conclusion that the writers on the Roman Catholic side have had the worst of the argument, such a result must be attributed to the nature of the task they undertook, and not to the want of either learning or ability to deal with it satisfactorily. Though the challenge given to the Roman Catholic priesthood was never formally accepted, no one who has perused the able contributions of the Roman Catholic laymen who have from month to month written in our pages, can doubt that they had the best assistance their clerical friends and spiritual guides could give them, without running the risk of compromising the church of which they were the champions.

For obvious reasons, writers on neither side were required publicly to give their real names, though some of them voluntarily did so; and the Editor has since the close of the publication been somewhat surprised to find that he has been anticipated in the intended announcement of the part he took in the work, by seeing his name included in a list of Protestant writers, in an elaborate treatise on the Church recently published by the Rev. P. Murray, Theological Professor at Maynooth, as if he had already publicly acknowledged his connection with the work.

It was always the intention of the Editor, as soon as his task should be completed, by the conversion of what was hitherto a mere monthly periodical into a permanent work of reference (as he hopes the Catholic Layman will henceforward become), not only to disclose the part he personally took in the publication, but to acknowledge publicly the valuable and extensive assistance which he received during the long period of seven years from the able and valued friends whose names he has now permission to give to the world. To assign to each of those distinguished men the exact part he took in writings so diversified and numerous would be tedious and inconvenient; but the Editor is proud in being able to enumerate amongst his most valued friends and most constant contributors the names of the Rev. Samuel Butcher, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Dublin; the Venerable Edward Adderley Stopford, Archdeacon of Meath; the Rev. George Salmon, D.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin; the Rev. Joseph Carson, D.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin; and also to acknowledge the more occasional, but equally valuable, assistance of his Grace the Most Rev. Richard Whately, Archbishop of Dublin; the Rev. J. H. Todd, D.D., S.F.T.C.D.; Rev. Edward Moeran, D.D., late Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Dublin; Rev. John Gwynn, F.T.C.D., and Warden of St. Columba's College; Rev. Robert King, author of the Ecclesiastical History of Ireland; Rev. Wm. M'Ilwaine, of Belfast; Rev. R. H. Loane, Bandon; Wm. Dwyer Ferguson, Esq., LL.D., and several others.

To his Grace the Lord Primate of Ireland (Lord John George Beresford, Archbishop of Armagh) the Editor owes a deep debt of gratitude, not only for his undeviating kindness and vigilant superintendence during the whole period of the publication, but for having munificently relieved him, from an early period, from the pressure of the heavy pecuniary responsibility which such an undertaking involved, and supplied him with the means of gratuitously disseminating the work extensively among educated Roman Catholics, from nearly the commencement of the undertaking to its very close.

The Analytical Digest of the whole work, now for the first time published (and for which the Editor is largely indebted to the valued friendship of Dr. Wm. Dwyer Ferguson), will, it is hoped, considerably facilitate the labours of the theological student and religious inquirer, and save much time and labour to the controversialist, by referring them at once to the principal arguments and authorities brought forward in the course of the work, in a more systematic order than the nature of the original publication permitted; whilst the General Index, now also added for the first time, will enable the reader to find without difficulty whatever the Catholic Layman contains bearing on the subject of his inquiries. Carefully-formed Chronological Tables of the Popes, Councils, Fathers, and other eminent writers, have also been added, as an aid to the student in forming a clear idea of their exact position and relative importance in the history of the Church.

The more learned reader will find that the greatest care has been taken throughout the work to ensure minute accuracy in the references; and that few passages have been relied on or cited from any of the Fathers or eminent ecclesiastical writers, without giving the very words of the writer in the original language, together with the volume, page, and (what is often of almost equal importance) the exact edition of the work referred to.

The Douay version of the Bible has been almost invariably quoted, not because the Editor believed it to be the most correct or faithworthy, but to diminish the points of controversy, as much as was felt to be compatible with the advocacy of truth.

In the same way, the writings of the earlier Fathers have been relied on, not because any of them were believed to be in all things safe or infallible guides, but because they were obviously the most faithworthy witnesses of what was or was not the universal or general belief of the Church at the time in which they wrote. To leave out the early Fathers in a controversy with members of the Church of Rome, or to expect them to trust the authorized Protestant version of the Bible as a safe guide, would obviously be to suppose that the parties addressed were already substantially Protestants. It is plain, that it is only by discussing matters in controversy with Roman Catholics upon their own grounds that it is possible to expect to convince them, that their peculiar dogmas are not supported by either the Holy Scriptures or tradition, but comparatively novel additions to the doctrines of the Apostolic age.

That such is the truth the Editor has not the faintest doubt; and should any writer of credit impeach the accuracy of the statements and soundness of the reasoning in any part of the work now given to the world, during the lifetime of the Editor, he trusts he and his colleagues will be able to substantiate what they have written in every particular of practical importance.

That it may please the Great Author of Truth to bless these pages to the good of souls, and the promotion of Christian love, is the earnest prayer of

THE EDITOR.

Mr. William Cunar has respectfully to return his grateful thanks to the Nobility, Bishops, Clergy, Gentry, and his respected Correspondents in general, for the long-continued favours and confidence which he has enjoyed; and he trusts to continue to secure that patronage which it has been his privilege to possess for nearly thirty years.

. Publishers are respectfully informed, that all Books intended for Review should be addressed to the care of W. Curry and Co., Sackville-street; by whom they will be faithfully forwarded, and placed in judicious hands.

TO OUR READERS.

When a new publication issues its first number to the world, and solicits the favourable consideration of those into whose hands it may chance to fall, its readers have a right to expect some information as to its character and objects, as well as the means by which it proposes to carry those objects into effect. This expectation is most fair and reasonable; and as it is our anxious desire to conciliate the good wishes of all impartial and intelligent men, we proceed to state a few of the motives which have led to this publication, and to the choice of the title under which we appear.

And, in the first place, it is necessary to warn our readers that we propose to ourselves a more important task than merely to amuse the listless portion of the public, or to while away an idle hour. In the present condition of our native land—depressed, impoverished, distracted by a variety of evils—it would argue a cold and heartless indifference to its true and permanent welfare, if, possessing, as we believe we do, the means and the capability of being useful, we were to devote our own time, and that of our readers, to the gratification of idle curiosity. A story is told of a certain philosopher, in ancient times, who, despising the opinions of his neighbours, adopted the whimsical idea of living in a tub. On one occasion, when the city in which he resided was besieged by a foreign enemy, this eccentric individual commenced, one morning, to roll his tub up and down the market-place; and, on being asked his motive for this singular conduct, he replied, that he did not wish to be idle when every one around him was busy in resisting the enemy, but that he could find nothing better to do.

Now, we do not wish to imitate the example of this useless member of society, or to roll our tub after his fashion. We believe that we can be more beneficially employed, in endeavouring to arouse our countrymen from the state of lethargy and ignorance in which too many of them are plunged, and to apply the talents and abilities with which God has endowed them in the noblest of all pursuits—the search for truth. It is useless to attempt to disguise the fact, that Ireland has long been neglected by those whose duty and whose interest it was to have improved the minds and developed the intellects of her quick-witted and intelligent sons. Every foreign and English traveller who visits our shores is struck by the sharpness of mind and ready apprehension which prevail, even among the humblest peasantry. They cannot conceal their astonishment that a people so highly gifted by Providence, and endowed with such mental resources, should yet be sunk so low in the scale of civilization, and exhibit such lamentable proofs of ignorance and error.

It is foreign to our purpose to dwell long on this melancholy state of things, or on the causes which have contributed to make our island a proverb and a by-word among the nations of Europe. It is plain that if the natural instructors of the people—those in whom their faith and confidence were reposed—had exerted themselves as they should have done, even during the past half century, we should now witness the fruits of such exertions in the increasing spread of knowledge and industry, of peace and harmony and good-will. But they allowed each generation to grow up in the same unenlightened prejudices in which their forefathers lived. While the world around them was advancing in light and knowledge, Ireland was doomed to behold her children arrayed in bitter hostility against each other—wasting, in angry and acrimonious strife, those faculties and energies which, if rightly directed, would have commanded respect abroad, and diffused comfort and happiness at home.

In what way, then, is this evil to be remedied? If mutual distrust and ill-will prevail so extensively among us—if contentious wrangling, especially upon religious differences, has so long been the curse and bane of Ireland, how shall we commence our efforts for the cure of these fatal disorders? Now, on this point, the advice, which we see frequently put forward, both in Parliament and in the newspapers, is as follows: "Religion is an affair between each man's conscience and God: why, then, need you give yourself any trouble about your neighbour's creed? Is it not better to let each individual choose his own religion for himself, without any intrusion from others? If all parties in Ireland were content to act in this manner, and put religious differences out of sight altogether, the country would be at peace, and we should hear no more of these controversial disputes, which distract men's minds, and prevent them from attending to the more pressing and urgent business of their farms, shops, or other callings."

Now, however well-meant this advice may be, we believe that it is utterly false and delusive. We are convinced that it is impossible to adopt it, if we would; and that we ought not to adopt it, even if we could. Let us put out of sight for a moment what is going on in the Continent and America, and confine our view to the state of England and Ireland; and then ask any man of common sense, whether, in the present state of men's minds, religion can be thus quietly thrust into the back ground, as if it were of no importance whatever? It is a notorious fact that a convulsive movement of religious opinion is in progress, such as these countries have not witnessed for three hundred years. It does not exist merely in one locality, nor is it confined to a particular class of men: on the contrary, it has spread, like an electric current, to the remotest corners of the empire, and has pervaded all ranks of society. The premier duke of England in his ancestral castle, the learned professor in the time-honoured University of Oxford, the peasant in the lonely wilds of Connemara and Kerry, have alike felt its influence, and bent beneath its power. There is scarcely a newspaper published which does not contain some new fact or other bearing upon this all-important question. We are daily informed that some fresh individuals, few or many, as the case may be, have relinquished their old religious belief—that a Roman Catholic has become a Protestant, or a Protestant has become a Roman Catholic. It is manifestly impossible, therefore, to compel men to be neutral on the question of religion. We might as well attempt to stop the tide when it is sweeping across the broad Atlantic, and dashing against our shores, as to check the agitation of religious opinion which is going on around us. The circumstances of the time are entirely beyond our control—we must adapt our conduct to the position in which we find ourselves placed. Whether we will or no, men's minds are now occupied upon the question of religion, with an earnestness and intensity which is altogether unparalleled. We may, if we will, exert ourselves to guide their judgment aright, and supply them with help, to arrive at the knowledge of the truth; but it is worse than useless to endeavour to divert them from the task.

But, in the next place, we feel that it would be wrong for us to dissuade men from earnest religious inquiry, even were it in our power. It would only be a narrow and selfish mind which could deliberately profess entire indifference whether others thought rightly or wrongly on the subject of religion. If a man were in a ship in a storm, and were to say to himself—Provided I can get safe to shore, I care not whether all my fellow-passengers are swallowed up in the ocean—would not such a man be shunned, as a cold, heartless wretch? And is eternal happiness of less value than preservation from temporal danger? Can any one who has experienced in his own mind the consoling influence of well-grounded trust and confidence in God remain indifferent while he sees those around him still exposed to all the evils of doubt and uncertainty —tossed back and forwards between conflicting opinions—unable to believe one religion—unwilling to adopt another? Will he not rather be anxious, in a kindly and Christian spirit, to remove these doubts, so far as he can, and direct the inquirer to the true source of light and knowledge—to those Holy Scriptures which are given by inspiration of God, and which are able to make men wise unto salvation?

It is in this spirit, and with these feelings, that we commence the following pages, which we intend shall be mainly (though not exclusively) devoted to the consideration of some of the prominent religious questions on which the opinions of our countrymen are now so much divided. It is our hope, with God's blessing, to bring together facts and arguments taken from the best and most trustworthy authorities; and to comment on them in a spirit of fairness and candour. We shall gladly open our columns to communications from all quarters, which we may conceive it useful or desirable that the public should be made acquainted with, provided they be written in a Christian spirit, and free from everything savouring of bitterness or angry feeling; for it is our firm determination that our paper shall contain nothing at which even the prejudices of those who do not agree with us can justly take offence. We see no reason why religious discussions cannot be carried on in a kindly spirit of mutual regard. We are persuaded that there are many good and estimable men, arrayed at opposite sides, in the great struggle which is going on around us. Frail men will always be prone to think differently; but that is no argument why each party should not exert the reason which God has given him in the search for truth. On the contrary, it is rather an additional motive for each person to endeavour to satisfy his own mind that the views which he himself holds, or professes to hold, are the true ones. When opinions are diametrically opposite, it is clear that only one party can be right; and it is then of vital consequence that a man should not only be persuaded himself of the truth, but be able to give a reason for his belief. But there are other points of minor importance, on which men may lawfully differ. And there is one beneficial result which is sure to follow from calm and sober discussion, that each party will at least know what opinions his opponent really entertains, and will not attribute to him errors which possibly never crossed his mind. There are several doctrines of the utmost importance in religion, which all sincere Roman Catholics and Protestants hold in common. These may with truth be called Catholic* (i.e., universal) opinions, being such as every believer in Divine revelation has held, since the time of our Lord and His apostles, and whereby Christians are now distinguished from Turks or Hindoos. Thus, even where men do not agree in convincing their opponents, each party will be more likely to appreciate the other's motives, and perceive the strength of the arguments on which he relies; and instead of setting him down as a blind, unreasoning bigot, he will concede to him the same liberty and freedom of judgment which he claims for himself.

But it may be said—Why not leave religious discussions to the clergy, whose duty and profession it is to examine into these matters? Questions of law are decided by the lawyers and judges; doctors and medical men are alone competent to decide upon the nature of diseases; why, then, should laymen trouble their heads with controversial theology? Admitting that there may be some truth in these analogies, we beg leave to differ from the conclusion which they are brought forward to support. If a man believed himself to be heir to a property, common curiosity, to say the least, would induce him to take some pains to examine into the validity of his title; and, so far as his circumstances permitted, he would naturally like to know all the facts, and at least the principal authorities which might be brought forward in support of his claim. If one lawyer said he was the rightful heir, and another lawyer was of an opposite opinion, he would seek to know what their reasons were, and why it was that they differed; and he would, therefore, lose no opportunity of acquiring the requisite information. Again, if a man was sick, and heard two doctors disputing by his bedside, as to the nature of his disease and the best mode of treatment to be used, a due regard to his own health, and anxiety for a speedy recovery, would prompt him to ask them some reasons for their different opinions; and he would not be satisfied with bare, naked assertions on either side. There are, doubtless, a great many subjects on which we must trust to the opinion of others; but every sensible and prudent man will like to know, for his own sake, whom he is to trust, and why. And his inquiries will be more anxiously made, in proportion to the importance of the matter about which he is engaged. If a merchant embarks all his property in any speculation; or, if a farmer devotes all the savings of his life to the purchase of a farm in the Incumbered Estates Court, both parties will make very sharp inquiries before their minds are finally made up: they will endeavour to satisfy their own minds, that they are acting like wise and sensible men; and they will not take a leap in the dark, because Mr. A. or Mr. B. orders them to do so. And, surely, where the important interests of the soul are concerned—when eternal happiness is at stake, men ought, at least, to show the same anxiety which they do about their temporal concerns. If, indeed, all the clergy, and all the doctors, and all the lawyers, were of one way of thinking, and agreed about everything relating to their respective callings, the whole question would be settled at once, and it would be useless for plain, unlettered persons to attempt to differ from them. But further, there is an additional reason which should induce Catholic laymen to satisfy their own minds upon religious points, that many of the clergy who claim the right of controlling their opinions have shown a manifest reluctance to give any help or assistance to their flocks; and we believe that this reluctance arises from a very obvious cause—viz., that, whether from lack of learning, or ability, they are unable to solve the doubts and difficulties of those who have recourse to their advice. We cannot help doubting the fact, that all Irish priests are themselves thoroughly educated in the higher departments of either religious knowledge or theological learning; and we suspect that their lack of argument is not unfrequently the cause of some of them so freely resorting to the curse and the blow. The anathema is, after all, a very sorry argument, and a mode rather of silencing than convincing those who entertain doubts to be removed or difficulties to be solved. In a free country, where the cry of "religious liberty" has become as familiar as a household word, it is in vain to shut one's eyes to the impossibility of confining educated and intelligent men within the narrow limits of priestly authority. Such vassalage may have suited an age when the masses of the laity could not read, and were necessarily at the command of those whose superior learning placed them on vantage ground. Far be it from us to diminish the legitimate influence of such superior qualities. We shall ever be anxious to do honour to any body of men whose lives and arguments do honour to their profession, even when we may, on what we think sound reasoning, differ from them in belief, or fail to be convinced by their reasons or authorities; but against the tyranny, the selfishness, the covetousness of ignorant men, we shall fearlessly protest and struggle, even though they affect to be armed with power from the Vatican, and are actually armed with the power of the rabble. We must, and will, strive to assert the freedom of the Irish laity from a galling yoke, which neither we nor our forefathers have been able to bear. We will not bow our heads under that yoke, nor fail to encourage others to assert their mutual independence of the mere priesthood or its assumptions. Difficult may be our path, but we shall not struggle alone, nor fail in securing the sympathy of all who have smarted and suffered under priestly thraldom. The right of educated men to study the Holy Scriptures, the fathers of the church, the decrees of the councils or ecclesiastical history, can no more be denied than their right to acquire secular learning. If the laity may read them, the laity must strive to understand them. We venture to think—and hope to be able to show practical and substantial proofs—that they can succeed in understanding them. If we go wrong, let those more learned correct us, whether clergy or laymen We shall ever be open to correction or just reproof, but shall expect the same candour and fair play which we intend and undertake to accord to others. We hope, too, to conduct our pages like gentlemen as well as Catholic laymen. Whatever reaches us, written with such objects and in such temper, we shall gladly aid in circulating, from whatever quarter it may come; but mere polemic strife, or vulgar declamation, or personal scurrility, will find no favour, and, we hope, no example, in our pages.

(*) Anciently, in the fourth century, all believers in the doctrine of the Trinity were entitled to the name of Catholic. (Vide Cod. Just. lib. I. tit. I.)—"Hanc legem (i.e., qui secundum Apostolicam disciplinam Evangelicamque doctrinam, Patris et Filii et Spiritûs Sancti unam deitatem sub pari majestate et sub piâ Trinitate credunt) sequentes, Christianorum Catholicorum nomen jubemus amplecti." "We order that all who follow this rule (that is, who believe in the Deity of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, in their co-equal majesty and triune Godhead, according to apostolic teaching and Gospel doctrine), shall adopt the name of Catholic Christians." And the language of the Athanasian creed (which is one of the authorised formularies of the Church of Rome) is equally clear and explicit—"This is the Catholic faith, that we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity." If the voice of antiquity, therefore, is to be heard, Roman Catholics cannot reasonably deny the title of Catholic to all who are sincere believers in the doctrine of the Trinity.

WHAT IS TRUTH?

"WHAT is truth?" said jesting Pilate, and would not stay for a reply. The great Lord Bacon wrote an essay upon this text, which goes far to prove that the love of truth is as rare a distinction as it is a happy and a glorious one.

Had it been otherwise, and Adam had not sinned, possibly mankind had not needed that a Divine Redeemer should have come into the world to bear witness unto the truth.

"To this end," said Christ to Pilate, "was I born; and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice."—John xviii. 37.

'Pilate said unto him, What is truth? and when he had said this he went out again unto the Jews, and saith unto them, I find in him no fault at all."

Had Pilate waited for a reply, what answer would he have received? Possibly the same as that given to the woman of Samaria, who, pleading for the worship of her fathers, said to him, "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, and ye say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship." "Woman, believe me the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. The hour cometh when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him. GOD IS A SPIRIT; AND THEY THAT WORSHIP HIM MUST WORSHIP HIM IN SPIRIT AND IN TRUTH."

All religions profess to afford GOD the worship of the heart. Any other would be an insolent mockery. All religions also profess to be led by the Spirit of God.

"Because I have spoken those things," says the Saviour (John xvi. 6.), "sorrow hath filled your hearts; but I will tell you the truth, it is expedient to you that I go, for if I go not the Paraclete (the Comforter) will not come to you; but if I go I will send him to you. I have yet many things to say to you, but you cannot bear them now; but when He the Spirit of Truth is come, He will teach you all truth."—John xvi. 13 (Douay Bible).

How, then, is this teaching to be secured, and what does it teach? On this do men greatly differ, and probably ever will, until the commands of St. Paul to Timothy are more generally obeyed. "I charge thee, before God and Jesus Christ, who shall judge the living and the dead, by His coming and His kingdom, Preach the word: be instant in season, out of season; reprove, exhort, rebuke in all patience and doctrine. For there shall be a time when they will not endure sound doctrine: but according to their own desires, they will heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and will, indeed, turn away their hearing from the truth, and will be turned unto fables."—2 Tim. iv. 1.

As laymen, however, we must not sermonize; and, therefore, return to Lord Bacon, whose admiration for truth, and success in discovering it, have stamped his name with immortality. "The poet saith excellently well, it is a pleasure to stand upon the shore, and to see ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle, and to see a battle and the adventures thereof below; but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage-ground of truth (a hill not to be commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene), and to see the errors and wanderings, and mists and tempests in the vale below, so that this prospect be seen with pity, not with pride. Certainly it is heaven upon earth to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in Providence, and turn upon the poles of truth; and however things may be, in some men's depraved judgments and assertions, yet truth, which only doth judge itself, teacheth that the INQUIRY OF TRUTH, which is the love-making or wooing of it; THE KNOWLEDGE OF TRUTH, which is the presence of it; and the BELIEF OF TRUTH, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature. The first creation of God, in the works of his days, was the light of the sense, the last was the light of reason, and his Sabbath work ever since is the illumination of his Spirit. First he breathed light upon the face of matter or chaos, then he breathed light into the face of man, and still he breatheth and inspireth light into the face of his chosen."

"Awake thou that sleepest and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."—Ephes. v. 14. If we can be instrumental, in ever so humble a degree, in leading others to see the true light more clearly than they have yet done, we shall not have written in vain; and even should we therein fail, we shall still not be without our reward, if we be ourselves led by the Spirit of Truth into a more clear and full light. The love of truth, we incline to think, claims alliance as much with the heart as with the head; no vicious man was ever a lover of it. Our reasoning faculties were not given us for the exercise of whim or fancy, but to be the active instruments of guiding us to both truth and happiness. We hold it to be a pernicious practice to enter into disputations merely for the sake of argument. Such a course, if continued long, would make a man insensible to truth, and unhinge the whole fabric of his mind. This we shall attempt to avoid; and shall ever be more anxious to agree with others than to differ, where we can do so without sacrificing truth. If we can thereby assist any of our fellow-countrymen to make progress in real knowledge, and clear away some, at least, of the clouds of prejudice which hang over the opinions of men who have not taken the pains to cultivate their reason, and steadily employ it in the pursuit of truth, we shall not have lived or rolled our tub altogether in vain.

A GLASS EYE.—An Emir had bought a left eye of a glass-maker, supposing that he would be able to see with it. The man begged him to give it a little time: he could not expect that it would see, all at once, as well as the right eye, which had been for so many years in the habit of it.—Coleridge.

ERIN MAVOURNEEN.

Remember thee! yes, while there's life in this heart,
It shall never forget thee, all lorn as thou art;
More dear in thy sorrow, thy gloom, and thy showers,
Than the rest of the world in their sunniest hours.

Were thou all that I wish thee—great, glorious, and free,
First flower of the earth and first gem of the sea—
I might hail thee with prouder, with happier brow;
But, oh! could I love thee more deeply than now?

No! thy chains as they rankle thy blood as it runs,
But make thee more painfully dear to thy sons—
Whose hearts, like the young of the desert-bird's nest,
Drink love in each life-drop that flows from thy breast.

THOMAS MOORE.

THE ISLE OF SAINTS.

THERE is a melancholy pleasure in looking back upon the past greatness of times long gone; and surely there is no feature in the ancient history of our beloved but unhappy country, on which a true Irishman can dwell with such interest and pride, as the singular reputation for learning, and advancement in Christian knowledge, which, in the first ages after the introduction of Christianity, won for it the name of Insula Sanctorum—the Isle of Saints. According to the concurrent and unanimous testimony of ancient writers, the Irish people were then so eminent for the study of philosophy and letters, and more especially of the Sacred Scriptures; the country was so thickly studded with schools, colleges, and religious establishments, that students from all parts flocked to it in great numbers, to prosecute both general and theological knowledge. The causes of the preference then given to an Irish education were not only the strict discipline observed in the schools of Ireland, and the knowledge of Holy Scriptures possessed by our old divines, but the character they maintained for ability in instructing others in it. We shall have other opportunities of adducing proofs of what we have here stated; but, at present, we would confine ourselves to introducing to the notice of our readers one peculiarly eminent saint, of ancient times, in Ireland—St. Columbanus—whose character is one of deep and singular interest and importance in reviewing the ancient Church history of Ireland. Mr. Carew, the Maynooth Church Historian, represents St. Columbanus (as, in truth, he was) a model for Catholics. He was born in 539, or 559, of a respectable family, in Leinster (nearly 1000 years before Luther), and from his early childhood was remarkable for applying to his studies with such diligence that he soon became a proficient in grammar, rhetoric, geometry, and the range of the Divine Scriptures. He also soon began to evince the strong influence of the latter in his heart; and finding that he was beset, when at home, by companions not calculated to promote his religious improvement, he left Leinster, and placed himself under the care of a venerable person, named Senile, Abbot of Cluaninis, in Lough Erne, who had a high reputation among his countrymen at that time for his singular piety and accomplishment in the study of the Sacred Scriptures. Columbanus made such good progress under the instruction of this holy man that, while yet a very young man, he wrote an exposition of the Book of Psalms, in elegant language, and composed many other pieces, profitable for communicating instruction. He subsequently became a missionary in France, and other parts of Europe, and exercised great influence over the Continental Church, by the great energy of his character, his intimacy with different kings, and the number, activity, and devotedness of his followers, and the eminence to which they attained.

We shall have occasion again to refer to this eminent individual, whom every pious student of Irish ecclesiastical history must always regard with veneration and love, even where he may find it needful to appeal from his views on certain points, to an authority more ancient and higher than he. St. Columbanus, among other good and noble qualities, was peculiarly distinguished by his honest love for Ireland, and the pride and pleasure with which, whether among Franks or Lombards, at Luxem, or at Bobbio, he ever reverted to the soil which gave him birth. For the present we have, perhaps, said enough to interest our readers in his writings, and would begin by introducing to them the translation of one of his Instructions, for which we are indebted to the valuable work of Mr. King, on the Church History of Ireland, 3rd vol., page 975.

ST. COLUMBANUS'S INSTRUCTION ON THE SUBJECT "OF JESUS CHRIST THE LIVING FOUNTAIN, AND OF COMING TO HIM FOR DRINK."—Given as INSTRUCTION XIII., p. 74, in FLEMING.

The preacher, though diffident of his abilities, must in faithfulness labour to the best of his power in the enforcement of Christian truth.

"Impressed with a strong sense of the misery of human life, as brought before us in the observations of every-day experience, and with solemn reverence, at the same time, for the Divine Oracles, we have been led to exhibit, in the discourses which you have already heard, however inelaborate their style, the best efforts, feeble though they be, of our humble ability; and however this way of talking on our part may haply appear superfluous in the eyes of others, yet to ourselves it seems appropriate enough that the discourse should begin with allusions of a personal nature, such as these. For it is not so much the indolence of others, as our own, that we are endeavouring to arouse. And, moreover, although to the perfect in wisdom these advances towards wisdom [which we are engaged in] may prove not entirely satisfactory, still for beginners, and poor, lukewarm creatures like ourselves, they must be regarded as unavoidable, and well adapted enough to our case. For what cannot be concealed, what cannot be kept silent, without doing harm, it is inexpedient to hide and inexpedient to hush. For this reason, therefore, it seemed to us better to speak, even in a homely style, than to observe silence. For we have judged it to be undoubtedly safer to employ our conversation on such topics as these, than on others that are either idle or frivolous.

Christ the spring of living waters, how to be approached and applied by the believer.

"Lead, then, your ear once more, brethren, dearly beloved, to our observations, as [persons] convinced of the necessity of paying attention to the lessons which you hear [on such occasions as this]. And refresh your thirst, yet not so as to extinguish it, at the waters of this divine fountain, concerning which we are now desirous to speak. Drink, yet not so as to be satiated. For the living fountain, the fountain of life, now summons us to himself and says, S. John vii. 37. 'Whosoever is athirst let him come unto me and drink.' Observe what it is you are to drink. Let Isaiah inform you; let the Fountain himself inform you—Isa. lv. 1. Jer. ii. 13. 'And they have forsaken me, the Fountain of living water, saith the Lord.' It is the Lord, then, himself, Jesus Christ, our God, that is the fountain of life, and he, therefore, invites us to himself, the Fountain, that we may drink. He drinks who loves him; he drinks who takes his fill of the Word of God; who has a perfect love for him, a perfect longing after him; he drinks who is inspired with a burning love for wisdom. Let us, Gentiles, then drink with eagerness from that [fountain] which the Jews forsook [For to us also, as well as to other Gentiles, may apply that saying about 'these who open not their mouths,' and we, too, may be exhorted to open the mouth of our inner man, to eat with anxious haste and S John vi. 33. eagerness that bread which cometh down from heaven.]

The more of Christ his people have enjoyed, so much the more will they long after uninterrupted communion with him.

In order, then, that we may eat of this bread—that we may drink of this fountain, [both of which are one and] the same Jesus Christ our Lord, (who speaks of himself as though he were to be used by us for food, [under the title of] the living bread, which giveth life to this world; and in like manner pointing to himself as the fountain, he saith, 'Whosoever is athirst, let him come unto me and drink,' concerning which fountain also Psa. xxxvi. 9 the prophet saith, 'For with thee is the fountain of life.' See whence that fountain flows; for it is from the same source from which the bread also descends; because it is the same one who is the bread and the fountain, the only Son, our God, the Lord Christ, whom we ought unceasingly to hunger after; and although we are eating of him in loving him, although we devour him by our longing after him, yet let us continue our longing after him, as though hungry still. In like manner, that we may always drink of him, the Fountain, with exceeding pleasure, drink of him unceasingly in the full eagerness of our longing after him, and be delighted with his grateful sweetness (for the Lord is sweet and pleasant), though we do eat of him and drink, yet let us ever still hunger and thirst for him. For this our food and drink can never be entirely consumed nor exhausted; for although used, it is not spent; though drunk of, it doth not waste; because our bread is eternal, and our fountain is ever flowing, and ever sweet. Whence the pro*Isa.* lv. 1. phet saith, "Ho, ye that thirst, come to the Fountain." For this fountain is for such as thirst, not for See S Matt. v. 6. those who feel satiety; and therefore it is that he invites to himself the hungry and thirsty, upon whom, elsewhere, he pronounced a blessing—who are never satisfied with drinking, but the more they have swallowed, the more thirsty will they be.

The preciousness of Christ to them that receive him.

"What reason have we, brethren, to desire and seek after, and love unceasingly, that fountain of wisdom, the word of God on high, 'in whom are hidden,' as the apostle saith, 'all Col. ii. 3. the treasures of wisdom and knowledge,' [treasures] which he is inviting those that are thirsty to draw upon? Art thou thirsty? Drink [here] of the fountain of life. Art thou hungry? Eat [here] of the bread of life. Blessed are they that hunger for this bread, and thirst after this fountain. For, [though they be] always eating and drinking, yet retain they their desire to be eating and drinking still. For exceedingly delicious must be that food which is continually made use of for meat and drink, and yet is continually the object of hungering and thirst; ever fresh upon the taste, and ever still desired, whence the royal prophet Psa. xxxiv. 8 is led to use that exclamation—'O taste, and see how sweet, how gracious, the Lord is!'

He is wisdom, light, and life unto his people.

"Let us then, brethren, obey this call, in which we are invited to the fountain of life, by [him who is] the life, who is the fountain, not only of living water, but the fountain, also, of eternal life, the fountain of light, and the fountain of illumination; for from him are all these things, wisdom, life, light everlasting. He is the author of life, the fountain of life. He is the Creator of Light, he the fountain of illumination. And, therefore, thinking lightly of the things that are seen, and [soaring high toward heaven, let us seek to drink like fishes, yet, as fishes endued with the height of reason and sagacity], of [that] living water that springeth up unto life eternal.

The preacher anxiously implores grace from on high to love the fountain of life;

"Oh, that thy summons may bring me thither to that fountain, thou God of mercy, thou Lord of goodness; that there, in company with thy thirsty ones, I, too, may drink of the living stream of the living fountain of living water! that, so charmed with its exceeding sweetness, I may abide by it for ever, exclaiming, 'Oh, how sweet is the fountain of living water, whose water never ceases springing up unto everlasting life!' Thou, O Lord, art that true fountain, for ever and ever to be desired, though [at the same time] ever enjoyed, and ever drunk of. Give to us evermore, O Lord Christ, this water, that it may be in us, also, a well of water living and springing up unto life everlasting. Great, indeed, is the boon I seek for; who can doubt it? But thou, the King of Glory, art wont to give great favours, and hast promised to give them. Nothing can be greater than thyself; and thou hast given thyself to us; thou hast given thyself for us. Grant us, therefore, we beseech thee, that we may know he object of our love; forasmuch as it is nought else beside thyself that we are seeking to have bestowed upon us. For thou art our all, our life, our light, our salvation, our food, our drink, our God. Breathe into our hearts, I pray thee, O our [beloved] Jesus, that inspiration of thy spirit, and wound our souls with thy love that every heart among us may be able to exclaim Song of Sol. v. 8. with truth, Show me him that my soul loveth, for I am wounded with love.' and to drink of its waters, and still thirst for fresh supplies of them evermore.

"Grant, O Lord, that these wounds may be in me [For] happy is the soul that is so wounded with love. Such an one seeks the fountain; such an one drinks of it; yet while drinking, continues ever thirsty; and [at the same time] by its longing desires keeps quaffing on; it drinks unceasingly, by continuing its thirst. Thus, in its love, it is ever seeking after him; and its cure is found in submitting to fresh wounds. And, oh, that these health-giving wounds may penetrate to the inmost recesses of our souls, through the gracious operation of Jesus Christ, our God and Lord, the merciful and wise Physician, who is one with the Father and the Holy Ghost, for ever and ever. Amen."

[In our next number we hope to give a copy of the celebrated hymn of St. Patrick, the most ancient document extant in the Irish language.]

We shall ever be much more anxious to promote truth, and encourage virtue, than to command admiration, or amuse our readers by originality or fine writing. We shall, consequently, be ready and anxious to reproduce the best things we can command, whether already well known to the studious or not. The truths of astronomy and geometry are just as fresh now as they were in the days of Galileo or Newton; and, as we write for the good of others and not fame for ourselves, we can afford to smile at the fastidiousness of the pedant, or the sneer of the critic. He who would be deterred by such influences, may as well retire from the strife, and leave the field to sturdier spirits. If any of our readers, therefore, are disposed to believe in the omnipotence of literary novelty, let them look elsewhere than to us, to gratify their taste. Novel and effective materials for thought we hope to supply as abundantly as the native gold of California or Bathurst, but have neither time nor inclination to waste our energies on the form of the vehicle in which the precious ore is carried forth into the world. We shall make no further apology for repriating what may be already known to some, but new to a large number of our readers, and which, we hope, will give offence to none of them, as it treats of

IRISHMEN'S RIGHTS.

Every man has got his own RIGHTS, except the man that lets them be taken away from him; and it would not be hard to say what the like of such a man is, only that it is not civil to call names. Yet to have some rights, and not to know what they are, is as good as not having them at all; so I will tell you what some of an Irishman's rights are.

Every man has a right to breathe the free air of heaven, at least; and will any one deny that a man has a right to the springs of water from the earth? Who has ever been thirsty on a warm day, and felt the freshening of a good draught from the river as it flows along? Has not every man a right to that? Now, if you will attend to a story, you shall see what all this is driving at.

It was on a hot day in August—suppose we call it the 24th; that was a very hot day once upon a time—some Irish boys were working hard in a dry part of the land where there was no water. The Shannon flowed not far from them; and when they were all dried up with thirst, off they set to quench it at those waters. But they were stopped short of the banks of the river; for the only part they could come at was fenced off with a railing, made of strong posts, very high, with spikes at the top, and a deep ditch to hinder coming near. The poor fellows could see through it, to be sure; so that they could observe that the river was broad, and shone beautifully as it rolled along. There was a gate to this fence, and a priest stood inside to take care of it; but it was bolted and barred, so that nobody could get through to get at the waters of the river.

"Please your reverence," said one of the boys, "we want a drop of water: sure every Irishman has a right to a sup of the Shannon."

"Never think of such a thing," said his reverence; "you are much better without it; it is dirty water, and won't do you any good."

"Dirty or clean, please your reverence, it will save a man's tongue from burning; and the boys are all dying with drought."

"Och," cries another, "look just over the river; there are plenty of them drinking of the waters on the other side." And so sure enough there were.

"You are mistaken," said his reverence; "those are nothing but Sasenachs—such water is only fit for heretics."

"But is a poor Irish Roman to perish for thirst, then," says Pat, "and the river all flowing before him, enough to make his mouth water, if it was all dried up past watering?"

Hard as they all tried, his reverence would not open the way to the river.

"Is his reverence never thirsty himself," cried Mick, "that he has no compassion upon the throats of his flock?"

"And don't you know, Mick, that his reverence does not trouble the water when he is thirsty; seeing that he has got a regular supply of the real whiskey that has passed the exciseman, besides the occasional drops of potteen? and these last are none of the fewest."

Now, who shall deny that these poor fellows had a right to a drink of the Shannon, all large, and broad, and deep as it is, so that all the throats in Ireland would never make the sea think it was less of a river, when she kissed its broad mouth between Kerry and Clare? And yet these poor fellows were not the more like to get their right. But presently there was some one seen inside the railings, that would be trying to help the boys in their extremity of thirst. Nobody could tell how he got there; whether he scrambled over the fence, or swam from the other side, or, more likely, dropped down from heaven, sent by the holy and blessed Lord himself. He ran to the river, and dipping his hand in, he brought as much as he could in the hollow of it, and the best of good water is was: and he just handed it over to the first poor fellow that would take it; but the priest ran to stop him; and then he slipped round to the other end, with another handful of clear water; and so he slipped about whilst the priest was in a terrible passion—mad entirely. But some of the poor fellows got a sprinkling; and they that did found it so refreshing, that nothing would serve them but they must have some more; and so they went higher up, or lower down in the river, however far it might be; and never rested till they came to the place where they could stoop down and drink, and drink, and drink, so that they never thirsted again (John iv. 13, 14); while the poor fellows that stopped outside the priest's railings were left to die; for "never mind," said the priest, "I'll say a mass for their souls when they are in purgatory; and that will be better than a drop of water to save their lives now."

I was going to give an explanation of this story; but there is no occasion: for is there ever an Irishman that wants to be told what it means? and why should I waste time to tell him the meaning, when surely it's in his heart he feels what it means? And is it not the Lord Jesus Christ himself, blessed be his holy name, who has said "if any man thirst, let him come to me and drink?"—John vii. 37. Every man has a right to "take the water of life freely."

HOW IS UNITY TO BE EFFECTED?

If the members of the Church of England and Ireland are ever to be reconciled to the Church of Rome, or those of the Church of Rome to the Church of England, it is obviously to be effected by other means than exciting men's passions against one another. It is easy to foster and increase prejudice and bad feelings, either in Roman Catholics against Anglicans, or Anglicans against Romanists. Mutual hate, however, is as little likely to promote unity as penal laws on the one side, or curses and anathemas upon the other. It is high time that such weapons should be laid aside, as unworthy of those engaged in the pursuit of truth; much more of those anxious to follow the example of their great Redeemer, whose advent was announced as "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will towards men." Let Catholic laymen, of whatever church or form of worship they may be, at least agree henceforth to repudiate and set at nought such irrational and unchristian attempts to prevent the progress of truth, on whichever side it may ultimately prove to be; and let them teach hot-headed zealots and despotic priests, that to succeed in forwarding their respective views, they must yield to the enlightened spirit of the times, and follow the example of the lowly Jesus, whom they all affect to take as their model, and whose glory they desire to promote. As long as we ourselves act on these principles, we fear not what bishops or priests may do in the attempt to put us down by any other means than calm and candid reasoning. Any other attempt, we venture to foretell, will recoil upon themselves, and stimulate, rather than repress, the growing desire to know what others say and think of the momentous matters which are of common interest to all mankind; and to clear up the doubts and suspicions which will intrude on all intelligent and thoughtful minds, whether they confess them, or whether they do not. If the whole Synod of Thurles were to anathematize us, we would tell them they will fail in quenching the inextinguishable craving for light and knowledge on the questions upon which we treat. Irishmen may remain for ever attached to the Church of Rome, but, if they do, they will at least do so, not because they are afraid to examine, or have been dragooned into maintaining such union, but because, after examination, they have sincerely come to the conclusion and belief that there is more truth, more virtue, more learning, more piety in that church than in any other. From such a decision there would be no appeal. Such a decision would be worthy of a wise, a good, and a free nation. Such a triumph would be the greatest jewel in the tiara of the Pontiff. If he be truly the Vicar of Christ upon earth, and can be proved to be so, we may ourselves be reconciled to his supremacy, and die in his sense of the words Catholic laymen; but, until we are convinced that the Church of Rome is truly an infallible representative of Christ upon earth, we must be allowed to discuss its claims, as becomes freemen enjoying the blessings of a free press, in a free country; and to attempt to deter either us or others from using the rights of freemen will, we venture to predict, injure instead of advancing the cause of those who are mad or desperate enough to resort to such unjustifiable and worn-out means of propping up their cause. We crave the attention of those who may inconsiderately contemplate such a course to the succeeding article.

"THE CURSE CAUSELESS SHALL NOT COME."

Prov. xxvi. 2.

The era of burning men's bodies, to save their souls, has passed away for ever. Fire and faggot, we venture to believe, will never again call down the vengeance of heaven; even the voluntary Indian Suttee* seems fast passing away before the rising dawn of reason in the east. At any rate, the day is long passed when Catholics could burn Protestants, or Protestants Roman Catholics, in the equally weak and wicked attempt to compel all human minds to unity of belief and doctrine. If our forefathers, three centuries ago, had studied the Holy Scriptures as carefully and piously as did St. Patrick and St. Columbanus, they would have found there what would have lead them to know better. They could not have failed to find that the gracious words of the Saviour of the world savoured of a far different spirit. Blessing, not burning, was the test of his kingdom. When the Samaritan villagers would not receive him, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem, James and John said, "Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven and consume them, even as Elias did?" He turned and rebuked them, and said, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of, for the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them; and they went to another village."—Luke ix. 52-56. They would have found, and others still may find, in the same Holy Scriptures, if they would but follow the holy examples of the same Patrick and Columbanus in using them, that cursing is no more in accordance with the spirit of Jesus than burning with fire on earth, or calling down fire from heaven. Blessing, not cursing, is the Divine mode of gaining souls. "He opened his mouth and taught them, saying, Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they which are persecuted (not they who persecute) for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven, for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you."—Matt. v., 2-12. They might also find that man's power to curse effectually is a mere imagination. "The curse causeless shall not come," says Solomon, Prov. xxvi. 2.* "On that day they read in the book of Moses, in the audience of the people, and therein was found written that the Amorite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of God for ever, because they met not the children of Israel with bread and with water, but hired Balaam against them, that he would curse them; howbeit our God turned the curse into a blessing," "because the Lord thy God loved thee."—Nehemiah xiii. 1, and Deut. xxiii. 5. They might further find that there are times when God's judgments make desolate the earth, as well for the priests as the people. "Behold the Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste, and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof. And it shall be as with the people, so with the priest; as with the servant, so with his master; as with the buyer, so with the seller; as with the lender, so with the borrower; the land shall be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled, for the Lord hath spoken this word. The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof; therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein are desolate, and few men left."†—Isaiah xxiv. 1-6. And again—"The Lord could no longer bear, because of the evil of your doings, and because of the abominations which ye have committed; therefore is your land a desolation, and an astonishment, and a curse, without an inhabitant, as at this day."—Jer. xliv. 22. If they read further they might find, not that the priests were privileged to curse, but that even their blessings might become cursings, if they did not hear and obey his commands. "And now, O ye priests, this commandment is for you. If ye will not hear, and if ye will not lay it to heart, to give glory unto my name, saith the Lord of Hosts, I will even send a curse upon you, and I will curse your blessings; yea, I have cursed them already, because ye do not lay it to heart."—Mal. ii. 1. David, in the 109 Psalm, v. 28, gives, at any rate, advice which Catholic laymen will do well to follow, whatever course the priesthood may take. "Let them curse, but bless thou:" "When they arise, let them be ashamed. I will praise the Lord among the multitude, for he shall stand at the right hand of the poor, to save him from those that condemn his soul." We, for our parts, shall endeavour to follow the commands of Christ and his holy Apostles. "Bless them that curse you."—Matt. v. 44; and Luke vi. 28. "Bless them which persecute you; bless and curse not."—Rom. xii. 14. "I call heaven and earth to record this day against you" (says Moses, in Deut. xxx.), "that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live. That thou mayest love the Lord thy God, and obey his voice. And the Lord thy God will make thee plenteous in every work of thy hand, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy land, for good; for the Lord will again rejoice over thee for good, as he rejoiced over thy fathers. If thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes, which are written in his book of the law, and if thou turn unto the Lord thy God, with all thine heart and with all thy soul."—Deut. xxx. 9, 10, 19, 20. On God's conditions, and on these alone, we fervently believe there may yet be good in store for our beloved, though desolate and unhappy country. That the law of man agrees with the law of God in this matter, will appear from the next article.

* Such of our readers as have access to the Quarterly Review for September, 1851, No. 178, will find in it an interesting account of this important movement, perhaps the most remarkable recorded in Eastern annals. Within the last seven years, the Hindoos have exhibited, for the first time within historical memory, the phenomenon of religious change. For the benefit of such of our readers as may not have access to the original account, furnished by the late Chairman of the Committee of East India Directors, we purpose giving, in our next number, a short epitome of it, containing a brief view of this deeply interesting and almost incredible movement in Hindostan.

RESULTS OF EXCOMMUNICATION.

On the 20th March, 1846, a trial took place at the Antrim assizes, at Carrickfergus. An action was brought by a Roman Catholic, of the name of Charles M'Loughlin, against the Rev. Luke Walsh, a Roman Catholic priest in the county of Antrim. The legal declaration contained two counts—first, that the plaintiff was a parishioner of Culfreightrin, and the defendant parish priest of that parish; and that the plaintiff, as a teacher of the Scriptures in the Irish language, and owner of a mill, had lived on terms of intimacy with, and possessed the good opinion of his neighbours, and made gain by his mill; and the defendant, intending to injure the plaintiff, &c., on the 11th August, 1844, during divine service in a Roman Catholic chapel, pronounced the plaintiff excommunicated, meaning thereby that the plaintiff was unworthy of the general society of the parishioners, and that they should not have any dealings with him. The second count set out the words in which the excommunication was alleged to be made—viz., "My curse and God's curse on Charles M'Loughlin, Hugh Shields, and John M'Cay, and on all who will work with and hold any communication with the accursed teachers of the Irish Bible." Culfreightrin is in the glens of Antrim; and Charles M'Loughlin, the miller there, was brought up as a member of the Roman Catholic Church. He was better educated than most of his neighbours, for he could read and speak the Irish language well and grammatically. He was a man of good character, and of honest and industrious habits. About the year 1843, he became an Irish Scripture teacher, and he taught many persons to read the Word of God in the Irish language. Father Walsh set about forbidding and preventing him. He tried to persuade M'Loughlin to give up teaching, but this would not do; so he threatened that he would curse him from the altar, and tell his hearers not to speak to him. He said he would put man, woman, and child from speaking to him; that they should not walk on the same side of the road with him; that he would not get a single hand's turn to do; and that he would leave his mill as dry as the road; and that this would be intimated in the chapel; and that the plaintiff would be cursed by "bell, book, and candle."

On the 11th August, 1844, the priest did as he had threatened; and all the consequences that he had spoken of actually happened. All these facts were proved to the satisfaction of judge and jury, although Father Walsh was in court, and somewhat alarmed the witnesses; but there was no hiding the truth, and the jury gave their verdict in favour of the miller, and against the priest. They fixed the damages at seventy pounds, which the priest was to pay, as well as all the costs of the action.

Father Walsh appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin, and by this means he put off the payment of the money, and tried to cover his defeat; but after putting it off as long as he could, and letting the public attention turn to something else, the priest has quietly paid the seventy pounds damages and all the costs, which amounted to above a hundred more. This is a very important fact: and every Irish Roman Catholic may know, that the law of the land will protect him from the consequences of the cursing of the priest, whenever the priest dares to use a curse to hinder a man from reading that by which man lives—that is, every Word of God. —See the Report of the Case in the 10th vol. Irish Law Reports, p. 19.

LETTER OF POPE PIUS IX.

The following letter was written by the present Pope, not quite three years since, to all bishops in communion with the See of Rome. Its interest has not since diminished, for the letter itself promises further proceedings on the same subject, which have not yet appeared.

We consider this letter one of the most important documents which has issued from the Roman See for centuries past. The subject is grave, and full of difficulty; the letter purposes to make a decision pregnant with important consequences to the Church of Rome. Such a question should be most deliberately considered; and we are, therefore, not surprised that three years should have elapsed without a report from those to whom the matter has been referred by the Pope.

The reason which induces us to lay this letter before the Catholic laity is this: in a matter of such grave importance, the Pope states that he is anxious to learn, not merely the opinion of the bishops and the clergy, but the sentiments and feelings of the laity. We conceive that this desire does honour to the Pope; that it is suitable to the character in which he had the courage to stand up, in the commencement of his Pontificate, as THE GREATEST REFORMER IN EUROPE. And we know not how we can better commence our office of providing suitable and safe subjects of thought for Catholic laymen, than by calling their attention to an important subject, on which the great head of the Roman Church desires to know their opinions. Surely, when the Pope wishes to know the sentiments of the laity on any subject, it is their bounden duty to consider that subject, and form some opinion which may be expressed to him as theirs.

To aid them in forming such an opinion, we shall, in a future number of THE LAYMAN, publish some of the most important decrees which have formerly been made on this subject by popes and councils. At the present, we shall only say a few words on the grave importance and difficulty of the question.

The question whether the Blessed Virgin Mary, at or after the moment of her conception in the womb of her mother, was subject to original sin, or whether she was free from it, first arose in the Church of Rome about seven hundred years ago. Now, this letter from the present Pope tells us that this question has never yet been settled by the Apostolic See. It is clear that such a state of things is injurious to the Roman Church. It affords Protestants a ready argument against the advantage, or even the existence of an infallible judge, always able and always willing to settle all controversies as they arise. It is a favourite topic with their controversial preachers, and some of their churches at this very time are actually resounding with it. It is clear that such a state of things cannot continue when laymen begin to think. If the infallible judge do not decide such questions, men will begin to ask what he is for. This, no doubt, is the reason why Pius IX. now wishes to decide it.

And yet it is a grave question, whether the inconvenience and the mischief of attempting now to decide this matter may not be greater still. It has ever as yet been held among Catholics, that the office of TRADITION has been to hand down revealed articles of faith from the times of the apostles themselves; and that whatever has not been brought down by tradition from the apostles themselves is no part of "the faith once delivered to the saints," and cannot now be an article of the Catholic faith. Now, from the Pope's statement that this question has never yet been decided by the Apostolic See, it follows that it is not now, and never has been, an article of the Catholic faith. But if the Immaculate conception of the Virgin should now be decided in the affirmative (and the Pope's letter seems to contemplate no other decision), it will become an article of faith in the Roman Church all over the world. We do not see how, in such a case, the doctrine of the office of tradition can be maintained, or how it could then be asserted that the faith of the Roman Church continues the same in all its parts as it has been from the times of the Apostles. How shall any one then answer the Protestants when they will turn round and say (as they will), "Here is a part of your faith which was not an article of faith in your own Church yesterday, and it is an article of your faith to-day; is this faith as old as the times of the Apostles?" This is the more important, as the greatest of the Fathers, and of Roman Catholic divines in modern times, have not scrupled to affirm that the Church of Rome has no tradition upon the subject. So said St. Bernard, the last of the Fathers; and so says Bishop Milner, an English Roman Catholic Bishop, about 35 years ago, in his "End of Controversy."

We look on this with the utmost anxiety, in connection with the recent appointment of Dr. Newman, a distinguished convert from the English Church, to the office of rector of the new Catholic university. It is well known that Dr. Newman, since his conversion, has published a book, in which he not only admits, but openly avows, that the faith of the Roman Church of the present day is not the same as that faith which the apostles delivered to the saints, and that it is hopeless to attempt to defend it as such. We look on such admissions as full of danger. If such is to be the teaching of the new Catholic university, and if such teaching is to be countenanced by decisions of the See of Rome, we see not how the controversy with Protestants is to be sustained, or how Catholics are to be kept in that faith which they have always hitherto been taught to look upon as precisely identical with the faith which the blessed apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, once delivered to the Church.

On the one hand, we have the great scandal of leaving so important a question still unsettled, in a Church which possesses an infallible judge, whose office it is to settle all controversies as they arise. On the other hand, see the great and appalling dangers which beset a decision, such as the Pope's letter contemplates. We no longer wonder at the three years of deliberation which have followed that letter, without any other step having been taken; and since the Pope has asked to be informed of the opinions of the laity on so grave a question, we urge upon them, while it is yet time, to make it a serious subject of thought. We shall, in our next number, give materials to enable them to do so. We desire them to take this article as an instance of the caution we shall use in submitting proper subjects for their consideration; and of the calm, dispassionate, and practical manner in which we shall treat those subjects; and, with these observations, we commend the Pope's letter to the earnest consideration of laymen.

PIUS P. P., IX.

"Venerable brethren—health and apostolical benediction. When raised at the first, certainly by no merits of our own, but by the secret counsel of Divine Providence, to the sublime chair of the Prince of the Apostles, we undertook the government of the whole Church, we feel the greatest consolation, venerable brethren, when we know in what manner, in the pontificate of our predecessor, Gregory the Sixteenth, of venerable memory, an ardent desire had wonderfully revived in the Catholic world, that it should, at length, be decreed by the Apostolic See, by a solemn judgment, that the most holy Mother of God, the most loving mother of us all, the immaculate Virgin Mary, was conceived without the original stain; which most pious desire, the petitions presented as well to the said predecessor of ours as to ourselves continually, most clearly and openly prove and demonstrate; in which the most distinguished prelates, the most illustrious colleges of the Canons, and the religious establishments, among whom is the renowned order of preaching Friars, have, with rivalry, solicited that in the sacred liturgy, especially in the preface of the Mass of the conception of the most Blessed Virgin, it should be lawful to openly and publicly pronounce and add that word 'Immaculate.' To which petitions it was agreed, with the utmost readiness, by our predecessor and ourselves. It has also come to pass, venerable brethren, that very many of your own order have not ceased to address your letters to our predecessor and to us, in which they have sought, with repeated petitions and redoubled desires, that we should be willing to define, as a doctrine of the Catholic Church, that the conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary was altogether immaculate and wholly free from all stain of original sin. Nor, indeed, were there wanting, even in this our age, men excelling in capacity, virtue, piety, doctrine, who, by their learned and laborious writings of this kind, have so illustrated this subject, and most pious opinion, that many persons wonder why this honour has not yet been decreed to the most Holy Virgin by the Church and the Apostolic See: which (honour) the common piety of the faithful so much desires should be attributed to that Virgin, by the solemn judgment and authority of that same Church and See. Indeed, wishes of this kind have been most pleasing and agreeable to us, who, even from our most tender years, have held nothing preferable, nothing more dear than to worship the most Blessed Virgin Mary with a singular piety and service, and with the most inward affection of our heart, and to perform those things which appear to be able to conduce to the greater glory of the Virgin herself, and to procure her praise, and to promote her worship. Wherefore, even from the very beginning of our pontificate, we seriously directed our cares and thoughts, even with the greatest alacrity, towards an affair of so great importance, and have not omitted to offer our most humble and fervent prayers to the best and greatest God, that he may be willing to illuminate our mind with the light of his celestial grace, by which we may be able to learn what should be done by us in this affair. We also endeavour to remain in this hope most strongly, that the Blessed Virgin, 'who has raised the highest pitch of merit above all choirs of angels, even to the throne of God,' and who has crushed under the foot of her virtue the head of the old serpent, who, 'placed between Christ and his church,' and altogether great and full of graces, has always rescued the Christian people from the greatest calamities whatsoever, and from the snares and assaults of all enemies, and has saved them from perishing, commisserating with that most ample affection of her maternal mind, with which she is accustomed, our most sad and mournful vicissitudes and most bitter necessities, labours, and distresses, will be willing, with her most present, and also her most powerful patronage with God, to turn away the scourge of divine anger with which we are afflicted on account of our sins, and to restrain and dissipate the most turbulent storms of evils by which, with incredible grief to our mind, the Church is everywhere tossed, and to convert our grief into joy. For you know full well, venerable brethren, that all ground of our confidence is placed in the most holy Virgin, since God 'has placed the fulness of all good in Mary, so that, if there be any hope in us, if any grace, if any salvation, we may know that it flows from her . . . because such is the will of him who wills that we should have all through Mary.'

* The note to the Douay version, published with the authority of the Most Rev. W. Crolly, D.D., R.C. Archbishop of Armagh, and the Right Rev. Cornelius Denvir, D.D., R.C. Bishop of Down and Connor, makes the meaning still more plain—"The meaning is, that a curse uttered without cause shall do no harm to the person that is cursed, but will return upon him that curseth, as whithersoever a bird flies it returns to its own nest."

† The famine and the tide of emigration have well nigh fulfilled this prophecy in hapless Ireland.

"Hence, we have chosen some ecclesiastical men, distinguished for their piety, and well versed in theological study, and some of our venerable brethren, cardinals of the Roman Church, illustrious for their virtue, religion, counsel, prudence, and knowledge of divine things, and we have committed to them that, according to their prudence and learning, they should take care to examine on every side this most grave subject, and then report to us their opinion with all diligence. But while the matter stands in this position, we have resolved to follow the illustrious footsteps of our predecessors, and to emulate their example.

"Wherefore, we write these letters to you, venerable brethren, in which we by all means excite your distinguished piety and episcopal care; and again and again, we enjoin you, that each of you, according to his judgment and prudence, will take care that public prayers should be appointed and performed in his own diocess, by which means the most merciful Father of lights may think fit to pour out upon us of the heavenly light of his Divine Spirit, to breathe on us of his inspiration, that in matter of so great importance, we may be able to embrace that counsel which may pertain as well to the greater glory of his holy name, as to the greater praise of the most Blessed Virgin, as well as to the greater good of the Church militant. But we earnestly desire, that with the greatest speed with which it can be done, you will signify to us with what devotion your clergy AND FAITHFUL PEOPLE are animated towards the conception of the immaculate Virgin, and with what desire they are inflamed, that a matter of this kind should be determined by the Holy See; and especially we desire to know what you, yourselves, venerable brethren, think of this matter, according to your distinguished wisdom, and what you wish. And, since we have now conceded to the Roman clergy, that they may be able to recite the proper canonical hours of the conception of the most Blessed Virgin, recently composed and published, in place of that which is contained in the ordinary Breviary: therefore, by these letters, we give you power, venerable brethren, that, if it so please you, the whole clergy of your diocess may be able, freely and carefully, to use those canonical hours of the conception of the most holy Virgin, which the Roman clergy now uses, without being obliged to ask liberty from us, or our Congregation of Sacred Rites.

"We do not doubt, venerable brethren, but that, according to your singular piety towards the most holy Virgin Mary, you will rejoice to comply with these our desires, with all care and zeal, and that you will hasten to give us the speedy reply which we ask of you. In the meanwhile receive, as a pledge of all heavenly gifts, and especially of our benevolence towards you, the apostolic benediction, which, from the bottom of our heart, we bestow on you, venerable brethren, and on all the clergy and faithful people committed to your care.

"Given at Cajeta, this second day of February, in the year 1849, the third year of our Pontificate."

We place this letter on record in our pages, with a deepening sense of the responsibility of our undertaking. We feel that there is a contrast, a painful one, between this letter and all those letters which the Apostles wrote to the Churches. We are aware that many Roman Catholics deny that they worship the Blessed Virgin. We believe that such persons must feel hurt or shocked at hearing the head of the Roman Church avow, that his FIRST object is to promote her worship. One object, at least, might stand before it—namely, to promote and extend the worship of the Lord himself. We painfully feel the total omission of the name of Christ from this important letter, except in one place, which only makes the omission more striking.

These thoughts, we believe, will find a place in the minds of many Roman Catholics, jealous as all men ought to be for the honour and the purity of their Church.

But we cannot shut our eyes to the existence of this letter; and considered it must be. We shall return to it again, and we invite our readers to preserve this number of THE LAYMAN, that they may be able to refer to the Pope's letter when necessary.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-street.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith.

As the expense of the publication is necessarily heavy, prompt Subscriptions are earnestly solicited.

The press of important matter in this opening number has obliged us reluctantly, from want of space, to omit several highly interesting contributions of a lively character, which we hope, however, to be able to lay before our readers in our next number.

Contributors will be good enough not to consider that their communications have been disapproved of, or will not be ultimately inserted, because they do not appear immediately in our pages. The nature of our undertaking will afford an obvious explanation why delay may, sometimes, be unavoidable.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1852.

THE time is come when the laity must think more than they have done. For good, or for evil—whether they wish it, or whether they do not—it is inevitable that the laity must think, and think deeply.

Many causes unite to create this necessity of thinking.

The National and other Schools of Ireland are now educating the people to exercise their minds. Formerly, to read and write was education; but now "education" is to acquire a power of thinking.

The Queen's Colleges are opening out to the middle classes a new field of intellectual education, with all the advantages that attend on intellectual power.

And if Irishmen now possess the means of attaining to the great source of all human power—the power of a rational mind—they are also under a necessity which impels them to attain to it. True-hearted Irishmen have before them a mighty task. They have to raise a prostrate country. No people have ever done this without exercising and cultivating the power of thought; for the mind is the source of man's power over the material world. To accomplish their great task, Irishmen must and will become energetic in thought and action. This has ever been the source and the instrument of national prosperity. Men who do not think, will not act effectively; men of action are ever men of thought.

It is the most striking character of human thought, that when once aroused to activity it grasps the greatest and noblest objects; as it ascends, it sees still greater objects arise before it, and it grasps them too. The things relating to the immortal spirit, which man feels within him; his present and his future intercourse with God; this is the highest aim of human thought. When once awakened to activity, it will, it must proceed to this great end. The spirit must return to God who gave it, and it will aim at understanding him, and the way to find him. Those who learn to think will, therefore, find themselves thinking about religion.

This consequence of learning to think is not a future thing; it is present with us now.

We see what numbers on both sides have changed their religion. Now, it is not every one who thinks about religion, that goes on to change it. Such multitudes of changers in religion do, therefore, prove that there are vast multitudes who are thinking about religion; and who can help thinking about it, when he considers all this? This is the state of things; we have not made it; we only seek to meet it.

We believe that this state of things, if it be full of hope is also full of danger. It is no light thing for a man to begin to think about doctrines which he has formerly held without thought. On the one hand, we may hope much if he think about it rightly; we may hope that, as he understands religion more, he will practise it better. If religion be true, the more we examine it, the more firmly he will believe it, the more earnestly he will practise it. And this holds out a hope, not only for the man, but for Ireland. Drunkards, swearers, thieves, idlers, are curses to Ireland, and will never help to raise her. Religion teaches men to be sober, honest, industrious; these men are the strength of a nation. And they have a promise from God, for "Godliness is profitable to all things, having promise of the life THAT NOW IS, and of that which is to come. A faithful saying, and worthy of acceptation." Let Ireland but lay hold on this promise in her hour of need, and her mourning will be turned into joy.

On the other hand, to think rashly or wrongly endangers faith, and may lead to infidelity.

Our object is to aid the laity in regulating and controlling that thinking about religion which is now inevitable—which is actually going on this moment; to suggest right methods of thinking, and to supply sound materials.

It is not our object to usurp, or to interfere with the office of the clergy. We reverence that office as an institution of God. But if the laity do learn to think at all (and who will say that the laity should be irrational creatures?) the laity must also learn to regulate and control their thoughts. The clergy cannot do this for the laity, any more than they can think for the laity. God did not make the laity for the clergy, but he made the clergy for the laity; and this must never be forgotten, in considering the relation in which they stand to each other. The clergy have an important office to instruct the laity; but the time is past when the clergy can think for the laity, or take the sole control and regulation of their thoughts.

The laity need a lay organ, a voice of their own, to express their thoughts, and their feelings, and their wants. And this organ should be ever open to the clergy, to instruct and direct the laity by reason and learning.

To supply this great want, we establish our journal. We invite the laity to make it truly effectual, by letters, addressed to us, expressing their wants and their difficulties; to such letters we shall give a ready insertion. We place our pages at the disposal of the clergy, to give such direction and instruction to the laity as they may deem proper.

For ourselves, we shall act with the utmost caution and reverence, and shall be ever open to conviction. That which is Catholic, we shall never question, nor suffer to be questioned in our pages.

We believe that to be Catholic which Christ and his Apostles revealed to the world; and, concerning the tradition of the Catholic Church, whatever she has handed down to us from the beginning, concerning Catholic faith, that we shall ever respect.

What we ourselves shall produce as materials for thought, shall be taken, with the utmost care, from the most approved authors, from the ancient histories of the Church, especially of the Irish Church, from the noblest actions and sayings of the Catholic Fathers, from the memorials of the martyrs. This number gives a worthy instance from St. Columbanus, one of the oldest and holiest of the Irish saints.

The subjects on which laymen are now especially bound to think, we shall take from unquestionable authorities. Our present number gives a letter from the present Pope, in which he expresses his desire to know the sentiments of the laity on an important question.

Our task is grave and important, and we enter on it with feelings of its solemn responsibility; and may we find favour with God and man, as we shall seek to perform it faithfully, fearlessly, and reverentially.

INFALLIBILITY.

The essay which follows is not new in substance, though now presented in a somewhat modified and simplified form to our readers. We select it, not merely as coming from the pen of one of the ablest prelates of the Established Church, but as having been selected by some of the most celebrated controversialists of the present day, in the Church of Rome, as a treatise worthy of reply, which reply we purpose also to give in a future number. None, we think, can complain of the temper and spirit in which the Archbishop of Dublin's essay is written, or of want of interest in the all-important subject of which it treats. If there be really an infallible guide to heaven, all must admit that it is error unto death to refuse to accept its guidance: while, on the other hand, to accept as infallible a guide not really so, must be equally fatal to those who trust to it. If God has given us such a guide, he, doubtless, did so also to the primitive Church of Christ and His Apostles; and to the sacred records, therefore, both sides must ultimately appeal to decide this momentous question; and it is not to be decided one way or the other by man's wishes or a priori expectations. We regret that the whole of this important essay is too long to be given at once in our present number:—

THE SEARCH AFTER INFALLIBILITY.

In the Apostle Paul's farewell address to the elders [clergy] of Ephesus and Miletus, he gives them a very solemn warning, saying, "I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them. Therefore watch, and remember that by the space of three years, I ceased not to warn every one, night and day, with tears."—Acts xx. 29, 30, 31.

And it is to be observed—

I. That what he here says, is of a piece with much that we find in several of his epistles or letters. In his Epistles to the Corinthians, especially the Second, he warns them against "false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into Apostles of Christ, and ministers of righteousness," even as "Satan himself transforms himself into an angel of light"—men seeking to disparage Paul's apostolic authority, and to introduce doctrines opposed to his. "There must be," says he, "heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you."—1 Cor. xi. 19. The Epistle to the Galatians, again, is almost made up of similar cautions. The Philippians also are warned [chap. iii.], in like manner, to be on their guard against teachers who corrupted the Gospel. Cautions of the same kind are addressed to almost all the other churches to which he wrote; and both Timothy and Titus are earnestly and repeatedly exhorted to watch against the inroads of these corruptions.

The Apostle Peter also cautions the disciples against those "unlearned and unstable" persons, who "wrest," he tells them, "the Scripture to their own destruction."

The Apostle John, again, in his Epistles, is chiefly occupied in warning his hearers against those false prophets—those "wolves in sheep's clothing"—of whom his Master had prophesied, and bid his disciples beware.

And here we find Paul, in his farewell address to the elders, earnestly urging again the solemn warning of this danger, which he tells them he had been continually repeating for three years. "From among themselves," he tells them—"from the very bosom of their own Church"—men will arise teaching perverted doctrines, "to draw away [the] disciples after themselves."

Now, it might seem wonderful, or even incredible, if we had not these accounts in the Bible, that any such thing should have taken place; that in the very times of the Apostles themselves, whose authority from Heaven was proved by their miraculous powers, any false teachers should have not only arisen, but should have gained a hearing, and been able to draw away the disciples by pretending to an authority equal or superior to that of the real Apostles. And if we had not providentially possessed these accounts of the early dangers of the Church, we might have been altogether disheartened at the view of the various errors introduced into later times by men of high pretensions as religious teachers. We might have felt as if God had forsaken his Church when he withdrew from it the guidance of the inspired Apostles, and left Christians to find their safety in watchful, and careful, and honest examination of every doctrine taught. But, as it is, we see that, from the very first, this care and watchfulness were indispensably necessary to guard against the danger of false teachers introducing corruptions of the true Gospel; that even then Christians were required to be on their guard against the grievous wolves in sheep's clothing, who would enter in, not sparing the flock.

We ought not, therefore, either to wonder or be disheartened at finding Christians in all ages since exposed to the same dangers, and called on to exercise the same watchfulness, as in the very times of the Apostles themselves.

II. The second thing to be observed is the way in which Paul tell his hearers to provide against the danger.

Does he promise them that the primitive or early Church shall be safe from it? that no inroads of error will take place for the first three or four hundred years? On the contrary, he speaks of the danger as close at hand.

Or does he tell them that they will find their safety in apostolic succession? that it is miraculously provided that no teacher shall ever mislead them, who has but been regularly ordained by himself, or by those appointed by him to succeed him in the office of ordaining? On the contrary, he warns the elders that even from the midst of their own body—of their own selves—will arise men teaching a perverted Gospel, to draw away the disciples after them.

Or again, does he tell them that when any point of doubt and difficulty arises, they are to find safety in applying to Peter and to those who shall be divinely appointed from time to time as his successors and representatives, for decisions and directions that cannot be wrong? Not a word is said of any Apostle but himself; or of any one who should succeed him in the apostolic office. To himself, during his life, they would naturally apply by letter, if opportunity offered, for directions in any case of doubt that might arise. But not even any Apostle—much less any successor of an Apostle—is mentioned by Paul as the infallible guide, whom, after his own death, they were to consult.

Or does he bid them resort to some central Church—whether at Jerusalem, or at Rome, or at Byzantium—and seek there for infallible guidance?

Or does he direct them to summon a general council, or assembly of all Christians, and refer every question that may arise to the decision of a majority of its votes; with a full assurance that these should be so supernaturally overruled by the Holy Spirit as to secure them from the possibility of mistake?

No: he makes no allusion whatever to any other Church or prelate; to any successor of Peter or of the other Apostles; or to any infallible council, as their guide. But he tells them to TAKE HEED TO THEMSELVES, and to the flock they are set over; he tells them to "watch;" and he exhorts them to remember his own earnest warnings to them.

Now, if there had been provided by the Most High any such safeguard as has been alluded to—if Paul had known of any order of men, any bishop or archbishop, any particular Church, or general council, designed by Providence as an infallible guide, and a sure remedy against errors and corruptions, would he not have been sure, on such an occasion as this, to give notice of it. If, when he foresaw the peril of the Church, like that of a ship in a dangerous storm, he had known of a safe port, just at hand, and easily entered, is it to be believed that he would have never alluded to it, but have left his hearers exposed to the storms? Would he have been, in that case, "pure"—as he declares he was—"from the blood of all men?" Can any one seriously think, that against the dangers which he had been warning them of, and weeping over, for three years, he knew of a complete safeguard, and yet was so wanting in his duty—so careless of their well-being—as never to make the slightest mention of anything of the kind? To suppose this would be to suppose him destitute not only of all faithfulness in his high office, but of common prudence and good sense.

But it may be said, have we not in the Bible the promise of the Lord Jesus to his Apostles and all his true ministers, "Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world?" Is not that a promise that he will always give them an infallible guide?

With respect to the meaning of that promise, one thing at any rate must be perfectly plain, that it could not refer to anything either unknown to Paul, or kept back by him from his hearers. We cannot for a moment think that the Saviour, if he had provided such an infallible guide as we have been describing, would have left his faithful and inspired servant, Paul, ignorant of it; especially at so important a time. And we have the Apostle's own solemn assurance to the ministers whom he was addressing on that occasion that he had not kept back anything of all that he knew that it was for their benefit to learn; and this was no less than the whole counsel and design of God. "I take you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men. For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God. Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them. Therefore watch, and remember, that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one, night and day, with tears." From all this we may learn, among other things, how great is the mistake of those who are satisfied if they can trace up to a very early period—to what they call the primitive Church—some doctrine or practice not found in God's Holy Word; and they consider this as showing God's approbation of what may have been, after all, one of the "perverse things" introduced by false teachers, and against which Paul so earnestly warned the elders.

III. The third point to be observed is, that the exposure of Christians to these dangers, and the call upon them, both ministers and laity, for the continued exercise of watchful caution, is far from appearing to be either what we would wish, or what we would think probable in a revelation from God. It is opposed both to men's feelings and to their expectations.

To examine again and again—to think and consider—to hesitate and to make up one's mind cautiously—to be always ready to hear anything fair that can be said—and to acknowledge that, after all, we may be mistaken; all this is, on many accounts, contrary to men's natural inclinations. Some have no confidence in their own judgment, and are therefore afraid of being left in any way to its guidance; some are so proud that they cannot bear to acknowledge themselves in doubt or uncertainty; some are so indolent that they do not like the trouble of thinking and deciding; some wish to escape the anxious cares connected with such a state, and cannot bear to be in the least degree of uncertainty. And hence there is a strong prejudice or feeling beforehand in favour of any system which promises to put an end to the work of inquiry at once and for ever, and to relieve us from all embarrassing doubt and uncomfortable self-distrust. And this is done, either by setting forth the authority of an infallible Church, which is to mark out, on every point, what we are to believe and to do; thus relieving us from all trouble and anxiety, and from all necessity of acting on the Apostle's warning to "take heed to ourselves:" or, again, by putting in place of such a Church immediate inspiration from heaven, whether bestowed on each individual who belongs to a certain sect or party, or on some highly-gifted leader, who will communicate to his followers the messages he receives from heaven. Widely different, in many points, as these sects, and parties, and churches are from each other, they all agree in the one fundamental point just noticed. They all address themselves to that powerful principle in human nature already noticed, the craving for infallibility in religious matters.

It is true that hardly any one is found who in words claims or expects to be personally infallible; still we may truly say, that there is in human nature a craving for infallibility; because it is perfectly evident, that he who is infallibly following an infallible guide is himself infallible. If his decisions on each point agree exactly with those of an authority which cannot be mistaken, then it is quite obvious that his decisions must be infallibly right. But this, though self-evident as soon as stated, is sometimes lost sight of in practice: a man will speak of himself as being fallible—that is, liable to make mistakes, and as having no expectation of being otherwise. But if he be quite certain that he has an infallible guide to whom he can always apply, and whom he constantly and accurately follows, his meaning must be, that he would be fallible if left to himself. But actually and practically he does consider himself infallible.

Though the gnomon [or upright part] of a sun-dial has no power in itself to show the hour, yet, when the sun shines upon it, the motions of its shadow must be as correct as those of the sun's rays which it follows. And, in like manner, he is infallible, practically, in his belief, who always believes exactly what an infallible church or leader believes.

This craving, then, for infallibility, inclines men beforehand to receive the pretensions, either of a supposed infallible Church, or of those who claim or who promise immediate inspiration. And, accordingly, some persons waver for a time between these two kinds of pretensions, and at last give in to the one or to the other. And, again, you may find persons changing from the one to the other, and sometimes thus changing more than once; and it might be added, that one may find instances of the same individual, himself unchanged, exposed to severe blame, at different times, not only from different persons, but even from the same; first for refusing to join the one party, and afterwards for refusing to join the other most opposed to it; both parties, much as they are opposed to each other, still always clinging to the confident expectation of finding that infallibility above spoken of. They are inquiring only after a way of freeing themselves from the trouble of all further inquiry. Their care is only to relieve themselves, in the end, from all further need of watchful care. They are like men in a ship, searching for a perfectly safe harbour, in which the helm may be abandoned, and the ship left to ride securely, without any need of watching the winds and currents, and of looking out for rocks and shoals. They hope to obtain, in all ages of the Church, that freedom from all need of watchful circumspection, which was not granted even in the age of the Apostles; for we find that even when there were these infallible guides on earth, Christians are perpetually warned of the danger of mistaking "false Apostles" for true.

But the flattering promise of the infallible guidance here spoken of, not only meets man's wishes, but, as observed before, his expectations also. When we allow our thoughts to run on in our mind without restraint, we are apt to think that God is as likely to provide for us such a guide, as we are to wish for it.

If, before they knew anything about what God has revealed in the Bible, men were asked what kind of revelation they would wish to obtain, and again, what kind of revelation they would think it the most reasonable and probable that God should bestow, they would be likely to answer both questions by saying, "Such a revelation as should provide some infallible guide on earth, easily found by every man; so that no one could possibly be in doubt, on any point, as to what he was required to believe and to do; but should be placed, as it were, on a kind of plain high-road, which he would only have to follow steadily, without taking any care to look around him; or, rather, in some kind of conveyance on such a road, in which he would be safely carried to his journey's end, even though asleep, provided he never quitted that conveyance. "For," a man might say, "if a book is put into my hands containing a divine revelation, and in which are passages that may be differently understood by different persons, even by those of learning and ability, even by men professing each to have earnestly prayed for spiritual guidance towards the right understanding of it; and if, moreover, this book contains, in respect of some points of belief and of conduct, no directions at all, then there is a manifest necessity that I should be provided with an infallible interpreter to explain this book, who shall be always at hand, to be consulted, and ready to teach me, without the possibility of mistake, the right meaning of every passage, and to supply all deficiencies and omissions in the book itself. For, otherwise, this revelation is, to me, no revelation at all. Though the book itself be perfectly free from all mixture of error—though all that it asserts be true, and all its directions right—still, it is no guide for me, unless I have an infallible certainty, on each point, what its assertions and directions are. It is in vain to tell me that the pole-star is always fixed in the north; I cannot steer my course by it, when it is covered by clouds; so that I cannot be certain where that star is. I need a compass to steer by, which I can consult at all times. There is, therefore, a manifest necessity for an infallible interpreter on earth, whom every one can easily go to, as an essential part of any Divine revelation." Such would be the thoughts, and such the feelings, of a man left to himself to consider what sort of revelation from heaven would be most acceptable, and, also, the most probable—the best fitted to meet his wishes and his wants. And thus are men inclined, at the outset, both by their feelings and their thoughts, beforehand, to admit such pretensions as have been above alluded to.

And it may be added that any one who is thus induced to give himself up entirely to the guidance of such a supposed infallible authority, without presuming ever after to exercise his own judgment on any point relative to religion, or to think for himself at all on such matters—such a one will be likely to regard this as the very perfection of pious humility—as a most reverent observance of the rule which says, "Lean not to thine own understanding;" though, in reality, it is the very error of improperly leaning to our own understanding; for, to resolve to believe that God must have dealt with mankind just in the way that we could wish, as the most desirable, and in the way that to us seems the most probable—this is, in fact, to set up ourselves as His judges. It is to dictate to Him in the spirit of Naaman, who thought that the prophet Elisha would recover him by a touch, and who chose to be healed by the waters of Abana and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus, which he deemed better than all the waters of Israel.

But anything that falls in at once with men's wishes, and with their expectations, and which also presents itself to them with the appearance of a virtuous humility—this they are often found readily and firmly to believe, not only without evidence, but against all evidence.

And thus it is in the present case. The notion that every revelation from heaven necessarily requires an infallible interpreter always at hand, to explain it, without which we cannot possibly understand it—this notion clings so strongly to the minds of many men, that they are even found still to maintain it after they have ceased to believe in any revelation at all, or even in the existence of a God. There can be no doubt of the fact that very great numbers of men are to be found—they are much more numerous in some parts of the Continent than among us—men not wanting in understanding, nor altogether without thought, who, while they, for the most part, join outwardly in the religion of those about them, are inwardly entire unbelievers in Christianity, yet still hold to the notion—which, in fact, has had the chief share in making them unbelievers—that a DIVINE REVELATION without an INFALLIBLE INTERPRETER always at hand, to explain it to every one, is such a thing as no one would think of; and that the one without the other is an absurdity, and a contradiction.

And this notion it is, as we have said, that has mainly contributed to make these men unbelievers. For, when a sensible and thoughtful man has fully satisfied himself that, in point of fact, no such provision has been made—that no infallible interpreter, within every one's reach, does exist on earth (and this is a conclusion which even the very words of Paul, in his discourse at Miletus, which we are now considering—Acts XX.—would be alone fully sufficient to prove), when he has satisfied himself that such an explainer does not exist, yet still continues to think that it is necessary, the consequence is unavoidable, that he will at once give up all belief of Christianity. The ideas of a REVELATION from God, and of an unerring interpreter to explain it, being, in his mind, inseparably joined, the overthrow of the one belief cannot but carry the other along with it. Such a person, therefore, will be apt to think it not worth while to examine the reasons in favour of any other form of Christianity, which does not pretend to offer him an infallible interpreter. This—which he is fully convinced is absolutely required by a revelation from heaven—is by some churches claimed, but not proved, while the rest do not even claim it. The pretensions of the one, he has listened to and deliberately rejected; those of the other, he regards as not even worth listening to.

The system, then, of arguing from our own suppositions, as to the necessity of the Most High doing so and so, is likely to lead a man first to throw aside his own form of Christianity, and then to give up revelation altogether. But does it stop there? Does not the same system also lead naturally to Atheism, or the entire denial of the existence of a God? Experience shows that that consequence, which reason might have led us to expect, does often actually take place. He who allows himself to think freely as to what he may consider to be necessity, and argues from that, will be likely to find a necessity for such divine interference in the affairs of the world, as does not in fact take place. He will deem it no less than necessary, that an almighty and an all-wise and good Being should interfere to rescue the oppressed from the oppressor—the corrupted from the corrupter—to deliver men from such temptations to evil as it is impossible, from their nature, they should withstand by their own unassisted strength; and, in short, to banish evil from the universe. And, since this is not done, he thinks it plain, that there cannot possibly be a God, and that to believe otherwise is a gross absurdity. Such a belief he may, indeed, consider as useful for keeping up a wholesome fear in the minds of the common people; and, for their sakes, he may outwardly profess Christianity also, even as the heathen philosophers of old endeavoured to keep up the common superstitions; but a real belief he will regard as something impossible to a sensible and thoughtful mind.

It is not meant that all, or the greater part of those who hold the notion here spoken of, are Atheists. We all know how common it is for men not to go all the way, that some notion, whether good or bad, which they have taken up, would lead them; how common to argue stoutly for opinions, without seeing what must follow from them, if carried out to the end. But we are here trying to show what the notion itself may naturally lead to: and there have been many sad instances which prove, that the danger is real and great of its bringing men at last to be Atheists.

DOES THE ROMAN CHURCH REALLY BELIEVE IN ITS OWN CLAIM TO THE POSSESSION OF AN INFALLIBLE GUIDE?

[From the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal, with some additions by the Author.]

There cannot be a question that all men would naturally wish to have an universal, infallible guide in religion, to decide all controversies, condemn all heresy, and destroy all danger of error or mistake in a matter of such moment as religious faith.

We see men every day pin their faith to the skirts of teachers whom they admit to be as fallible as themselves, which of itself is a clear proof that they would gladly follow the guidance of any one who could show any plausible pretence to infallibility.

We know, also, with what wonderful facility men receive, in all ages, the pretensions of those who boldly set up to be prophets, and claim to be recipients of immediate inspiration. Witness the rapid spread of Mormonism in our own times—a religion, founded upon pretences to inspiration as shallow, and as ill-sustained by anything like real evidence, as can well be imagined.

It is not wonderful, therefore, that the pretensions of the Church of Rome to this great gift, supported as they are by bold assertion and the dogmatic teaching of centuries, should have many followers. At least the circumstance that Rome has numerous followers, is of itself no evidence that such pretensions are true. The wonder is, that there are so many who do not receive these pretensions, when we consider how ready men are to accept a claim, in itself so desirable, and which, if true, would relieve them from so much danger and responsibility. When we see men so willing to invest with all the attributes of infallibility the teachers or systems they have chosen to follow, even whilst they admit, and loudly profess to believe, that these teachers and systems are fallible, the wonder is, not that an ecclesiastical tribunal claiming infallibility should have followers, but that there should be any who refuse to accept its guidance.

When the vender of an universal medicine announces that he is in the possession of a compound capable of curing all the diseases to which mortality is subject, it is not wonderful that some men become purchasers, were it only for the chance of obtaining so great a benefit. But when a large portion of the public remain indifferent to him, as we cannot suppose them insensible to the great advantages of a medicine of universal and infallible efficacy, we are forced to conclude, either that they disbelieve the alleged qualities of the medicine, or that they had given it a trial and found it to be a cheat.

Again, if a man profess to have the power of commuting the baser metals into gold, it is not wonderful that some should flock to him, in the hope, if not the belief, that he might communicate to them so desirable a secret. But if men, suffering under debt or poverty, are found to treat his promises with contempt, we may be assured that it is not from indifference to the end proposed, but from an absolute disbelief in the powers of the alchemist, that they neglect to avail themselves of his boasted science.

But suppose we find on closer inquiry that the wife and children of the proprietor of the universal medicine are languishing at home, of some very common disease, and that he has never once thought of administering to them his panacea; or suppose we find that the great alchemist is himself starving with poverty in a garret, whilst he professes to teach others the art of converting old nails and useless brass or copper into gold, a further suspicion is created in our minds: we begin to see that the vender of the medicine, and the maker of gold, have no faith in their own pretensions—they are eloquent in public upon the virtues of their respective powers, in hope of obtaining money from the credulity of others, but in private, and in their own homes, they are utter disbelievers in themselves.

Now, this is exactly the case of the Church of Rome. Her divines are loud in the assertion of her claim to the possession of an infallible tribunal for the decision of all controversies; and they have many followers, because all would be rejoiced to be under the protection of such a power, and many are content to place themselves under its guidance, as a relief to their perplexities, or to save themselves the labour of inquiry, on the chance that such pretensions may be true. But others doubt, or refuse to believe, not because they are indifferent to the claim (unless they be indifferent to religion itself), but because they are of opinion—some, that the evidences of the claim are insufficient to support it; others, that a fair and extensive trial having been made of it, it has been found to be a failure or a cheat.

But then occurs the other question. Do the advocates of this claim really believe in it themselves? Does the Church of Rome practically believe herself to possess the infallible power of deciding controversies, of which she so loudly boasts? Can we follow her to her home, and ascertain whether she administers to her own children and household the medicine of which she claims to be the sole vender? Does she apply her philosopher's stone to relieve the poverty and nakedness of her own secret chambers?

If we find that she does not—that the children of Rome are perishing of the same diseases which afflict the rest of mankind—perplexed with the same controversies, doubts, and difficulties amongst themselves, which are to be found in other communions, and, nevertheless, that they never think of seeking to their boasted infallible tribunal for a solution of their perplexities; if we find that even the infallible tribunal itself does not think it advisable to interfere for the relief of its doubting children, but, on the contrary, sits still and suffers them to fight out their controversies like other folk, then must we be convinced either that the possession of this gift of infallibility is, after all, no such great advantage, or that its pretended possessors are no real believers in themselves.

1. For example, we are taunted by Romanists with the necessary imperfections of vernacular versions of the Bible. They are, it is said, the work of men confessedly fallible; they are liable to many errors; the faithful, therefore, in reading them are reading, not the infallible Word of God, but a version of that word, made by fallible and erring men, and, therefore, fallible and erroneous like its authors.

Well, then, suppose this to be so, what more important case can be conceived for the exercise of an infallible judgment than to secure the Church from this danger by providing vernacular versions which shall be purged from all error? Yet this we are told the infallibility of Rome is unable to effect. Bellarmine, the warmest advocate of the Ultramontane pretence to infallibility, admits its failure here. He tells us that this weakness of their boasted infallibility is one cause why the Roman Church refuses to its laity, of different nations and languages, vernacular versions of the Scripture in their respective tongues—"Because (says he), vernacular languages are subject to continual change; versions, therefore, in vernacular languages, ought to be continually altered to suit them to the variations of the languages. But this would be impossible, for want of competent translators, and thus many and irremediable errors would be occasioned, since neither Popes nor Councils are able to judge of so many languages."*

So, then, on this most important point, the infallible judge is at fault, and Rome, with her boasted power of deciding all difficulties and controversies, confesses herself unable to provide her children with versions of the Bible without the very same risk of error which her divines represent as the peculiar disadvantage of the Protestant translator. But here we find, by Bellarmine's confession, that Popes and Council can do no better—their gift of infallibility fails them here; they can only trust, like ourselves, to the qualifications of the translators; for "they are unable to judge of so many languages." Habemus confitentem reum.

In what, then, is the condition of the Roman laity better than our own, in reference to vernacular versions? One version, in a language which was partially vernacular in Europe some centuries ago, is authorized and pronounced "authentic," or infallible. But this version is now as unintelligible to the great mass of the people as the Hebrew or Greek originals; and if versions of this version in the modern languages of Europe are partially and sparingly allowed, they are allowed solely on the responsibility of the individual translators; the infallible judge has carefully abstained from giving them any real sanction, and they who use them must take them, as we take ours, on the character for learning and integrity of the individual translators.

2. Again, with respect to other controversies, when we look at the internal history of the Roman communion, we do not find that its members possess any very transcendant advantages over ourselves. The Jesuits and Dominicans, the Jesuits and Jansenists, the Dominicans and Franciscans, and other great contending parties, were allowed to work out their several controversies just as they would have been allowed to work them out if they had been Protestants. No infallible authority interposed to allay the storm, to calm the virulence of party spirit, or to settle for ever on which side truth was to be found. Troublesome questions were hushed up, and troublesome individuals silenced or put out of the way by various calumnies or artifices, and sometimes by persecution or imprisonment, with even more of unjustifiable violence than is usual in other communions. And this we are told was because the questions at issue were merely matters of theological opinion, and not de fide, or articles of faith. They were of sufficient importance, however, in the eyes of the contending parties, to justify them in embroiling kingdoms, shedding of the blood of thousands, burning monasteries, desecrating churches, polluting the graves of saints, plundering villages, and breaking the sacred bond of unity and charity among Christians—nay, the Reformation itself is asserted by its bitterest opponents to have been the immediate consequence of one of these contests.

If, then, the infallibility of Rome is either too weak or too slow in its operation to settle such controversies as these, we may well ask, what great advantage has the Roman Church in the possession of such a power? If the infallible tribunal can only interfere in the last extremity, when an article of faith is at stake, and if it must sit still and allow all inferior controversies to grow and fester, until at length they attain to the degree of virulence which undermines the faith, it is surely not too much to say, that such a power, so limited in its exercise, but ill deserves the vaunting boasts of its zealous advocates. Nine out of ten of our most bitter controversies relate to subjects which are not de fide; and for these (by the showing of their own divines) we can look for no decision from Roman infallibility.

3. And yet there is one controversy still unsettled, which one would think ought to be regarded as of sufficient importance to be dealt with as fundamental; I mean the doctrine of infallibility itself. But upon this subject, all important as it is, the Roman infallible tribunal has as yet given no infallible decision. Divines are still in the dark, both as to the precise seat of the infallibility, and as to the occasions in which we are to look for or expect its interference. This, to say the least, is suspicious. Does the Roman Church really believe in her own pretended powers? Her infallible decisions (it would seem) are made for those only who refuse to receive them; but for her own children, for those who profess to believe in her infallibility, she decides nothing; not even in reference to the seat and nature of this very infallibility itself. They may have controversies amongst themselves as fierce and vehement, to say the least, as any that ever raged elsewhere; but no infallible decision is vouchsafed to calm their turbulence. If they are sound in the fundamentals of the faith, they can look for no help in minor matters, however important, from the infallible tribunal. The infallible judge meddles not with those questions which are not de fide. In other words, he speaks only for those who refuse to receive his decisions. He ministers no relief to the perplexities of his own children or subjects. Does Rome, then, really believe herself to be as infallible as her divines pretend?

4. One of the most important benefits to be looked for from the possession of an infallible guide in religion, to the members of the communion so privileged, would, doubtless, be a provision for infallible public instruction; the catechisms, the liturgical offices, and books of devotion, the sermons of such a communion will, certainly, we would say, be jealously guarded by the gift of infallibility, and nothing erroneous or unsound will be admitted into these mainsprings and fountain-heads of Christian life.

But when we come to examine the actual practice of the Church of Rome in these matters, we find that her supposed infallible tribunal gives her no advantage in this respect over other churches. Her catechisms are composed by fallible men, and are taught to her children by men as fallible. Her devotional offices, even the Breviary services appointed for the devotions of her priesthood, her very liturgy, ancient and venerable as it is, do not profess to have the sanction of the infallible authority. And the sermons, or public teaching of her clergy, are confessedly, like those of other communions, the private opinions of the individual preacher. What advantage, then, have the members of the Roman Church from the boasted infallibility of which they pretend to be the possessors? If an objection is made to some childish legend of the Breviary, if we detect a catechism in a manifest error, or a preacher in a palpable extravagance or falsification of some authority, we are at once told that the Church is not responsible; that the infallible tribunal has not spoken through any such medium. We ask, then, why has she not? If (as Roman doctors pretend) there be in this Church this power of detecting all error, why not cut off error at its source, by supplying the laity with infallible instruction? Does it not seem strange that a communion, possessing the high privilege of infallibility, should, in the instruction of her people, in her devotions, in her public teaching, be confessedly in no way more protected from human error and infirmity than we who have no such advantage? Either the infallible tribunal, of which she boasts, is unable to guard the laity from erroneous teaching—and in that case we may fairly doubt whether the possession of such infallibility is so great an advantage as its advocates pretend—or else the Roman Church, by her caution in this department of what would seem to be her duty, clearly betrays her secret unbelief in her pretended privilege. Rome does not really believe in her own infallibility.

5. This will be more evident if we look into the internal dissensions of that communion. We shall find, not only that the possession of a power of appeal to an infallible tribunal gives them no advantage whatsoever in calming the virulence of controversy; but that the contending parties, although both professing to believe themselves the subjects of an infallible judge, display no anxiety to obtain a final decision from him, but, on the contrary, make use of every artifice to delay or evade a sentence. The infallible tribunal itself also acts with the same caution which a synod or convocation of bishops pretending to no infallibility would naturally use, to bring matters to an amicable arrangement—leaving the question at first an open one; exhorting the belligerent parties to moderation and mutual forbearance; issuing carefully-worded decrees, nicely contrived to say as little as possible, and to give a triumph to neither party; in short, we find the same arts of prudence and policy resorted to, which other people are forced to employ, who have no prerogative of infallibility to sanction their decisions.

All this shows an inward consciousness on both sides that the boasted gift of infallibility must be used with caution, lest they who profess to submit to rather than to believe in it, should be driven to rebellion. In no part of the history of controversy within the Roman Church do we see her act, either in her head or in her members, with the bold confidence of faith in her own infallible power that we might reasonably have expected. She acts rather with the caution of a lawyer, who desires to keep up as long as possible the acquiescence of others in a legal fiction; and in this light there can be little doubt the claim of infallibility is practically regarded in the Roman communion; and contending parties avoid or delay a decision, because they know that such decision will not necessarily be the truth, although they know also that, whether true or false, they are bound to receive it as infallible.

CHALLENGE.

WHY DO THE IRISH PRIESTHOOD DECLINE PUBLIC DISCUSSIONS ON RELIGION?

INDIVIDUAL priests may not feel sufficient masters of the controversy, and, therefore, may reasonably decline, lest they should injure what they believe to be a good cause by weak advocacy. Others may decline, because they think that, even though the cause of truth might be advanced, the cause of Christian charity might be injured by the excitement of personal feelings almost inevitably connected with an oral discussion, in which the anxiety to gain a victory, or avoid a defeat, may drive men, even of a calm mind and temper, to use arguments of which they would in cooler moments be ashamed.

These motives we honour, and accept as fair grounds, and not mere excuses, for declining oral discussion.

The discussion which we propose and challenge, is one of a very different and, we believe, a wholly unexceptionable kind. It is, that any priest or bishop of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland or England (the more able and learned the better), shall, not orally, but in print, in our pages, come forward and discuss, in a spirit of candour and Christian kindness, the whole controversy, not hastily, but at full leisure. We do not ask the writers publicly to give their names; so that, if they fail, no personal disgrace will ensue, and their Church need not necessarily suffer; and there will, consequently, be the less temptation to lose temper, or use harsh language. All we require is, that Christian temper shall be preserved on both sides; and where authorities are cited, accurate references given to the volume, page, and exact edition, that time may not be lost in searching for the passages relied on. This we engage on our side to do.

Should this challenge be accepted in the spirit of fair play in which it is proposed, we cannot but think that there is some little chance of intelligent Irishmen being able to decide for themselves which party is in the right, whichever side truth may really be on. On our side, we pledge ourselves to insist on nothing but what we may be able to prove, and shall not assume anything to be dogmatically true or false, until we have laid our grounds for such opinion before the judgment of our Christian readers. With infidels we have nothing to do, and do not propose to write for such. Nor shall we discuss matters in which the Churches of Rome and England are agreed. We shall, therefore, deem the following propositions as admitted and indisputable:—

1st. That the Old and New Testaments are the inspired Word of God. [The authority of the Apocrypha will be, of course, a subject open to discussion.]

2nd. The Doctrine of the Holy Trinity.

3rd. The Divinity and Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ.

* "Tot vero translationum mutationes sine gravissimo periculo et incommodo non fieri. Nam non semper loventur idonei interpretes; atque in multi errores committerentur qui non possent postea facile tolli, cum neque Pontifices neque concilia de tot linguis judicare possint."—Bellarmin. De verbo Dei. lib. ii. c. 15, n. 93.

4th. That the Apostles,' Nicene, and Athanasian creeds are true expositions of Christian doctrine.

These doctrines being, as we believe, common ground on which the two churches are agreed, cannot be disputed in our pages.

What the Holy, Apostolic, Catholic Church consists of, will, of course, be a matter to be discussed, as also, in due time, each of the peculiar doctrines adopted by the Church of Rome, and disputed by that of England.

Should our challenge be declined, Catholic laymen cannot ascribe it to either of the grounds mentioned, and will, of course, be at liberty to draw their own conclusions as to the true reasons of such refusal; but we shall not the less steadily proceed to analyze the controversy, and show what has been said by the ablest writers on both sides, in as short and simple a manner as the subject will admit. Learned references and collateral matters we shall endeavour to keep distinct from the main body of the argument, that the train of thought and reasoning may be the better followed by any intelligent man, however previously uninstructed in such matters. To be useful, we must be clear and simple; and we think truth is always capable of being made so. To the learned, however, we shall, we hope, prove ourselves not unlearned, or unmindful of what is due to learning in others. Such matters as savour of mere erudition, or imply a deeper knowledge of the learned languages than ordinary men can be expected to possess, we shall endeavour to place in notes or appendixes, rather than embarrass the main thread of the argument with them. Thus we hope to afford acceptable aid, as well to the learned reader as to the humblest Catholic Christian who is able to read the simple truth, on which his eternal salvation must depend.

SHALL ROME HAVE THE EXCLUSIVE CONTROL OF EDUCATION?

SHALL Rome and her priesthood have the exclusive control and direction of education? For three centuries this has been the great controversy of Rome with the nations of Europe. To this end the Inquisition was established; the Society of Jesus was organized and disciplined; the Edict of Nantes was revoked. Silenced for a time by the French Revolution, and the wars consequent on that great convulsion, the same controversy has arisen again in our day, and the struggle has been renewed in every country in Europe. Rome and her priests say, that the preservation of social order, the existence of society itself, is involved in the submission of men's will and reason to their guidance and control. We, on the other hand, assert, that to stay by such means the progress of human intellect, to curb and fetter the minds of men, can be compared only to the attempt of the foolish parent, who hopes that by entire seclusion from the world, the child will escape its temptations and passions. The child becomes a man—a new and strange world, full of glittering baubles and delusive pleasures, bursts upon him unwarned and unprepared, and the suppressed volcano of his passions at once breaks out and destroys him. We say, that to prepare the mind for future conflicts and temptations, it is better to let youth traverse every field of knowledge. Let the reason be strengthened; it is the instrument which God has bestowed upon all to enable us to judge between good and evil; and to distrust its power is to reject and put to open scorn the gift of God. And, above all, we say, that to that reason of man, exercised and disciplined, must be submitted whatsoever claims to regulate his principles and control his actions. That this free, unfettered exercise of man's reason can alone secure social order, we appeal to all history to prove. Go back through the history of Europe for the last three centuries, and see if it does not teach us that every country where Rome and her priesthood have completely obtained the exclusive control of education, has not only lost that position in the great European commonwealth once enjoyed, but has become a by-word of past greatness and present degradation. Whilst, on the other hand, with inferior advantages, those countries where the Bible was free, and education was unfettered, have progressed continually in power, and in the arts and sciences. To illustrate this is our present object.

It is hardly necessary here to repeat what every student knows, that, down to the fifteenth century, the question of priestly control over education could hardly be said to have arisen. In point of fact, during the preceding ages, all knowledge was confined to the clergy. They alone had leisure and opportunity to master even the elements of learning. The close of the fifteenth century saw all this changed. The discovery of a new world enlarged the bounds of knowledge; and the invention of printing secured the spread and circulation of it. Then came the great burst of human intellect. The European nations, at one bound, seemed to have passed from childhood to manhood; and this was not confined to one or two, but extended to all.

First in this great race undoubtedly was Italy. There the light of literature had never been wholly extinguished; but the age of Leo X. saw Italy adorned with learned men; with warriors and statesmen; with the greatest painters and sculptors of modern times. Nor was the pre-eminence confined merely to the arts and sciences; her courts were the resort of the learned men of Europe; to her great universities, Padua and Bologna, flocked the most distinguished students from every country; her cities were the most prosperous and flourishing in Europe; an extensive commerce had made her merchants princes, and enabled the small republics of Genoa and Venice to cope with the most powerful monarchies. Such was Italy in the fifteenth century.

At first, Rome, not perceiving the consequences that would result from the general spread of literature and education, encouraged and aided its progress; but soon the Reformation startled her from her security. Then she saw that education and knowledge endangered her supremacy; and to meet the coming danger, the Jesuits were organized by Loyola, and sanctioned by Rome. To obtain complete control over the education of all, and to bind and subjugate the intellects of men into entire submission to Rome, was the great and paramount object of that society; and in Italy they succeeded. For three hundred years the whole education of the Italian mind has been entrusted by Rome to the Jesuits and the priesthood. For three hundred years every channel of knowledge and learning has been closed, except such as the Jesuits and priests have permitted to remain open. That such is, and has been the case, we would refer to the following passage in Farini's History (vol. I., p. 152). When speaking of the mode of government at Rome, he says—"The Sacred Congregation of Studies, composed of cardinals and of prelates, regulate public education at its discretion. The bishop is the director of instruction in each diocese; the rural dean in each municipality; and in each parish, the incumbent. It is forbidden to any one to teach publicly or privately without the license of the Sacred Congregation, or the approval of the bishop; he, too, presides at the examinations, and frames or approves schemes, regulations, and books for all schools. Every teacher is either actually chosen, or else approved by him, or by the Sacred Congregation; ecclesiastics are always preferred to laymen. In Rome the Jesuit Fathers are the sole educators of youth, and in other places they get the preference. It is forbidden to teach political economy; the studies of medicine and jurisprudence jejune and defective. In Bologna there was a school of music; but scientific academies, and those of arts and literature, were all under the control of the Sacred Congregation of Studies. Letters, impoverished by the censorship, and by empty academic insipidities, yielded fruit worth little to the taste and nothing for nourishment. The press was subject to a three-fold censorship—namely, to the Holy Office, by the bishops, and the government."

The above extract represents not merely what is the present position of education in the Papal States, but also what it has been for three centuries, both there and in the rest of Italy. And what has been the result? If exclusive control over education by the Romish priesthood does tend to promote true liberty, to advance the well-being of society, and secure from taint and corruption the morals of the people, what nation in Europe should present such a picture of moral elevation, happiness, and liberty as Italy, and, above all, the Papal States? And what is the case? Without commerce, without literature; her cities, many of them almost deserted; the grass growing in the streets of Ferrara and Bologna. Bologna, which, in the 14th century, could reckon up her 13,000 students, now scarcely numbers as many hundreds; her courts of justice sinks of corruption; her native sovereigns retaining the forced allegiance of their subjects by the sword, or by the aid of foreign bayonets. Such is the present political aspect of that once flourishing country. Nor does the moral condition of its people present a more favourable subject for contemplation. Niebuhr, the historian, who, as a diplomatic agent for the King of Prussia, resided for several years at Rome, thus speaks of the Italians in 1820:—"The Italians, as a nation, are walking dead men. True, we must deplore and not hate them; for unavoidable misfortunes have plunged them in their degradation, but the degradation is no less certain. Intellect and knowledge, any idea which makes the heart throb, all generous activity is vanished from the land. All hope, all aspiration, all effort, even all cheerfulness, for I have never seen a more cheerless nation."

Dr. Arnold, also, who visited Italy in 1840, thus speaks of them:—"Certainly I do greatly prefer France to Italy, Frenchmen to Italians; for a lying people, which these emphatically are, stink in one's moral nose all the day long. Good and sensible men, no doubt, there are here in abundance; but no nation presents so bad a side to the traveller as this. For, whilst we do not see its domestic life and its private fruits and charity, the infinite vileness of its public officers, the gross ignorance and the utter falsehood of those who must come in your way are a constant annoyance. When you see a soldier here, you feel no confidence that he can fight. When you see a so-called man of letters, you are not sure that he has more knowledge than a baby. When you see a priest, he may be a devotee or an unbeliever. When you see a judge or a public functionary, justice and integrity may be utter strangers to his vocabulary. It is this which makes a nation vile, whose profession, whether Godward or manward, is no security for performance. Now, in England we know that every soldier will fight, and every public functionary will be honest, and though many of our clergy may be enthusiasts, yet we feel sure that none is an unbeliever."

And again, speaking of the Papal government, he says:—"It is impossible not to be sickened with a government such as this, which discharges no one function decently. The ignorance of the people is prodigious. How can it be otherwise? The bookselling shops sad to behold. The very opposite of that scribe instructed in the kingdom of God, who was to bring out of his treasures things new and old. These scribes bring out of their treasures nothing but the mere rubbish of the past and present. I could muse long and deeply on the state of this country. Neither do I see, humanly speaking, one gleam of hope. If one evil spirit be cast out, there are but seven others yet more evil, if it may be, ready to enter. Wherefore, I have no sympathy with the so-called liberal party. They are but types of the counter evil of Newmanism. For Newmanism leads to Socialism and Socialism leads to Newmanism, the eternal oscillations of the drunken mima. The varying vices and vileness of the slave, and the slave broke loose; half of our virtue is gone, says Homer, when a man becomes a slave; and the other half goes, when he becomes a slave broken loose."

Such were the observations on the Italians of the present day by two of the most distinguished men who have visited that country in the present century. That the picture thus drawn is not a harsh or unjust one, we think will appear abundantly, when we cite the observations of a distinguished native writer of the present day. Farini, himself an Italian, and, as is evident from his book, a sincere member of the Roman Catholic Church, in page 72 of his work, after speaking of the establishment, by the Papal government, of certain bodies called centurions and Pontifical volunteers, proceeds thus—

"These centurions and volunteers obtained their recruits amidst the meanest and most criminal of the people. They had the privilege of carrying arms; were exempt from certain taxes, and were influenced by fanaticism, not merely political, but also religious, because certain bishops and priests enrolled and instructed them. In some towns they domineered with brutal ferocity; at Faenza, particularly, they scoured the places, in arms to the teeth, like a horde of savages in a conquered country; the police was in their hands, so that they practised insolence and excess with impunity. The country people and servants resisted their masters; they avenged the wrongs of the government, those of religion, those of their sect, and of every member of it; and they lighted up in Romagna a very hell of frantic passions. I have already told, and I sorrowfully repeat it, how the liberal sects of Romagna had begun, at an early date, to imbrue their hands in the blood of their opponents. The example was fatal; blood brought forth blood. The liberals had treacherously shed it, under the pretext of freedom and patriotism; the centurions were greedy of it for the honour of Mary, and of the vicar of Christ. Oh, may it please the mercy of God, that all parties may imbibe the persuasion that no enormity is necessary or advantageous to the cause of nations, of the masses, or of governments."

Such is the picture, given by a native writer, of the proceedings and conduct of the contending factions in the Papal States.

Again, in another passage, speaking of the government, he says, page 75—

"The Pontifical government seemed to bind bad and good in the same bundle; they said they wished to separate the chaff from the corn, but they trampled all without judgment or charity. The judicial department was not rectified, according to promise; codes were not published; an ill-patched penal statute was enacted, in which were merciless punishments for the crimes which were called treasonable, or which might be so construed. There exists a circular of Cardinal Bernetti, in which he orders the judges, in the case of liberals charged with ordinary offences or crimes, invariably to inflict the severest punishment. The judges seconded all this fierce passion, if they were of the same faction, or else did so from fear or venality. The police were all factious in some places; and an agent of police caused more alarm among the inhabitants than a highwayman. They would not let the liberals indulge in shooting, or in any other amusement; they refused them passports, pried into their families, and used force against their domiciles and persons with incessant and minute searches. Meanwhile, the administration of the public revenues remained as of old—without method, and without credit; trade, industry, and instruction suffered not only neglect, but discouragement and deterioration."

Such is the government, and such are the governed, in the States of the Church—the government, a government by Pope, cardinals, and bishops; the governed, the people who, themselves and their fathers, have been exclusively educated and brought up, from childhood, by the Sacred Congregation of Cardinals and Bishops, and by the Jesuit fathers and teachers.

Now, we ask Roman Catholic laymen, does the picture presented by the foregoing extracts hold out any inducement to yield to the claims of Rome's priesthood? Does not the present state of Rome, and of Italy, loudly protest against their pretensions? Will it be said that political causes have produced these results? That Austrian rule has paralyzed the intellect, and destroyed the energies of Italy? That might, indeed, account for the condition of northern Italy; but how can it apply to the Papal States? There, at least, for the last three centuries, Italians have held undisputed sway; not a single foreign Pontiff ever has filled the chair of St. Peter during that period. Will it be said that it is unfavourably situated? A country lying between two great seas, the very centre of civilized Europe; the resort of travellers from every other land, with a fertile soil, and the most favoured climate. Will it be said that its climate and soil are unfavourable to the growth of manly virtue, energy, and enterprise? All antiquity proclaims the contrary. To what, then, shall we ascribe its condition? We say that it is the natural result of that exclusive priestly control over education which is now sought to be forced upon this country: we say that the degradation produced by the slavery of the body is as nothing, compared to the degradation resulting from the slavery of the mind; that there can be no love of truth, where man is forbidden to inquire what is truth; that to prohibit the exercise of man's reason in the higher things relating to "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come," is to leave him, in all things, to the uncontrolled dominion of the passions and appetites of his lower nature. The priests of Rome, the priests of Bramah, and the priests of Mahommed, all require the will of man, in spiritual matters, to be subjected, without inquiry and without proof, to their rule and governance; but God says, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." He does not require us to hold fast even that which is good, until we have first proved it; he does not demand our assent to the truths of the Gospel, unless that assent be grounded on and evidenced by reason. Shall we obey God or man? England, and England's Church, long since proclaimed the truth, that that faith is worthless which does not recommend itself to man's reason; that the same God who has given revelation has also endowed man with reason; and, therefore, to suffer it to be opposed to faith would be to make God a liar. Has England suffered by this appeal to reason? Is truth less regarded? Is justice less purely administered? Is morality more endangered? Is the social structure less firm? Has England's progress in arms, in arts, and sciences been retarded? Does the contrast between her present condition, and that of Rome and Italy, afford no subject for deep and earnest thought to every unprejudiced mind? If history be something more than an old almanac—if she be, indeed, philosophy teaching by examples—does she not teach us, by the example of every European nation, that a free Bible, and an unfettered education, are the only sure and solid foundations on which can rest social order, morality, and religion?

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR JANUARY.

(Extracted from the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

Winter is far from being a season of inactivity with the farmer. It is during this season that he is engaged in turning to account the results of his labours throughout the rest of the year. His cattle, sheep, and other descriptions of stock are feeding on the roots and hay which he had provided for them, and the produce of his grain crops are being prepared for and taken to market. Besides this, there are certain preparatory operations to be performed, with a view to the coming labours of the spring. Stubble fields have to be ploughed for green crops, and grass fields for grain. We refer, of course, to the well-regulated farm. On too many farms we find that "the dead months" of the year are too truly so, not only as regards the processes of vegetation, but also in so far as the operations of the farm are concerned. The lands which had borne crops of grain during the preceding summer are allowed to remain in the same state as they were at the removal of the crops, hardened by the rains and by the continued tramping of the cattle, for whose use no store of roots had been provided. We trust, however, that the day is not far distant when such ruinous and unskilful practices shall become unknown in our island, and when the great and important trade of farming will be thoroughly understood by all who are engaged in it.

Ploughing Stubbles.—Although we refer to this operation at the present time, it must not be inferred that it may be delayed until this month. This should commence at a much earlier period, say in November; but as these remarks may be read by parties who have not done so at the proper time, we introduce them here. The ploughing of the stubbles, where a proper rotation of crops is followed, is preparatory to the culture of the pulse crops—beans, peas, and vetches; and of the green crops—turnips, carrots, and mangel-wurzel. On soils suited for bean culture, the portion of land intended for this crop must be ploughed first, at which time farm manure is applied and ploughed down. By so doing, a great amount of labour is saved at a period when every dry hour is precious for getting the seed deposited, where, perhaps, the season might be entirely lost if the manure was not applied until the time of sowing. Land upon which peas or vetches are to be grown ought also to be ploughed early, and may or may not be manured at this season; because the former is usually grown without much or any manure, and the latter being sown at intervals, may be manured afterwards. That part of the stubble land intended for potatoes and green crops, is next to be ploughed. The practice of manuring on the stubbles (previous to ploughing) for these crops, is followed by many farmers, and we believe that on strong soils it may be done with success, particularly where potatoes or carrots are to be grown; because in strong soils, naturally or artificially dry, the manure will not be carried away by the rains, which would be the case in light or open soils; and it is well known that potatoes are more liable to disease when planted among recently-made manure, than when planted on land which had been manured some time previously. For carrots, it is essentially necessary that the manure be ploughed in. There is one great advantage gained by ploughing in manure on lands suitable for so doing—namely, the preservation of those fertilizing parts of it which decompose and are lost, during its exposure in the yards and dung-heaps, but which are preserved in the soil.

All stubble ploughing ought to be deep, certainly not less than seven inches, and, if possible, ten inches. To turn over the latter-mentioned depth, it will be necessary to yoke three horses in the plough. Shallow ploughing is useless; and good after-crops can never be raised when this practice is followed.

The object of ploughing land for green crops at an early season is chiefly the benefit derived from exposure of the soil to the action of the frost and air, and to keep the land dry, by affording the rain an easy bed to percolate through; in consequence of this, the land becomes much more easily worked afterwards, weeds and insects are partially destroyed, and altogether it is too important an operation to be delayed beyond the beginning of this month. Winter ploughing ought never be done when the land is in a wet state, or when snow is lying. If done when in this state the benefit of ploughing is lost, the land becomes like mortar, it retains the water, and hardens so as to render the after culture much more difficult.

Ploughing Leas.—All grass lands intended to be cropped with oats ought to be ploughed early this month, if not before, commencing with the older and tougher leas. By doing so at this time, a much better covering for the seed is obtained than if the ploughing was deferred to a later period. Exposure to frost and air is also, in this case, the means by which this result is obtained. The proper size of furrow for leas is from eight to nine inches wide, by five to six inches deep. In all winter ploughing, care must be taken that surface water is not allowed to lie on the land. This will scarcely be the case on thorough-drained lands; still it is as well to prevent the possibility of water lodging on the surface, by cutting small gripes in different parts across the head ridges, and through any hollows, so that any excess of surface water may be carried quickly off into the nearest drain or ditch.

Every farmer is aware that much time is lost in ploughing short ridges; and it is, therefore, a matter of some importance that, in laying off fields, these should be as long as the general size and arrangements of the farm will admit. The following table is interesting, as it shows the comparative amount of time lost in ploughing long and short ridges. We extract this table from "Stephens's Book of the Farm"—a work from which much useful practical information will be derived:—

Ridges.	Length of ridge.	Time taken to plough one Stat. acre.	Loss of time.	Gain of time.
		h. m.	h. m.	h. m.
No. 1	78 yds.	11 53	1 53	0 0
„ 2	86 „	12 16	2 16	0 0
„ 3	112 „	10 35	0 35	0 0
„ 4	118 „	9 31	0 0	0 29
„ 5	170 „	10 15	0 15	0 0

The standard of ploughing in this trial was taken at 4,840 square yards, or one statute acre in ten hours. This is one instance out of many which could be brought forward, as showing the necessity of paying attention to what may appear to be trifles, so that expenditure in time and labour may be saved.

Spade Husbandry.—It is evident that the foregoing directions for winter ploughing are only applicable to those who have a sufficient number of stout horses to do the work properly. This the small farmer does not possess; and, indeed, in the case of small farmers generally, the possession of a horse is a great evil. It induces him to scratch over his land, rather than to give it the necessary deep ploughing, because he has not the means of working it properly; and besides this, as the horse must be maintained some way or other, it is too often the case that this is done out of what ought to be used by the family. From inability to keep them in working order, we always find horses belonging to the smaller classes of farmers to be most wretched animals, unable to drag themselves along, much less to assist in cultivating the land in a proper manner. If a beast be required by a small farmer, we would prefer using a bullock; for he can be more easily kept than a horse, will do his work as efficiently, and, when not required, can be fattened and sold, whereas the old, worn-out horse is totally worthless. For the small farmer, however, the most efficient mode of culture is by means of the spade. This simple instrument can be used under all circumstances, costs nothing for its keep, and, when properly used, is a much more efficient one in the culture of the soil than the best-appointed plough. The great importance of spade husbandry, and its complete adaptation to the case of the small farmers of Ireland, are only now beginning to be fully recognised. In allotting the size of farms, we think that they ought to be either of such a size as can be conveniently cultivated under a proper rotation of crops, by means of the spade—say five Irish acres—or that they shall be sufficiently large to give at least one pair of stout horses ample employment. There should not be any medium; for such would only cause the occupier to keep one, or, perhaps, two worthless animals, and the cultivation of such farms can never be so perfect as those cultivated entirely by spade labour, or by proper draught horses.

Manure-making.—As the cattle are housed at this period of the year, the accumulation of manure is, of course, one point to which the attention of the farmer is directed. The site of the dung-pit ought to be as convenient as possible to the cow-house and stables; and the best form is, when slightly concave or hollow, with a gentle slope to a certain point at one end. The bottom must be paved, and if the dung-pit be large, there ought to be shallow centre and cross channels, so as to permit the liquid drainings to flow towards the latter point, at which a covered reservoir or tank, for receiving these drainings, will be constructed. If the subsoil be porous, the site of the dung-pit must be properly puddled with clay previous to being paved, otherwise the liquid will escape through the soil, instead of being conveyed to the tank. The dung-pit ought to be enclosed by a wall, four or five feet high, having a gate at one end, in order to allow carts to pass in and out. Before any dung is put into the pit, the bottom ought to be covered with a layer of earth or bog-stuff, a foot or eighteen inches deep, and with weeds cut before seeding, potato haulms, or any other refuse; this will soon become a mass of rich manure. The different kinds of manure—the horse, cow, and pig dung—will then be laid equally over the whole surface, taking care that all be properly intermixed; and to facilitate this, planks should be laid in different directions, over the dung, so that there may not be any accumulation of one particular kind of manure in any one part more than in another. As the dung accumulates, a light layer of earth should be laid over all; and when this is regularly done, it will improve the quality of the heap, by preventing the escape of ammonia and other gases during the progress of fermentation, and also add to its bulk, becoming itself invaluable manure. During cold weather fermentation does not proceed so rapidly as it does at a later period of the season; still, as there is always more or less going on, it is as well to guard against loss. Sprinkling the surface occasionally with peat charcoal will also prevent undue fermentation and fix the ammonia, which will otherwise be constantly escaping. As the liquid accumulates in the tank, it may be taken out and poured over the dung, which it will not only greatly enrich, but cause it also to decompose equally, and thus burning, or fire fanging, as it is termed, will be prevented.

During frosty weather, the dung which has accumulated in the farm-yard ought to be carted out to the fields to which it is intended to be applied, and there made up into oblong heaps on the upper hedge ridges.

The reasons why this ought to be done are—first, the manure can be more readily brought into a proper state of decomposition in the field than in the farm-yard, by being turned, as shall be afterwards described; and next, because the getting in of the crops can be more readily carried on when the manure-heap is in the field than if it was at some distance. This is a point, however, which we find but little attended to. The manure is allowed to lie in the farm-yard until required, and then it is either insufficiently rotted, or has become burned up, and much valuable time is lost in conveying it to the field where it is wanted. For certain crops—such as beans, potatoes, and carrots—fresh dung may be carried and spread at once before the stubbles are ploughed; but when intended for mangel-wurzel or turnips, it ought to be made into the oblong heaps we have mentioned. The manner of forming these heaps is as follows:—The intended site being fixed upon, let a layer of earth be laid down, of the breadth and length which it is intended to make the heap; or, if the land has been previously ploughed, let the bottom be levelled and broken by the spade; on this let the dung be laid down, the carts, coming in at one end, depositing their loads, and passing off at the other end, and proceeding in this manner until the whole is finished. As both ends of the heap will be sloping, it will be neeessary to make them up to the same height as the rest of the heap, by cutting the ends across at the required distance, and throwing the outer ends on top; when this is done, finish by putting a layer of earth all over the top. If it should happen that the whole heap cannot be finished at once, but that there are intervals between the different times when the dung is drawn out, then a layer of earth must be laid over the dung-heap each time the drawing is finished. During the time that the dung is being drawn out, great care must be taken that it is spread equally and not allowed to lie in lumps, and that the heap is made up as neatly as possible. When dung is not drawn out until late in spring, say within a month or six weeks of its being required, then the carts must not be allowed to travel over the heap; but the manure ought to be made up loosely, so that its fermentation may be hastened, whereas, if the carts were drawn over it, this would be considerably retarded.

Compost-heaps.—The materials for making compost-heaps may be brought forward at any spare time throughout the year; but as this is closely allied to the subject of the preceding paragraph, we shall now refer to it. The best material for mixing with farm-yard manure is peat or bog-earth; old turf fences also answer well; but wherever bog-stuff can be got, advantage ought to be taken of it to form compost-heaps, and thus to increase the manure store. The proper proportions are two-thirds of bog-earth to one-third of farm-yard dung. Let the bottom of the heap be bog-earth; upon this put a layer of manure, then another of earth, and so on till the heap is four or five feet high, covering all with earth. In a short time the mass will begin to heat, and after it has done so it may be turned and the materials carefully mixed, finishing, as at first, with a layer of earth. By saturating the heap occasionally with liquid manure from the tank, its value will be greatly increased. If a heap of earth be laid down convenient to the houses, and all house slops—such as soap-suds, &c.—poured regularly over it, a mass of valuable manure will soon be obtained.

Liquid-manure Tanks.—On small farms a sufficiently large tank may be made of a tight butt, containing 150 gallons, or, if one be insufficient, two of these butts may be set close to each other. Let a hole be dug two and a half feet deeper than the depth of the cask, and at least 18 inches wider; the bottom of the hole must be laid with a layer of properly-prepared puddled clay, ten or twelve inches thick; upon this set the cask, and then have puddle closely rammed in around the sides; the upper edge of the cask will then be eighteen or twenty inches below the surface, a sufficient depth to allow room for a covered drain for conveying the urine into the tank from the gutter behind the cows. A rough but strong covering of wooden slabs being laid over the top of the cask, a tank will be constructed which will last for several years, and contain all the liquid manure likely to be preserved at one time on a small farm. In the case of more extensive establishments, especially where the system of house-feeding is closely followed, larger tanks will be required, the sides of which will be formed of brick or stones set in mortar, and joined with cement, and carefully puddled behind each course; the sole may be either pavement or bricks laid on puddle, and the best cover is an arch; the width of the tank should not exceed six feet, for, if much wider, the arched cover will be expensive. As a regular part of the homestead, a tank should never be omitted; for there is no part of the establishment which will repay the outlay sooner.

Some modes of using liquid manure have been already mentioned, such as its application to the manure in the yard and to compost-heaps; it may also be applied as a watering to grass, whether pasture or when cut for soiling, and also to land in preparation for green crops, and its effects in either of these modes are often truly surprising. The quantity to be given to each Irish acre may be from 1,500 to 2,300 gallons.

Liquid-manure carts have been constructed in the form of a square or oblong wooden cistern, mounted on wheels; but the simplest and cheapest cart for this purpose is a common oil-cask, containing 120 gallons, fixed on the shafts and wheels of an ordinary cart, and having a long box, perforated with holes, attached behind. The liquid is pumped out of the tank, and enters the cask by a bung hole on the top, where there is also a funnel attached, and it flows into the trough behind, through a hole in the lower part of the back end of the cask; this hole is provided with a large spigot or a simple bung of wood. The more expensive watering-carts are furnished with an apparatus for regulating the discharge; but the simple wooden trough may be made to serve the same purpose, merely by closing up a few of the holes, should the discharge be considered too great; and when the contents of the cask is known, it is an easy matter apportioning the quantity to be given to an acre. The amount will be greater or less according to the speed of the horse, and this must be attended to; but if the horse be not pushed beyond his step, it will be found that very little difference will arise from this cause. On very small farms, where manual labour was the only means of cultivation, we have seen a small cask, mounted on a wheel-barrow frame, answering all the purposes required.

Grass Lands, intended for meadow, should be cleared early in the month of all stock, the top dressing finished, and, when thoroughly dry, bush-harrowed, cleaned, and rolled; draining finished, and the land shut up to rest.

Irrigation.—Attend to the water-meadows, and clear away all obstructions of dead leaves, silt, and other deposits, so that the water may run freely and not remain stagnant on any part. Correct the levels when necessary; and, in case of severe frost, let the water run unchanged, which will prevent the young blade from being burned up; but if the weather continues mild, change the water every third day from quarter to quarter, if there be not sufficient to cover the entire breadth at the same time. The best guide is to let off the water as soon as a scum arises, which is a good indication that the land is saturated sufficiently for the time.

Fatting Stock.—As the cattle in the stalls progress, improve the quality of the food, by giving oil-cake, barley meal, and bruised oats. Those put up early, and in good condition, will soon be fit for the butcher, and should be sold off.

Fatting Wedders, whether in the sheds or on the pastures, must not be allowed too much turnips, but should get a liberal supply of cake or meal, and good hay; turnips are cold and succulent, and, if much frosted, are injurious, causing diarrhœa and dropsical affections.

In-calf Cows, and Ewes with Lamb, should be treated so as to keep them in vigorous health, by giving moderate, yet sufficient quantities of roots and good hay, so as to avoid the extremes of being too fat or too thin. As they approach the period of casting their young, an additional quantity of succulent food should be given, yet cautiously, to promote the secretion of milk, and improve their condition.

Store Stock should not be stinted, but have a liberal supply of nourishing food, as well to keep them in fair condition as promote their growth. Keeping growing stock on short allowance will be found the least economical in the end.

General Remarks.—When not otherwise engaged, this is a good season to employ men in removing old, useless, earthen fences; and if the materials are not required, for the purpose of forming compost-heaps, as directed, they may be spread over the adjoining fields, which will be improved by thus deepening the soil. It is astonishing the great extent of valuable land which is taken up in this country with these fences: they are absolutely of no use whatever—they harbour vermin, and prove an unmolested nursery of weeds, and they take up land for which rent must be paid. When a system of house-feeding is closely followed, there are no fences required except the boundary, which may be a ground hedge, taking up very little space. In the present times, when every foot of land must be made fully productive, these abominations must be done away with.

DOES THE CHURCH OF ROME ALLOW OR PREVENT THE FREE USE OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES?

In the last epistle written by St. Paul to his faithful friend Timothy, a short time before his martyrdom, when, as learned men have stated, he was confined in prison at Rome by the cruel Emperor Nero, it is interesting to remark one of the grounds of the unwavering hope and confidence which filled the mind of the Apostle, amidst his own sufferings and the prospect of approaching death. I am in prison (he informs him), and can now preach the message of salvation no longer. They have bound me in chains, and may put me to death, but the Word of God they cannot bind. "I labour even unto bands, as an evil-doer; BUT THE WORD OF GOD IS NOT BOUND."*

The Word of God was free! This thought consoled the mind of St. Paul, during the closing hours of this life, in which he had toiled so much to spread the knowledge of the Gospel. What has the Church of Rome done to fulfil this desire of the Apostle's heart? She has given many proofs of her reverence and regard for St. Paul. She has enrolled his name in the Calendar. She has built a magnificent church outside the walls of Rome, which is called by his name; but what has she done to circulate the epistles which he wrote, and other parts of Holy Scripture? Does the Church of Rome treat the Word of God as the Emperor Nero treated St. Paul himself? Does she throw it into prison, as it were, and place it under lock and key; or does she send it forth freely among her people? Do her bishops and clergy encourage their flocks, both by precept and example, to read and study the Bible; or do they forbid this practice as dangerous, and denounce it as heretical?

It is needless for us to dwell on the importance of this question. Every Christian layman, whether a member of the Church of Rome or not, will wish to learn, upon trustworthy authorities, how this matter really stands. If it can be shown that Fathers, and Councils, and Popes have not only sanctioned, but recommended the reading of God's Word, the Roman Catholic layman will, doubtless, gladly avail himself of this privilege, and owe us a debt of gratitude for the removal of his doubts and scruples; while Protestants, on the other hand, may, perhaps, find cause to modify the opinions which they entertain, regarding the Church of Rome, on this point; and they will see the necessity of careful inquiry, before they speak of her as being, at all times, an uncompromising enemy of the circulation of the Word of God.

For it cannot be denied that the great majority of Protestants do believe that the Church of Rome is justly liable to the charge of forbidding the laity to read the Scriptures—and a number of facts have been often brought forward, which seem to make the imputation very probable. "Is it not stated," they say, "in the fourth rule of the Trent Expurgatory Index, that if the Holy Bible be promiscuously circulated in the vulgar tongue, more loss than profit will thence arise, by reason of the rashness of men? Does not the fifth rule of the Spanish Index prohibit the Bible in the vulgar tongue, whether in whole or in part, whether in print or manuscript? Was not an Italian nobleman, Count Guiccardini, thrown into prison in Florence on the 7th of May last year, his only offence being that he had read the 10th chapter of St. John's Gospel to his friends? And, to come home to our own country, was it not given in evidence before the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry, not many years since, that in many parts of Connaught the peasant does not know what a Bible or Testament is?* And, to crown all, have not Bibles been more than once burned by the priests, in various parts of Ireland?"

Now, we do not undertake to decide upon the truth or falsehood of these various charges. For the present, we will say nothing about the state of Spain or Italy. Our object is, to ascertain what are the rights of the Roman Catholic laity in Ireland. If, as we shall presently show, Popes and Bishops have recommended the reading of the Scriptures, the burning of Bibles by a priest may prove him to be a very foolish and wrong-headed man, but it ought not to deprive the laity of their just rights. If the state of Connaught was as bad as was represented before the Education Commissioners, we may, doubtless, conclude that the priests in Connaught neglected their duty; but that is no reason why the Roman Catholic laity of Connaught should always be kept in the same state of spiritual darkness. We now proceed with our extracts.

In the first page of the Douay Bible, published with the express sanction of Doctor Denvir, Roman Catholic Bishop of Down and Connor, we find the following words, taken from a letter of Pope Pius VI. to Archbishop Martini:—"You judge exceedingly well that the faithful should be excited to the reading of the Holy Scriptures; for these are the most abundant sources, which ought to be left open to every one, to draw from them purity of morals and of doctrine, to eradicate the errors which are so widely disseminated in these corrupt times. This you have seasonably effected, as you declare, by publishing the Sacred Writings in the language of your country, suitable to every one's capacity, especially when you show and set forth that you have added explanatory notes, which, being extracted from the Holy Fathers, preclude every possible danger of abuse." As regards the explanatory notes added to the Douay version, we shall have a word or two to say hereafter; but with this exception, we beg to express our entire and hearty concurrence in the sentiments of Pope Pius VI., so clearly and ably stated in the foregoing extract. We honour the Pope for his frank and candid acknowledgment that the Bible ought to be left open to every one in his native tongue. The laity, according to Pius VI., ought not only to be permitted to read the Scriptures, but excited and admonished to read them. It is clear, therefore, that any Roman Catholic priest who does not exhort his flock to study the Bible neglects his duty, in the opinion of Pius VI.; and we can well imagine the severity of his censure against any priest who, by threats, or otherwise, would endeavour to deter and hinder his people from reading God's Holy Word. If the Pope's words can ever be supposed to possess authority, we ought surely to consider that his directions to one of his Archbishops, upon an important question, affecting the faith and conduct of his flock, must carry the very greatest weight; and we, therefore, consider that the declaration of Pius VI., which we have quoted above, should be almost decisive of the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this matter.

But Pius VI. is not our only authority. We can prove that the ancient Church of Rome held the same sentiments. In the sixth century, Pope Gregory the Great, one of the most eminent bishops who ever occupied the See of Rome, thus exhorts his hearers in a popular sermon—"Study, most dear brethren, the words of God. Do not despise the letters our Maker hath sent us. This is a great advantage that by them the soul is quickened, lest it should be benumbed with the cold of its iniquity. When we there see that just men have done valiantly, we ourselves are disposed to courage in well-doing. The soul of the reader is enkindled by the flame of holy examples."† And again, "All our defence is contained in the Sacred Oracles; for there are the commandments of God—there are the examples of just men. If the soul grow cold in the love of God, let it hear what is said: 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.'" And again, in another passage,‡ "The Holy Scripture, as a kind of looking-glass, is set before the eyes of our mind, that our inward face may be seen by it. By it we know what in us is foul, and what is fair; by it we perceive how much we profit; by it how far we are from profiting. It declares the brave exploits of the saints, and provokes the weak to the imitation of them: and while it commemorates their victorious acts, it confirms and strengthens our weakness against the assaults of vice, and we are the less fearful in encounter, by seeing the foregoing triumphs of so many valiant men. But sometimes it sets before us not only their virtues, but their falls, that in the victory of the strong we may find that which we ought to imitate, and again, in their falls, that which we ought to fear." We may now appeal to Roman Catholics themselves, whether this great Pope did not think it fit that the reading of the Holy Scriptures should be left free to every man. What would he have said to the priests of Connaught, who allowed their people to grow up in ignorance of both Bible and Testament—or to those who told their flocks, that "if they read the Bible, or took it into their houses, they should be damned—that the devil was in the Bible?"* It is clear that either the Pope or the priests must be in the wrong; and we, for our part, prefer to range ourselves on the Pope's side.

† Tom. i., col. 1,337. Paris, 1705. We beg to remind our readers of the promise we gave in our first number, that we would always give exact references to the page, volume, and edition of ancient authors—a practice to which we request all our correspondents steadily to adhere. Without some such precaution, the citation of ancient authorities in controversy becomes almost valueless, from the difficulty of verifying the reference, so as to ascertain whether the quotation is or is not accurate.

But we have yet further evidence. Every Roman Catholic priest, at his ordination, binds himself to follow the unanimous consent of the Fathers, in the interpretation of Scripture. Now, we fearlessly assert that there is scarcely any question upon which the ancient Fathers are so unanimous as upon this, that it is the right and duty of every man to read the Word of God. At present we have only room for two or three short extracts; but we hope, in a future number, to afford our readers an opportunity of abundantly satisfying their minds on this matter.

To begin with S. Clement, who was Bishop of Rome at the close of the first century. In his epistle, directed to all the Christians at Corinth, he writes—"You have known, beloved, you have well known the Holy Scriptures; you have thoroughly looked into the oracles of God."† If the Christians at Corinth were so conversant in the Scriptures, surely the Christians of Rome, in the time of this bishop, were not forbidden to read them.

We next appeal to Origen, from whom it will be sufficient at present to produce one passage—"We beseech you not to content yourselves with hearing the word of God when read in the church, but to apply yourselves to it at home, and to meditate upon it day and night; for Jesus Christ is there present, as well as in the church, and they that seek him shall find him everywhere. Therefore he hath commanded us to meditate in the Law of the Lord, when we walk by the way, and when we sit in our houses, when we lie down, and when we rise up."‡

Again: what saith S. Chrysostom? "Let one of you take in hand the Holy Book, and let him call his neighbours about him; and by the heavenly words let him water and refresh both their minds and also his own."§

Again: in a sermon attributed to S. Augustine we find these words—"If we either read not the Scriptures ourselves, or be not desirous to hear others read them, then are our medicines turned into wounds; and then, where we might have had remedy, we shall have judgment."‖

Our extracts shall be closed for the present, by the following passage from St. Jerome.¶ He is expounding the words of St. Paul, "Let the word of Christ dwell in you abundantly, in all wisdom." On which he remarks—"Here we are taught that even THE LAYMEN ought to have the Word of God, not only sufficiently, but also abundantly; and one to instruct and to warn another." We think we may safely ask our readers, whether the pledge we gave, as to the sentiments of the Fathers, has not been already amply redeemed.

But we promised to say a word or two on the Douay notes to the Bible. They profess to be extracted from the holy Fathers, and to be added for the better understanding of the true meaning of the text. Let us examine the truth of this assertion, in the case of one important passage of the Gospels, closely connected with the question we have been considering.

In St. John's Gospel,* we read these words of our Lord, as given in the Douay version, "Search the Scriptures, for you think in them to have life everlasting: and the same are they that give testimony of me." This verse, one would think, is sufficiently plain and clear. It seems to convey an express command of our Divine Master to all his disciples to Search the Scriptures. But, when we look to the note, we find that we are mistaken. The verse, it seems, is an assertion, not a command. The proper translation is said to be, not "Search the Scriptures," but "You search the Scriptures, scrutamini, ἐρευνᾶτε," and then the Douay translators add—"It is not a command for all to read the Scriptures." Now, we beg leave to ask, if the proper translation of the verse be, "You search the Scriptures," why the Douay translators did not so translate the passage at once? Why did they put the wrong translation (if it be wrong) in the text, and the right one in the note, which would obviously mislead those simple readers, who would be deterred from reading the note by seeing a hard Greek word at the beginning of it? The true reason we suspect to be this, that the translators had some secret doubts in their own minds whether the translation, "Search the Scriptures," was not, after all, the true one: they, therefore, put it in the text. But yet, knowing that Protestants were fond of quoting the passage as a convincing argument for the duty of all men to read the Scriptures, they were resolved to bring forward another translation, as a foundation for their positive statement in the note, that the verse does not contain a command for all to read the Scriptures. Now, the Douay translators may or may not have been good Greek scholars; but we beg to think that S. Chrysostom knew Greek somewhat better than they did. He had sucked it in, as we say, with his mother's milk; it was the language in which he thought and spoke. And what is his explanation of the verse?† "Come," saith he in one of his homilies, "since you draw near with so much pleasure and delight to hear the Word of God, let us search into the Scriptures that have been openly read to us, and let us derive profit from thence. For since (according to that weighty exhortation (παραινεσιν) of Christ, who says—"Search the Scriptures") there is a great treasure laid up in the Scriptures, and hidden deeply in them, therefore there is need of search, in order that, learning the meaning which is concealed in them, we may thence derive much profit to ourselves." Again, in a commentary on St. John's gospel, written by the same eminent Father,‡ we find the following explanation of our text:—"Why did Christ say Search the Scriptures, and not simply, Read the Scriptures? Because the things written concerning himself in the Scriptures needed much anxious thought and attention. Therefore He orders (κελευει) that men should carefully dig through (διασκαπτειν) into them, in order that they may be able to find the truths which are deeply hidden in them.

Our readers can now judge for themselves whether the Douay note on this verse, "It is not a command for all to read the Scriptures," has been faithfully extracted from the holy Fathers, according to the command of Pope Pius VI. In a future number we hope to continue our extracts from the Fathers, and also to bring forward some remarkable statements, made from time to time on this subject, by the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland. Meanwhile, we commend to the careful consideration of all Catholic laymen the important advice given in the extract last quoted, to "dig deeply" into the Word of God.

LETTER OF POPE PIUS THE SIXTH, TO THE MOST REVEREND ANTHONY MARTINI, ARCHBISHOP OF FLORENCE, ON HIS TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY BIBLE INTO ITALIAN, SHOWING THE BENEFIT THE FAITHFUL MAY REAP FROM THEIR HAVING THE HOLY SCRIPTURES IN THE VULGAR TONGUE.*

POPE PIUS THE SIXTH.

BELOVED SON—Health and Apostolical Benediction! At a time that a vast number of bad books, which grossly attack the Catholic religion, are circulated even among the unlearned, to the great destruction of souls, you judge exceedingly well, that the faithful should be excited to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, for these are the most abundant sources, which ought to be left open to every one, to draw from them purity of morals and of doctrine, to eradicate the errors which are so widely disseminated in those corrupt times. This, you have seasonably effected, as you declare, by publishing the Sacred Writings, in the language of your country, suitable to every one's capacity; especially when you show, and set forth, that you have added explanatory notes, which, being extracted from the Holy Fathers, preclude every possible danger of abuse. Thus, you have not swerved, either from the laws of the Congregation of the Index, or from the Constitution published on this subject, by Benedict the Fourteenth, that Immortal Pope, our predecessor in the Pontificate, and formerly, when we held a place near his person, our excellent master in ecclesiastical learning—circumstances which we mention as honourable to us.

We, therefore, applaud your eminent learning, joined with your extraordinary piety, and we return you our due acknowledgments for the books, which you have transmitted to us, and which, when convenient, we will read over. In the meantime, as a token of our Pontificial benevolence, receive the Apostolical Benediction, which to you, beloved son, we very affectionately impart.

Given at Rome, on the Calends of April, 1778, the fourth year of our Pontificate.

PHILIP BUONAMICI, Latin Sec.

To our beloved son, Anthony Martini, at Turin.

WE sincerely rejoice to see Roman Catholic magistrates coming forward to uphold the right of the people to read the word of God; and that some Roman Catholic bishops, at least, are disposed in practice to encourage what they have on so many occasions professed to approve in theory. We trust there is now to be an end of anathematizing Bible readers, and that the Roman Catholic bishops, as friends of sound religious education, will form themselves into a society for the more extensive circulation of the Holy Scriptures. If they be sincere friends of reading the Bible (which certainly a considerable number of the inferior priests are not), let them come forward and circulate the Scriptures in a cheap form, accessible to all. These remarks have been occasioned by reading the following paragraph, which we have much pleasure in reprinting from the Clare Journal:—

"BALLYVAUGHAN UNION.—At a late meeting of this board, Pierce Creagh, Esq., in bringing forward a motion for the amendment of the poor-law, took occasion to say:—As I see a gentleman of the press present, I would now call upon the gentry not only of this county, but of every county in Ireland, and warn them that their country's cause must be fought on the hustings at the next election (hear). It is only by adopting a course of self-exertion and self-reliance that Ireland will ever be righted, or have justice done her. There has been, for years past, too much apathy. We yielded to what I might call a reign of terror—at all events a reign of agitation. But the people find that they have not got better, but worse and worse under this false system. They find that their rights have been bartered away by adventurers, and that they got wrong advice (hear). Why is it that the people of Ulster, with an inferior climate, with worse and poorer land, have been, even during the past years of famine, comparatively independent and prosperous, while the people of this and neighbouring province are steeped in ignorance, and suffer under privations and poverty? It is because that in Ulster the principle of self-reliance has been engrafted into the minds of the people. I find in Ulster even a Roman Catholic bishop (Dr. Denvir, we believe), aiding and printing and circulating the Scriptures among the people (hear). I find that he, a Roman Catholic, like myself, believing that the truths of the Catholic religion can be proved from the Scriptures.

"Mr. John Macnamara—Order, order.

"Mr. Creagh—I am not out of order. I say that so far from danger arising from the general perusal of that book, I would place it in the hands of every man woman, and child in Ireland. And my allusion to that is not at all irrelevant; because it is from that book the people of Ulster have learned the great principle and law of Providence that 'man must earn his bread by the sweat of his brow.' I say it is this knowledge that has spread both self-reliance and individual exertion among the people of Ulster, and has led them to pursue habits of industry. Is it not the reverse with the people of this part of the country? Here the people depend not on their own exertions, but on the exertions of others. They rely on dragging from the farmer and landowner all their substance, to be scattered in the shape of indoor and out-door relief among them. But their instructors have not inculcated principles of self-reliance among them; nor have they taken care to instruct them in the words of the apostle—that 'if any man does not work, neither should he eat.' They have not explained to them that the reception of outdoor relief by parties able to earn their bread is equal to robbery, which the law of the land would punish by transportation. But on this important point I do not intend to detain this meeting further, and shall defer to another opportunity speaking more at large on the subject.

"Mr. John Macnamara said—I fully agree in the greater part of the statements made by Mr. Creagh; but I dissent from that part of it where he alludes to only one Roman Catholic bishop distributing the Bible. I am now rather advanced in life, and have long had acquaintance with the Catholic clergy, and I can say they are the most active and best friends of education. I know, also, that they never prevented their flocks from reading the Bible. I know that, and I assert it without fear of contradiction (ironical cries of 'hear, hear,' from Mr. Creagh). My friend, Mr. Creagh, need not to travel to the north for a bishop. We have them in the south and west, not at all inferior to the northern clergy; and Mr. Creagh is entirely mistaken in supposing that the Catholic clergy are not the friends of education and of reading the Bible ('hear, hear,' from Mr. Creagh)."

As another step in the right direction, we rejoice to hear that three dozen of Testaments have recently been ordered for the Roman Catholic children in the Cavan Union Poorhouse, on the application of the Roman Catholic chaplain, in consequence, we believe, of the Right Rev. Dr. Browne, Roman Catholic Bishop of Kilmore, having recently visited the school, and suggested the need of the supply. This is, we understand, the second time that Testaments have been supplied to these schools at the suggestion of Dr. Browne. We only hope that the reverend chaplain will carry out the object of his respected bishop, by vigilantly enforcing their use in the schools.

NEWSPAPER READERS.

The Americans are really a very droll people. The following sketch is original in style, and, considering its source, strictly true in substance. How endless is the variety of newspaper readers, and how hard it is to satisfy their wants.

Mr. A. believes he shall discontinue his paper, because it contains no political news; while

B. is decidedly of opinion that the same paper dabbles too freely in the political movements of the day.

C. don't take it, because it is all on one side; and

D., whose opinion it generally expresses, does not like it, because it is not severe enough upon the opposition.

E. thinks it does not pay due attention to fashionable literature.

F. cannot bear the flimsy notions of idle writers.

G. will not suffer a paper to lie upon his table which ventures to express an opinion against slavery.

H. never patronizes one that lacks moral courage to expose the evils of the day.

I. declares he does not want a paper filled with the hodge-podge doings and undoings of the legislature

J. considers that paper the best which gives the greatest quantity of such proceedings.

K. patronizes the papers for the light and lively reading which they contain.

L. wonders that the press does not publish Dewey's sermons, and such other solid matter.

M. will not even read a paper that will not expose the evils of sectarianism.

N. is decidedly of opinion that the pulpit, and not the press, should meddle with religious dogmas.

O. likes to read police reports.

P., whose appetite is less morbid, would not have a paper in which these silly reports are printed in his house.

Q. likes anecdotes.

R. won't take a paper that publishes them, and says, that murders and dreadful accidents ought not to be put into papers.

S. complains that his miserable paper gave no account of that highway robbery last week.

T. says the type is too small.

U. thinks it too large.

V. stops his paper, because it contains nothing but advertisements.

W. wants it to see what is for sale.

X. will not take the paper unless it is left at his door before sunrise; while

Y. declares he will not pay for it, if left so early; that it is stolen from his house before he is up.

And, last of all, come the complaints of some of the ladies—who declare the paper very uninteresting, because it does not, every day, contain a list of marriages; just as if it were possible for the poor printer to marry people without a licence, and whether the parties will or no. But the variety of newspaper readers is too great for the present review; and "we give them up," with a determination to pursue the "even tenor of our way," in offering to the public such reading as, in our humble opinion, will prove most useful to them and interesting as possible.—American Paper.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD.

ONE Sunday, after chapel, Pat Dolan and Jemmy Brannan were going home from Mass; and as Pat, who was before, stopped to speak to a neighbour, Jem overtook him, and they walked on together.

"Good morrow, Jem," says Pat.

"Good morrow kindly, Pat."

And so they fell to talking of the sermon, for Father John had preached that day.

"Didn't Father John give it to the Bible readers, like himself, to day?" said Pat.

"Deed and he did, and it's he that can," said Jem.

"I wonder how Tim Finnegan and Peter Daly, that I know is reading the Bible, liked to hear him; maybe that will stop them, or maybe they will go on till Father John puts up their names before the people," said Pat.

"I don't know," says Jem, "but I see that them that takes to reading is not easily put from it. But Father John said one thing to-day that bothers me entirely; I can't see the reason of it at all."

"Now, what was that?" says Pat.

"Why, he told us," says Jem, "that any man that takes to reading the Bible will be sure to turn Protestant; and I can't come up to the raison of that at all."

"Why, man alive," says Pat, "don't you see it yourself? Isn't there Tim Daly and Mat Fogarty, and plenty more, and Johnny Connor himself, that was sexton of the chapel, that Father John trusted more than any man in the parish; and didn't they all turn Protestants when they took to reading the Bible; and what for should you be saying, that you can't understand Father John saying that, when you see it yourself as plain as the blessed sun in the sky this moment?"

"True for you, Pat," says Jemmy; "I see all that as plain as you do, and maybe a little more; for I see foreby, that it is mostly the best Catholic, and the most devotest man, and the man that minds his duty best, and the greatest arguer against the Protestants, that evermore turns Protestant, all out and out—the surest of all, once he takes to reading the Bible in earnest; none of your keeping it quiet in the bottom of the chest with the likes of them; but they'll turn readers too, and go through fire and water to get others to read, and turn Protestant, like themselves. I see that; and I don't wonder that Father John says it; for sure he would be blind all out not to see what every man in the parish sees. So it isn't Father John saying it that bothers me; but what I can't make out at all is, why the Bible should put every one astray, and make every one that reads it turn Protestant."

"Man alive," says Pat, "sure isn't that as plain as your hand. Why, wasn't Luther the first Protestant that ever lived, and didn't he write all the Bible himself, and why wouldn't it turn every one Protestant that reads it?"

"Sure enough, Pat," says Jem, "if that was true it would make all plain; but there isn't a word of truth in it, that's all. Sure doesn't Father John tell us that the Catholic religion is 1850 years old, and doesn't he tell us that Luther lived only 300 years ago (and I believe that's all true); and will any man in his senses tell me that the Catholic Church had never a Bible for 1550 years? Sure that doesn't stand to reason. And isn't there the Douay Bible, that the priest allows is the true one? And where did that come from? Sure Luther didn't write that too. And so, if Father John was to tell us that Luther wrote all the Bible out of his own head (and sure enough, I heard Father John once say very near that same), I wouldn't believe him; for how could Luther put it on the priests, too?"

"Don't you see, Jem," says Pat, "that you have it now? 'Twas the Protestant Bible, of course, that Luther wrote; and it's as different from the Catholic Bible as turnips is from the good old Cups (my blessing be with them and the ould times), and sure that's the reason that reading the Protestant Bible turns every one into a Protestant."

"Well, Pat," says Jem, "if that was it, I'd be quite happy and settled in my mind at once; but I doubt it isn't it, after all. Didn't I hear old John Dowd, the schoolmaster that lives over at Kilmore, the cutest and learnedst man that ever was in this country, say that he got a Protestant Bible and a Catholic Bible, and that he read them both together (and he was the boy that was fit to read two books at worst), and didn't I hear him lay it down that there wasn't a word of differ between them that signified one haporth? And that's what makes me ever more uneasy in my mind, till I get the reason why reading the Bible should make people turn Protestant. Sure now it's not easy to believe that the Word of God would put every one astray entirely. And by the same token, you told me yourself that Luther was the first Protestant that ever lived, only 300 years ago, and that there never was a Protestant for 1500 years before that. Now, if they had the Bible all those 1500 years, isn't it mighty odd if no one ever looked into it? and if they did, why did it never turn them Protestants before as well as after?"

"Maybe it was all in Latin, Jem," says Pat, "and that nobody at all could read it."

"Well," says Jem, "the schoolmaster said that wasn't it, though I don't remember how he made it out. But I'll tell you what it is, Pat, my mind's all astray about thinking why the Bible should make every one a Protestant, and set every one astray that reads it. Sure that isn't like the Word of God at all; and I can't attend to my duties the way I used to do, nor keep myself from thinking, and I be to look for something to quiet me. and it's to Father John I'll go, and ask him the reason why reading the Word of God is setting all the people astray."

"And isn't it yourself that 'ill have to flatter him neatly, and get him in the best of good humour when you go to poke him with questions like that, Jem?" says Pat. "And isn't it his reverence that'll handle you, and maybe put up your name before the people?"

"Well, Pat, I want to be satisfied in my mind, and sure I'm willing to be satisfied; and who would I go to to settle me, if I wouldn't go to my clergy? Sure, if all the boys that go astray from reading would only go to their clergy to satisfy them, and set them right, maybe it wouldn't be so bad. Any way I'm resolved to try; and maybe I'll have the telling you what he says.

And by that time Jem was got to his own door; so he says, "Good evening, Pat." "Good evening, neighbour," says Pat, "and I wish you safe from Father John."

Well, it so happened, about three weeks after, that Pat and Jemmy fell in together again, coming home from chapel, and of course they began to talk.

"And did you ever speak to Father John?" says Pat.

"Indeed I did," says Jem; "last Thursday was a fortnight he overtook me on the road, him riding and I walking; so I took off my hat to his reverence, and as he spoke to me pretty civil, I made bold to talk to him then; and says I, 'Your reverence, I hope since you came to this parish you never found me anything but a boy that always attended to his duties and was respectful to his clergy.' 'True for you,' says he, 'that's what you are.' 'Well, then,' says Jem, 'I want a bit of advice, and maybe a little instruction from your reverence; for who would I go to for it, only to my own clergy?' 'Quite right,' says he, 'if everybody did that,' says he, 'the way they used to do, the people wouldn't be going astray.' 'Well, then, your reverence,' says I, 'I'm uneasy in my mind about one thing that's disturbing me; and I'm sure your reverence would settle it in one word, and may be you'll have the kindness to do so.' 'What is it?' says he, quite pleasant-like. 'I wanted to know, your reverence,' says I, 'what is the reason that the Word of God should set everybody astray that reads it?' With that he turned round upon me as sudden as a clap of thunder, and says he, 'It's reading the Bible you are, and going to turn Protestant on me.' 'No, please your reverence,' says I, 'it's nothing of the kind.' 'You're a liar,' says he, 'and it's reading the Bible you are.' 'No, please your reverence,' says I, 'I never had a Bible in my hand in all my life, and I never heard one word read out of it good or bad (and with that he began to look more easy in his mind and more agreeable-like), 'barring,' says I, 'the bits of scraps that your reverence reads in the chapel sometimes; and sure,' says I, looking up at him out of the corner of my eye, 'that wasn't too much, any way.' 'And what more do you want?' says he. 'Only just to know,' says I, 'why it is that the reading of God's Word puts every one astray that reads it.' 'And what's that to you,' says he, 'if you don't read it?' 'Only this, your reverence,' says I, 'that I see everybody that's reading the Bible going astray and turning Protestant.' 'Sure enough,' says he. 'And it seems so unnatural-like,' says I, 'that God's own Word should set the people astray, and ruin them entirely, that I can't get my mind off thinking of it, and I can't attend to my duties for thinking, and sure if your reverence could settle my mind for me in one word, wouldn't it be the good thing for me?' 'To be sure,' says he, 'and isn't that what I am going to do in a moment?' and with that I pulls off my hat, and says he, 'Isn't it the Protestant Bible they're reading,' says he; 'that's all full of lies from beginning to end? and isn't that the reason they're going astray and turning heretics, and doesn't it stand to reason?' says he, 'Oh, then, your reverence,' says I, 'it's all because they're reading a false Bible that they are going astray and turning heretics.' 'To be sure it is,' says he; 'what else?' 'And if the Catholic Bible wouldn't set them astray,' says I, 'I'm all right in my mind, and satisfied entirely now and evermore.' 'To be sure it wouldn't,' says he, 'when it's the right one.' 'Well, your reverence,' says I, 'just one word more; when so many of the people is turning, and,' says I, 'there's Johnny Connor, and Tim Daly, and there's ——.' 'Don't talk to me about them,' says he, 'I don't want to hear of the likes of them.' 'Well, it isn't about them, your reverence,' says I, 'but about the rest of the boys that isn't gone yet; if it's a bad Bible that's leading them astray, wouldn't it be the good thing just to give them the right one, and let them see the differ?' 'What's that to you?' says he, 'just mind your own duties, and hold your tongue.' 'But your reverence,' says I, 'it's fretting me to see the boys going, and it's unsettling my mind; and if it's the lying Protestant book that's doing it all, sure there would be nothing like the right Bible.' 'Mind your own duty,' says he, quite sudden, 'and don't be teaching your clergy; it's always the way,' says he, 'the minute you think of the Bible, you begin to teach your clergy.' 'Sure,' says I, 'it's not for the likes of me to teach anybody, let alone my clergy; but sure,' says I, 'I only want my clergy to teach me one thing.' 'What is it?' says he. 'Only this,' says I, 'is the Protestant Bible like the Catholic Bible, at all?' 'Not a bit of it,' says he, 'how could heresy be like the Catholic faith?' says he. 'Well, your reverence,' says I, 'there's many of the boys as uneasy as myself, when they see how things is going on, and the people turning Protestant; and if your reverence would only show us the two books, and let us see the difference, we would see then the reason of it all.' 'Is that what you are after?' says he, 'I'll put you from the likes of that,' says he; 'see how it will be with you,' says he, 'if I call your name from the altar!' 'And is that all the satisfaction your reverence will give me?' says I. 'Mind your duties,' says he, 'or I'll have satisfaction of you,' says he; and with that he rode off, looking as mad as you please."

"Deed and," said Pat, "if his reverence would only give us a little more satisfaction it might keep some of the boys from turning, for sure he ought to be able. But sure I told you how it would be; and what will you do now, Jem?"

"Why, I can't rest in my mind, Pat, now more nor ever, till I find out why it is that reading God's Word should put every one astray, for it seems more unnatural-like than ever; and by this blessed light, since Father John won't give me any satisfaction about it, I'll try if I can't get some time of speaking to the Rev. Mr. Owens, the parson, and I'll ask him if he can tell me any satisfaction about it. Sure I know he will speak civil to me any how; and if he can't give me satisfaction, I'll not mind anything else he says, and there's no harm done."

And so they parted for that day; and if we hear anything more of what happened, we will tell it truly.

THE STATE OF DEPARTED SOULS.

It is a solemn and deeply-interesting inquiry, to any one who has ever lost a friend, whether it is in the power of the survivor to benefit the soul that is gone, or contribute to its happiness or spiritual rest. In every age, those who have believed in the immortality of the soul have speculated on the state of those who are departed and are no more seen; and before the coming of our Lord, the greatest philosophers of antiquity had exhausted speculation upon it.

Eusebius states that "Plato (who died 350 years before Christ) divided mankind into three states:—Some who, having purified themselves by philosophy, and excelled in holiness of life, enjoy an eternal felicity in the islands of the blest, without any labour or trouble, which it is possible neither for words to express nor thought to conceive. Others, who have lived exceedingly wicked, and, therefore, seemed incapable of cure, he supposed were, at their deaths, thrown headlong into hell, there to be tormented for ever. Besides these, he imagined there were a middle sort, who though they had sinned, yet had repented of it, and, therefore, seemed to be in a curable condition; and these, he thought, went down, for some time, to hell too, to be purged and absolved by grievous torments, but that after that they should be delivered from it, and attain to honours, according to the dignity of their benefactors."

It would appear, also, from various passages in the ancient poets—for instance, Homer and Virgil—that the popular belief then was, that souls, in this intermediate state, might receive help from the prayers and sacrificings of the living; but whether the philosophers entertained a similar belief appears not to be equally clear, nor is it, perhaps, worth while to consider. We, who have the light of Christian revelation to guide us, must base our religious belief on something more substantial and satisfactory than the dreams of poetical imagination, or the philosophical speculations of Plato or Socrates. And the solemn inquiry still remains, what does the Christian revelation make known to the faithful on his momentous question? That there is a heaven for the holy, and a hell for the reprobate, is so plainly made known in the Holy Scriptures, that a child cannot doubt or mistake it. Whether there is a third place or state of being, where the sins committed here can be expurgated, either by personal suffering or the exertions of surviving friends, is the only matter capable of dispute among professing Christians, and has been for centuries, and still is, a leading point of difference between the Churches of Rome and England. We would approach this matter with the most anxious solicitude and reverence, as well as tender and sincere regard for the feelings and opinions of others on this momentous subject. Alas! who is there who does not feel conscious of failure of duty towards some one departed friend, at least, to whose happiness he would most gladly sacrifice anything which he was assured would contribute to it in the unseen world? and who can wonder that the popular belief in the efficacy of masses for the dead has been, and still is, the source of such abundant pecuniary profit to those privileged to dispose of them? The only wonder appears to us to be, that thousands of holy men, who have been ready to devote their lives to the welfare of their fellow-creatures, should not have voluntarily and without pecuniary payment consecrated their lives to the holy purpose of relieving or shortening the torments of the faithful in the intermediate state of temporary punishment, the horrors of which, as described by theologians, cannot be thought of for a moment without shuddering. Who can think of purgatory—its flames, its torments, its wailing spirits, and tormenting fiends—and believe that when the spirit leaves the body it will plunge into something worse than cauldrons of boiling oil and molten lead, there to burn for months, and years, and centuries, till all its sin is purged away either by suffering or the suffrages of surviving friends, and not be ready to make any sacrifice to alleviate and abridge the period of such torment? And who can believe that any pious priest could hesitate to perform as many masses as were needful for the souls of those who during life were under his guidance, merely because they were poor, or because money was not paid them for so doing? Much more wonderful (it seems to us) is it that the Pope, if he really has the power of freeing souls from such a place of torment, should not at once do so, after the example of him whose benefits were prophetically described as granted freely, WITHOUT MONEY and WITHOUT PRICE!

Surely no good man would hesitate to rescue a fellow-creature in this world from the fire in a burning house, merely because he was too poor to pay him for it, or could, without incurring the execration of all good men, pause to bargain for the price of his assistance, before he would do anything in his power to save the victim. And is it credible that they who profess to be able, should be really unwilling to terminate, or even alleviate, the sufferings of those who are gone before? Alas! however, for poor human nature (or we should, perhaps, rather say inhuman), the truth is not only so, but far worse. Those who have been actually paid for saying masses for departed souls have not always been honest enough to perform their part of the bargain. If Italian monasteries have not been grievously belied, they have not unfrequently purchased at Rome absolution for their neglect to say masses for which they had received large sums of money, on the express condition that they should celebrate them for the souls of their founders or benefactors. The first indulgence so granted in the Venetian States was to the Servites de Madorno, in 1645; and it is well known, that in 1723, Pope Innocent XIII., by a single rescript, freed all the Augustine monks, the Dominican friars, the Carmelites, and several other bodies from the obligation of celebrating perpetual or daily masses for certain souls in purgatory, which they had omitted, till the arrears became enormous, on the terms of their saying instead one grand annual funebral mass, during the "Octave of the Dead," in one of their convents in each province, each monastery retaining, nevertheless, all the money which had been paid them for perpetual masses; he thereby also permitted them, by a commission composed of the monks themselves, to compound their liabilities as to other masses, by taking the present market price of masses as the measure of their obligations. So that the poor souls who had made a good bargain and bought, perhaps, one hundred perpetual masses when they were cheap, thinking the contract was always to stand good, thus received only fifty when the market price was doubled.*

Is it possible to believe that such unholy and inhuman frauds could ever have been practised on the dead? and can it be possible that Pope Innocent XIII. can have believed that his indulgence to the living really injured the dead? If it did not injure them, it must follow, necessarily, that the masses, if said, would not have served them, either by alleviating or shortening their sufferings; and if that be so, whether purgatory be a truth or a dream, we think the traffic in masses for the dead will soon be a less profitable one, even in impoverished Ireland. We shall resume this sad and serious subject in our next, and shall enter upon its consideration by the inquiry, what were the opinions of St. Patrick upon this deeply important question.

HYMN OF ST. PATRICK.

We now redeem the pledge which we gave in our first number, and present our readers with this Irish Hymn, the oldest undoubted monument of the Irish language extant, and which has never, we believe, before been printed, except in Mr. Petrie's valuable and elaborate essay on the History and Antiquities of Tara Hill, in the 18th volume of the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, a work of a very costly description, and inaccessible to the majority of our fellow-countrymen. It is taken from the celebrated MS. Liber Hymnorum, preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, and also in the British Museum, London—a manuscript which, in the opinion of Archbishop Ussher, who died in 1656, was in his time a thousand years old. It is written in that ancient dialect of the Irish, called Bearla Feine, in which the Brehon laws, and the oldest tracts in the language, are written, and the orthography of the words varies so considerably from more modern productions, and so many of the words themselves have long become obsolete, that we have thought it may be acceptable to our readers to present them with a translation in modern Irish, carefully made by an eminent Irish scholar, for ourselves, as well as an accurate English translation, and the Latin one given by Mr. Petrie, for the satisfaction of the learned. As a record, illustrative of the religious doctrines of St. Patrick, the Patron Saint of Ireland, we think it can hardly fail of being acceptable to all, whether they believe him to have preached Christianity in Ireland by a commission from Rome or not.

To enable our readers fully to appreciate the occasion on which this ancient document was composed, we must premise, that in the year 433 St. Patrick preached at Tara before Leogaire (or Laoghaire), then the supreme monarch of Ireland, on the celebrated hill of Tara, in the county of Meath, the chief residence of the Irish kings from the first establishment of a monarchical government in this country. The national convention or parliament was then assembled in that place, for the celebration of the great national festival of Tara, called "Baal's fire." The force with which St. Patrick urged upon them the truths of the Gospel was such that, according to some accounts, the king himself became a convert to Christianity, and great multitudes of his subjects, including Dubtach, the arch-poet of the kingdom, and Conall, the king's brother, soon followed his example. Whatever may have been the immediate effect, the preaching of St. Patrick before King Leogaire, at Tara, is one of those facts on which all authorities concur, and, for the sake of brevity, we give the condensed abstract of the matter, furnished by Dr. Lanigan.

After narrating the progress of St. Patrick during the years 432 and 433, until the approach of Easter, when he determined on celebrating that festival near Tara, Dr. Lanigan proceeds thus:—"On the following day, which was Easter Eve, St. Patrick continued his journey, and arrived in the evening at a place called Ferta-fer-feic, now Slane. Having got a tent pitched there, he made preparations for celebrating the festival of Easter, and, accordingly, lighted the paschal fire about night fall. It happened that at this very time the King Leogaire and the assembled princes were celebrating a religious festival, of which fire-worship formed a part. There was a standing law that at the time of this festival, no fire should be kindled for a considerable distance all round, until after a great fire should be lighted in the royal palace of Temoria, on Tara. St. Patrick's paschal fire was, however, lighted before that of the palace, and being seen from the heights of Tara, excited great astonishment. On the king's inquiring what could be the cause of it, and who could have thus dared to infringe the law, the Magi told him that it was necessary to have that fire extinguished immediately, whereas, if allowed to remain, it would get the better of their fires, and bring about the downfall of his kingdom. Leogaire, enraged and troubled on getting this information, set out for Slane, with a considerable number of followers, and one or two of the principal Magi, for the purpose of exterminating those violaters of the law. It was immediately before, and in anticipation of the imminent peril in which he was placed, when approaching the stronghold of his Pagan enemies, that this remarkable hymn was composed by St. Patrick, and is said to have been sung by him and his followers as a defence against the plots that beset his path. It is familiarly known by the name of "St. Patrick's Armour" (Lorica Patricii), and is obviously a prayer for protection from the incantations of Druidical opponents, who were determined on his destruction, and contains many internal evidences of its having been composed at a period when Pagan notions of the power of the elements had not given way before the light of Christianity.

It is remarkable that the Luireach Phadruig is still remembered popularly in many parts of Ireland, and a portion of it is, to this day, repeated by the people, usually at bedtime, with the same superstitious confidence in its protecting power as, according to St. Evin, was placed in it previously to his time, in the sixth century.

The preface, which is ancient, but obviously more recent than the hymn itself, is as follows:—

Hymn of St. Patrick.

PREFACE.

"Patrick composed this hymn. In the time of Leogaire, the son of Nial, it was composed. The cause of its composition was, to protect himself with his monks against the enemies unto death who were in ambush against the clergy. And this is a religious armour to protect the body and souls against demons, and men, and vices. Every person who sings it every day, with all his attention on God, shall not have demons appearing to his face. It will be a protection to him against every poison and envy. It will be a safeguard to him against sudden death. It will be an armour to his soul after his death. Patrick sang this at the time that the snares were set for him by Leogaire, that he might not come to propagate the faith to Temar; so that it appeared to those lying in ambush that they were wild deer, and a fawn after them, that is Benen. And Fethfiadha is its name."

"At Tara (Temur), to-day, I invoke the mighty power of the Trinity. I believe in the Trinity under the unity of the God of the elements.

"At Tara, to-day, [I place] the virtue of the birth of Christ with his baptism, the virtue of his crucifixion with his burial, the virtue of his resurrection with his ascension, the virtue of the coming to the eternal judgment

"At Tara, to-day, [I place] the virtue of the love of Seraphim, [the virtue which exists] in the obedience of angels, in the hope of the resurrection to eternal reward, in the prayers of the noble fathers, in the predictions of the prophets, in the preaching of the apostles, in the faith of the confessors, in the purity of holy virgins, in the deeds of just men.

"At Tara, to-day, [I place] the strength of heaven, the light of the sun, the whiteness of snow, the force of fire, the rapidity of lightning, the swiftness of the wind, the depth of the sea, the stability of the earth, the hardness of rocks [between me and the force of Paganism and demons].

"At Tara, to-day, may the strength of God pilot me, may the power of God preserve me, may the wisdom of God instruct me, may the eye of God view me, may the ear of God hear me, may the word of God render me eloquent, may the hand of God protect me, may the way of God direct me, may the shield of God defend me, may the host of God guard me against the snares of demons, the temptations of vices, the inclinations of the mind, against every man who meditates evil to me, far or near, alone or in company. I place all these powers between me and every evil and unmerciful power directed against my soul and my body (as a protection), against the incantations of false prophets, against the black laws of Gentilism, against the false laws of heresy, against the treachery of idolatry, against the spells of women, smiths, Druids, against every knowledge which blinds the soul of man. May Christ to-day protect me against poison, against burning, against drowning, against wounding, until I deserve much reward.

"Christ (be) with me, Christ before me, Christ after me, Christ in me, Christ under me, Christ over me, Christ at my right, Christ at my left, Christ at this side, Christ at that side, Christ at my back. Christ (be) in the heart of each person whom I speak to, Christ in the mouth of each person who speaks to me, Christ in each eye which sees me, Christ in each ear which hears me.

"At Tara, to-day, I invoke the mighty power of the Trinity; I believe in the Trinity, under the unity of the God of the elements.

"Salvation is the Lord's! salvation is the Lord's! salvation is Christ's! May thy salvation, O Lord, be always with us."

THE HARP OF ERIN.

The harp that once thro' Tara's halls
The soul of music shed,
Now hangs as mute on Tara's walls
As if that soul were fled.
So sleeps the pride of former days,
When glory's thrill is o'er;
And hearts that once beat high for praise,
Now feel that pulse no more.

No more to chiefs and ladies bright
The harp of Tara swells;
The chord alone that breaks at night
Its tale of ruin tells.
Thus freedom now so seldom wakes:
The only throb she gives,
Is when some heart indignant breaks,
To show that still she lives.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith.

As the expense of the publication is necessarily heavy, prompt Subscriptions are earnestly solicited, which our friends will observe are payable in advance. The amount may be forwarded either in postage stamps or a post-office order, payable to Mr. Wm. Curry, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Contributors will be good enough not to consider that their communications have been disapproved of, or will not be ultimately inserted, because they do not appear immediately in our pages. The nature of our undertaking will afford an obvious explanation why delay may sometimes be unavoidable.

Press of matter in our present number reluctantly obliges us to postpone the insertion of several valuable communications, as also advertisements. The challenge in our first number has not yet been responded to.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1852.

We have already stated, in our first number, the manner in which we propose to deal with the important questions about which the Church of Rome and the Church of England and Ireland are divided. It is our earnest desire to lay aside all prejudices, and all party feeling, and apply ourselves to seek for truth, for ourselves and for others, and to embrace it on whichever side it may be found. We have promised, and it is our earnest desire, to do this in a spirit of candour, with our hearts prepared to embrace the truth; and in a spirit of love and charity to those who may be found to differ from us.

We have already had much reason to hope that our undertaking has been received in a corresponding spirit by men of various political and religious parties; and it is our greatest desire, in this number, at once to prepare the way for such a consideration of the subject, and to give good ground of confidence to men of all parties that we are anxious and able to consider such subjects in the spirit of impartiality, kindness, and charity, which we have proposed.

It has ever appeared to us, that one great cause of the evils which spring from religious controversy—one of the greatest reasons why it does not tend to bring men more to an agreement in the truth, is this: that, on both sides, men are too forward in charging their opponents with what they suppose them to hold, instead of taking due pains, and candidly inquiring from their opponents themselves, what they do really hold. While such a course is followed on both sides, or on either side, no real good can be expected from discussion. If I say to a man, you believe such and such follies or absurdities; and if he be conscious to himself that he does not believe those things, he thinks me either a slanderer or a fool; and he will not think himself called on to consider the arguments or reasons which I produce. And he is right; for each man knows what he himself believes in his own mind, better than any other man can know it; and no man can be called on to consider reasons for disbelieving what he himself already disbelieves.

We are persuaded that most men who are ranged on opposite sides in controversy, if they would each take pains to learn what the other really thinks, would find that they agreed with each other more than they supposed at first. And they would then be much more disposed to discuss fairly with each other, the things in which they really differed; because they could then avoid giving each other that needless and unjustifiable offence, which makes men unwilling to consider each other's arguments.

Our present object is to take out of our way such obstacles as these—to prepare for understanding each other; to lead to such a statement on both sides, as may give the greatest hope and the best opportunity of honestly considering each other's arguments about those things in which we really differ.

It is our conviction, that both parties have erred in attributing to opponents what they did not really hold; and that each party has thus been hardened against considering the reasoning of the other.

We give precedence here to Roman Catholics; we give a list of some of the things which they have been charged with holding. We ourselves give no opinion here, whether these things have been justly charged on them or not. We invite Roman Catholics to say that for themselves. We desire to know what they do really believe; and we desire that Protestants in general should understand it. We may hereafter treat in the same way some of the things which Roman Catholics charge members of the Church of England and Ireland with holding; but in this article we confine ourselves to charges made against Roman Catholics.

First. They are commonly charged with holding transubstantiation; and they who bring this charge generally undertake to say what Roman Catholics understand by transubstantiation, instead of letting Roman Catholics state it for themselves.

And they explain it thus—They say that Roman Catholics believe, that when the words of consecration are spoken over bread and wine by a priest, the whole substance of the bread is changed into the whole substance of the body of Christ, and the whole substance of the wine is changed into the substance of his blood; so that if any man should say that the consecrated bread is indeed the body of Christ, but that the substance of bread remains along with the body of Christ, that man is accursed.

They further charge Roman Catholics with believing (what seems quite contrary and inconsistent with the part of the charge already given above) that the consecrated bread is both the body and the blood, too, of Christ; and that the consecrated wine is not only the blood of Christ, but the body of Christ too. Here, Roman Catholics are charged with believing things that contradict each other; for how can the bread be changed into the body, and the wine be changed into the blood, and yet, the bread by itself be both the body and the blood, and the wine also be both the body and the blood? Surely there cannot be many who believe both of the things thus charged on them.

Again, Roman Catholics are further accused of believing, that when the bread and wine cease to exist at the words of consecration, it is not merely the body and blood of Christ which become present in their place, but Christ himself, whole and entire, which is there upon the altar. This is a great difference. Christ is not mere body and blood. There must be his human soul, and still more, there must be the Divinity itself, the very essence of the Divine nature, the very substance of God himself. It takes all this to make up "Christ, whole and entire." According to this view of transubstantiation, Roman Catholics are charged with believing, that when the priest speaks the words of consecration over the bread, that bread is actually turned into God!!

And, as if to convict Roman Catholics of holding the utmost degree of absurdity that could be imagined, they are charged with believing that all this is true of each crumb of the bread by itself; and that not only at the time of the celebration of Mass, but that this continues so in any particle that remains after Mass is over; so that if the smallest crumb fall on the ground, into the dust of the priest's feet, and lie there until next day, that crumb, lying in the dust, is "Christ, whole and entire!" It is not merely a particle of the body of Christ; it is Christ himself, whole and entire; Christ himself, his whole body, his whole blood, his human soul, his Divine substance, all lie there in the dust, under the appearance of a crumb! Such is what Roman Catholics are commonly charged with believing; and not only so, but they are accused of holding that every one who does not believe every word of the above is accursed.

Now, we trust that there are multitudes of Roman Catholics whose sense and reason, to say nothing of their knowledge of Scripture, and their reverence for Jesus Christ our Lord, keep them from believing such things as these. And we earnestly and indignantly protest against such a belief being charged against any individual who does not really believe it; of which each man knows best himself whether he believes it or not. We earnestly invite Roman Catholics to consider whether they do indeed believe these things; and if their conscience testify to them that they do not, we entreat them to take this opportunity of setting themselves right with Protestants, by letters directed to the Editor of this paper, stating that they do not believe these things. Surely Roman Catholics ought to wish that Protestants should rightly understand what they really believe.

There are other accusations founded on the charge of transubstantiation. As, for instance, that they worship the consecrated bread as if it were God! giving it the same worship of Latria which is due to the true God. Again, that they worship with Divine worship that very thing which they eat with their mouths.

But we must proceed with some other charges.

They are often accused of idolatry, and that of the highest kind.

They are accused of worshipping the Virgin Mary.

They are accused of praying to her. Not merely of asking her to pray for them, but of praying to her, and also to saints and angels.

They are accused of making her a mediator and a Saviour; and of attributing to her all that the Scriptures attribute to Christ.

They are also accused of saying that all believers in Christianity, except themselves, shall be damned for ever.

Roman Catholics are also very commonly accused of holding many doctrines and opinions, which (if they really did believe them) would make it very hard, or almost impossible, for Roman Catholics to be loyal subjects of our Queen, or honest men in their dealings towards others. Thus, they are accused of believing, that if the Pope should order them to rebel against the Queen, it would be their duty to God to turn rebels. And they are accused of believing that faith is not to be kept with heretics or Protestants; and that any promises or oaths made to Protestants are not binding.

How greatly we might increase our list of charges! but we stop here for the present. These are enough to make a beginning towards putting matters on a better and more hopeful footing between the two parties.

These are dreadful charges to bring against men: and great mischief must follow if they are not properly treated. Protestants who believe that Roman Catholics really hold these things, will, of course, be exasperated against them. Roman Catholics who feel that these things are unjustly charged against them, will be exasperated against those who make these charges. A country cannot prosper—cannot be at peace—whose children thus learn to hate one another.

Is it not a noble and a useful undertaking to seek to clear up misconceptions where they exist, and to take away hatred where it should not exist? Is not this to serve our country, and to promote its peace?

We are ourselves convinced, that there are multitudes of Roman Catholics, in every rank of society, from the highest to the lowest, who reject many or most even of the things charged on Roman Catholics. Their reverence towards Christ keeps them from what is dishonouring to him; and their integrity and good faith keep them from what is false and treacherous towards their fellow-men.

We have often heard Roman Catholics deny that they hold such things, and we have ever accepted their denial with confidence and pleasure. We trust that any Roman Catholic, who feels guiltless of any of the charges we have mentioned, will not feel hurt at our stating those charges in our pages. We believe that numbers of Roman Catholics are anxious for a fair opportunity of denying and repudiating such doctrines; and we desire only to give them this opportunity. We are prepared to accept such denials with a generous confidence; and we invite Roman Catholics to come forward and clear themselves of whatever they do not really hold. Above all others, we invite the Roman Catholic priesthood to come forward openly, and disclaim whatever they think is unjustly charged on their religion, and we place our pages at their disposal for the purpose.

We are prepared to believe every one who says that he does not hold any false or wicked doctrine which has been attributed to him, and to rejoice in the belief. Still it may be our duty to discuss with him whether his church holds it or not. While we believe him affirming that he does not hold it, it may be our duty to show that his church does hold it; that the highest authorities of his church, those authorities which are most certainly infallible, if there be any infallibility in it, have actually decided in favour of what he denies.

It is probable that this, more than anything else, has led to the undistinguishing charges made by some Protestants against all Roman Catholics, of holding doctrines that are dishonouring towards Christ and wicked towards men. These Protestants see such things decreed by the authorities in the Church of Rome, which authorities they suppose all Roman Catholics must hold to be infallible. And from this they conclude, that all Roman Catholics do believe all the things that have been thus decreed. But these Protestants are greatly mistaken, and in many ways. There are many and various opinions in the Church of Rome about what authority or decision is infallible. Oftentimes, when Protestants bring forward an authority which they suppose to be admitted as infallible, great numbers of Roman Catholics will say, and say truly, that they do not consider that authority infallible. And though the authority produced be such as they would generally believe to be infallible, yet when they find it pronouncing decrees plainly contrary to Scripture, and to the sense of right and wrong, they look for some distinction to show that it did not act infallibly in that case. And even when no such distinction can be found, as in the case of the Council of Trent, which all Roman Catholics are expressly bound to believe, by the Creed of Pope Pius IV., yet even in that case, there are numbers of Roman Catholics who would maintain their reverence to Christ, and their good faith and good feeling to men, at all hazard to the doctrine of infallibility. How many Roman Catholics are there in Ireland who know all the things that the Council of Trent has decreed, all the curses that it has pronounced? And if they do not even know of these things, how can they be charged with believing them?

This we believe to be the true reason why so many charges have been brought against Roman Catholics in general, which so many Roman Catholics feel to be false as applied to themselves. But we desire them to consider whether they can be blameless, while they do not take pains to set themselves right. We offer them now the opportunity of doing so; and we entreat and adjure them, by their regard to their own character, and by the love they bear to their country's peace, to vindicate themselves in our pages, to consider the charges that we have stated, and to say whether they believe these things, or whether they would admit any authority as infallible which pretends to decree such things. We look for their answer with anxiety and with hope.

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

In our first number we promised to give some documents, showing the progress of the controversy in the Church of Rome, about the question, whether the Blessed Virgin Mary were conceived subject to original sin, the question about which the present Pope wrote the letter which we gave in that first number.

We wish to go as far back as we can with this history; but we cannot find so much as any mention of the immaculate conception before the year 1139 or 1140. About that time a feast had been introduced in the Church of Lyons, in France, in honour of the immaculate conception. This seems to have been the first time such a thing had ever been heard of in the Catholic Church.

The famous St. Bernard, whom Roman Catholics call "the last and greatest of the Fathers," on hearing of this, wrote a letter to the Church of Lyons (Epistle, 174), in which he says, "We can never enough wonder that some of you could have the boldness to introduce a feast which the church has not the least knowledge of, which is neither supported by reason nor backed by any tradition." He says that this feast was founded on an "alleged revelation, which is destitute of adequate authority" (ib., p. 391); he asks, "How can it be maintained that a conception which proceeds, not from the Holy Ghost, but rather from sin, can be holy? or how could they conjure up a holy day on account of a thing that is not holy in itself?" He says this feast "either honours sin, or authorizes a false holiness."*

"Unde miramur satis, quid visum fuerit hoc tempore quibusdam vestrum voluisse mutare colorem optimum, novam inducendo celebritatem, quam ritus Eccle-

On this important letter, Du Pin, a very learned French Roman Catholic divine, says—"Thus it may be observed that St. Bernard had no very favourable thoughts of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary."

This letter has great weight in many places; but many churches, in various countries, adopted this new feast in spite of St. Bernard; and so all Europe came to be divided about it. How bitterly the two parties contended, we shall see presently.

Now, this was surely a case that called for the judgment of the infallible judge of controversy. Yet we cannot find that he interfered to settle it. FOR THREE HUNDRED YEARS he allowed both parties to fight it out between themselves. The Dominican Friars, established about the year 1218, were all for St. Bernard; the Franciscan Friars, established ten years sooner, were all for the new feast of the immaculate conception; and these two orders spread the controversy over all Europe.

The first attempt made to settle this question was at the Council of Basil, in the year 1439, just THREE HUNDRED YEARS after the controversy arose.

We take the following from the decree passed by the council in their 26th session (Labbé and Cossart, vol. xii., col. 622):—"It is especially proper that there should be peace in questions about the holiness of her by whom peace was diffused throughout the world. Yet, up to this time, a difficult question has been made in various places, and before this holy council, about the conception of that glorious Virgin Mary, the Mother of God, and the beginning of her sanctification; some saying that the Virgin herself and her soul, for some time or some moment of time, were actually subject to original sin; others, on the contrary, saying that, from the beginning of her creation, God conferred upon her that grace in loving, by which, liberating and preserving that blessed person from the original stain, he redeemed her with a higher kind of sanctification, since the Most High himself would establish her, and the Son of God would mould her, that she might be his mother upon earth." Having thus stated the controversy, and borne witness to its long continuance, the decree says that they have considered it fully and for many years, and they go on to settle it thus:—"We define and declare that that doctrine which asserts that the glorious Virgin Mary, Mother of God, by a singular prevenient and operating grace of the Divine Spirit, never was actually subject to original sin, but was always free from all original and actual sin, both holy and immaculate, should be approved, held, and embraced, by all Catholics, as being pious and agreeable to ecclesiastical worship, to Catholic faith, to right reason, and to Holy Scripture, and that, for the future, it shall not be lawful to any one to teach or preach to the contrary."

Was not the question settled now at last, after three hundred years of hard fighting? Stop a moment! Hear the present Pope, in the letter which we published, saying—"This honour has not yet been decreed to the most Holy Virgin by the Church and the Apostolic See!" How comes it that the question was not settled by that decree of the Council of Basil? Alas, the infallible judge seems to be subject to like passions and failings as ourselves. The Council of Basil and the Pope quarrelled with each other. The council thought that they were infallible, and the Pope thought that it was he that was infallible.

Dr. Newman, the rector of the new Irish Catholic university, says in his late book, published since he became a Roman Catholic, that the church has not settled who it is that is infallible. Bishop Milner (a Roman Catholic bishop in England about 35 years ago) says this question is yet in dispute among them (see his book "End of Controversy," letter 12); but he says all Catholics agree that a general council, with a Pope at its head, is infallible. But, alas, the Pope and the Council of Basil were quarrelling among themselves about who should be the greatest! and so they could not agree. And the Pope refused to confirm the decree of the council; and this council now stands in the list of the Church of Rome, as "Disapproved by the Pope," and, therefore, of no force at all.

Now, the present Pope thinks that the decree of the Council of Basil was right, and should have been confirmed. The Pope of that day either thought so too, or he did not. If he did not, which Pope was right? They cannot both be infallible if they thought directly contrary to each other. But if he did think, with the present Pope, that the decree of the council was right, how could he refuse his consent from mere motives of personal pride and spite? Was this like "the Vicar of Christ on earth, speaking in the place of Christ?" Would Christ, then, have acted so himself in such a case?

How was the church the better then of having such an infallible judge? Were matters any better about this controversy afterwards? We shall see.

The next important document on the subject is a decree of Pope Sixtus the Fourth, dated about 44 years later, viz., in 1483.

This Pope complains that, although "the holy Roman Church publicly and solemnly celebrates the feast of the undefiled and always Virgin Mary, and has appointed a special and proper office on account of it, yet some preachers of various orders, as we hear, in their sermons to the people, publicly through various states and countries, have not blushed hitherto to affirm, and do not cease daily to preach ——" And what did they preach? This Pope goes on to tell: here is what they preached—"That all those who hold or maintain that that glorious and immaculate mother of God was conceived without stain of original sin, DO SIN MORTALLY, OR ARE HERETICS." But this was not all. This Pope goes on to tell more of their preaching—"That those who celebrate the office of her immaculate conception, or who listen to the sermons of those who affirm that she was conceived without stain of this kind, do sin grievously."

We could have no better testimony of how bitterly this controversy raged. Just imagine a number of the preachers of the Church of Rome, in so many countries, all preaching publicly, that it was a MORTAL SIN to attend on one of the authorised services of the Church of Rome! Roman Catholics are often fond of finding out any differences or disputes that may exist in the Church of England and Ireland; but did they ever hear of any of her preachers publicly preaching to the people, that it was a MORTAL SIN to attend one of her services? Yet Pope Sixtus says, that this had been long going on, and was then actually going on, in the Church of Rome, through so many states and countries! Well might Pope Sixtus add, as he does, "From which preaching heavy scandals have arisen in the minds of the faithful; and greater scandals are, with reason, feared to arise from day to day."

Surely, if ever there was a case that called loudly for the infallible judge of the Church of Rome to interfere, and decide which side was right, this was the case. So Pope Sixtus seems to have thought; for he goes on to say—"Now we, wishing to obviate such rash darings, and the perverse assertions and scandals which may thence arise in the Church of God, SO FAR AS IT IS GIVEN TO US FROM ON HIGH." Nations attend; and listen to him whom millions believe to be the Vicar of Christ on earth—the infallible judge of all controversies! He, of whom the Synod of Thurles lately said, that he speaks in the person of Peter, and in the name of Christ. Behold, he is now going at last to put forth the whole strength of his infallibility and to settle this question, "so FAR AS IT IS GIVEN TO HIM FROM ON HIGH!" and what is the result? What is the decree? Which side is right? Are we not in breathless expectation to learn? Alas, for the disappointment of our expectations! Pope Sixtus merely goes on to forbid EITHER party to say that the other is wrong, under pain of excommunication; neither party may say that the other are heretics, or sinful! and why? "Because," says Pope Sixtus, with all becoming gravity,—"Because it has not yet been decided by the Roman Church and the Apostolic See!!!" Was not that a good reason to give for not then deciding it, when he was at the moment professing to settle the question, "SO FAR AS IT WAS GIVEN TO HIM FROM ON HIGH?" Who is not tempted to exclaim, "Away with such an infallible judge!" If he can do no better than this, in performance of his great pretensions and promises, he is no better than a shame and a reproach to Christ, whose vicar he pretends to be; to the Church, whose controversies he pretends to settle! This decree of Pope Sixtus may be found in the appendix of any of the authorized editions of the Council of Trent.

And so the controversy went on, each party authorized to hold his own opinion, neither allowed to say that the contrary opinion was heresy or sinful.

One more attempt was made to settle this great question. And now there seemed to be hope; for it was the tribunal which all Roman Catholics are bound to admit as infallible, a general council with the Pope at its head—the Council of Trent and the Pope.

But after great discussion, that infallible tribunal came to the conclusion that all they could attempt to do, was to do nothing! They passed a decree, affirming that all mankind were born under original sin, and then they added to it this—"This Holy Council, however, declares, that it is not their intention to include in this decree, where they treat of original sin, the blessed and immaculate Virgin Mary, Mother of God; but that the constitutions of Pope Sixtus the Fourth, of blessed memory, which it renews, are to be observed, under the penalties contained in those constitutions" (Session v.)—that is, the decree of Pope Sixtus, which we have given above. So that all the Council of Trent, and the Pope along with them, could do, was to renew the decree of Sixtus, leaving each party at liberty to hold its own opinion, and only forbidding either to call the other heretics.

And why could not the infallible Council of Trent and the Pope himself settle it? Historians relate, that each party was ready to resist the Council and the Pope too, if he should decide against themselves: and so they agreed in this much, that they would not have any decision, but would go on as they did before. If this were so, is it possible to think that they themselves really believed in their own claim to infallibility?

But some Roman Catholic writers give a different reason why the church never settled this question. Bishop Milner says—"The church does not decide the controversy concerning the conception of the Blessed Virgin, and several other disputed points, because she sees nothing absolutely clear and certain concerning sæ nescit, non probat ratio, non commendat antiqua traditio?"

"Sed proferatur scriptum supernæ, ut aiunt, revelationis. Ipse mihi facile persuadeo scriptis talibus non moveri, quibus nec ratio suppeditare, nec certa invenitur favere auctoritas."

"Cum hæc ita se habeant, quænam jam erit festivæ ratio conceptionis? Quo pacto, inquam, aut sanctus asseretur conceptus, qui de spiritu sancto non est, ne dicam de peccato est? Aut festus habebitur, qui minime sanctus est? Libenter Gloriosa hoc honore carebit, quo vel peccatum honorari, vel falsa videtur induci sanctitas."

them, either in the written or unwritten word, and, therefore, leaves her children to form their own opinions concerning them." Now, if the church can find no proof, in either Scripture or tradition, that Christ or his Apostles taught this doctrine, it might be a very good reason for the church warning her children not to believe the doctrine at all. But it seems a very bad reason for the church to leave her children to believe upon their own private judgment, without any help or guidance from her, things which the church herself says she cannot form any opinion about, since they cannot be proved either from Scripture or tradition.

What a multitude of errors and superstitions must creep into any church which follows such a plan as this, in guiding, or rather in not guiding, her children? Surely, it would be well to teach men to believe what Christ and his Apostles taught, and nothing else.

But what becomes of Bishop Milner's reason, when the Pope now declares, in his letter, that he is willing "to define, AS A DOCTRINE OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, that the conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary was immaculate, and wholly free from all stain of original sin?" Is he going to define, as a doctrine of the Catholic Church, what that church has never yet been able to find in either the written or unwritten word? He says that he would like to do this; but it is not done yet. But he has written to every Roman Catholic bishop in the world, asking their advice, and also asking WHETHER THE LAITY WISH HIM TO DO SO. Now, we know that at the Synod of Thurles, two years and a half ago, all the Irish Roman Catholic bishops wrote to him, asking him to do this; and very probably they have told him that all the Irish laity do wish for it. Now, we believe that this is far from being the case. We believe that the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland do expect and require that their priests, and their bishops, and their Pope too, should teach them exactly that Gospel which Christ and his Apostles preached; and that they will not submit to the Pope defining as an article of the Catholic faith, what the church has never yet been able to find in either Scripture or tradition. We have been greatly struck by an observation made by an intelligent Roman Catholic layman, on reading the Pope's letter in our first number—"What is the Pope about?" he said; "does he want to brand us all as idolaters, as we are so often called?" This and many other such things confirm us in our opinion, that the laity are not willing to let this question be now settled as the Pope intends, and that we have done right in giving them this opportunity of expressing their sentiments, before the Pope may do it, under the notion that they all wish for it.

We cannot conclude without telling them how this question has been settled in the Church of England and Ireland. There has never been any dispute about it there, nor among any Protestants. Not that the Church does not reverence the Blessed Virgin Mary; her own song, in which she says "All generations shall call me blessed," is always sung at their evening service. But there is no dispute with them about this, because they take it to the Bible to be settled; and they go to the song of the Blessed Virgin herself, and they hear her saying, "My spirit hath rejoiced in God MY SAVIOUR." Now, it is only sinners who need a Saviour; and, therefore, she knew that she was a sinner, when she called him her Saviour. She knew that she needed him to save her from her original sin.

We submit it to laymen, whether it might not be well sometimes to try if they could settle a question in this simple way, by the word of God, or those who were inspired by him, instead of looking to the decision of an infallible judge, who has kept the world waiting for a decision of this question for SEVEN HUNDRED AND TWELVE YEARS.

We shall have to return again to some other points connected with the Pope's letter.

THE SEARCH AFTER INFALLIBILITY.

BY HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP OF DUBLIN.

PART II.

It has been shown, that it might be fairly argued from the very passage in the Book of Acts before quoted, that there is not upon earth an infallible interpreter of the Word of God, and that God never intended that there should be; because there is no mention of anything of the kind, nor even any allusion to it, in a discourse of the Apostle Paul's in which he could not have failed to mention it, had it existed. But there are many other considerations from which the same conclusion follows:—

1. For instance; the unfitness of men in general to judge rightly of things belonging to religion, is the great reason from which is argued the necessity for an infallible interpreter. And yet this very argument destroys the main conclusion which it is brought to prove. For it allows at the outset, that men are fit to decide by their own judgment, that most difficult question as to the claim of any particular church, party, or person, to be that interpreter. Certain passages of Scripture are alleged as proving, that a certain church is the infallible guide, appointed by Providence to take the place of our private judgment, which, it is said, is incapable of deciding rightly as to the meaning of Scripture. But how am I to know that this is the true sense of those passages? If we are fit to judge of their meaning, then it cannot fairly be denied, that we are fit to judge of, and to understand other parts of Scripture also; and the alleged necessity for an infallible interpreter must be given up. If we are not capable of judging of the meaning of any doubtful passages, then, though we may allow the necessity for an unerring interpreter, we can never be sure that we have found one.

If we go, as men very commonly do, to explain exactly, according to the direction of some supposed infallible guide, and in full reliance upon him, those very passages of the Bible which are brought forward to show the necessity for such a guide, it must be quite plain that we are taking as proved, the very thing that we want to prove—we are taking his words as if they were infallible, that is, certainly true, in order to enable us to prove that he is infallible. And the same may be said with respect to those who, instead of any church of the present time, appeal to the "primitive Church," and the "consent or agreement, in opinion, of the fathers"—meaning the common belief of all right-minded writers of the first ages after the Apostles.

Whether that primitive church, and those first ages, shall extend to three hundred years, or four, five, six, or seven hundred years after Christ; and which of the fathers are to be enrolled among the orthodox or right-thinking; and what are the doctrines they taught in books forty times larger than the Bible, and capable of quite as great a variety of meanings—all these are questions to be decided, in the first instance, by those who are supposed to be unfit to judge, and who, for that very reason, are to rely entirely on an infallible guide. This is like telling them that, because they cannot steer their course without a pilot, they must make a dangerous voyage to a distant port in order to find one.

And the case is much the same with those who promise to others, or lay claim to themselves, such an inspiration from Heaven as shall make all exercise of reason unnecessary, and hinder the possibility of error. The exercise of reason is called for in the highest degree, and mistakes the most fatal are to be dreaded in deciding on the opposite claims laid before us—on the claims of those who, while they teach the most contrary doctrines, all profess alike to be under the immediate direction of the Holy Spirit, and all fail in giving proof of it, as the Apostles did, by working miracles that could be judged of by the eyes and ears, in the presence of all, whether believers or unbelievers. The alleged necessity, therefore, for an infallible interpreter, does, of itself, shut out from a thoughtful mind the hope of obtaining one. For the reason given for that necessity is such a supposed want of power in us, for judging rightly, as must equally unfit us for judging about the claims of those who offer to guide us.

Some persons have attempted to lay it down as a maxim, that we are bound to receive and believe whatever has been received and "believed always by all true Christians, in every place." This saying is constantly brought forward, and praised in the present day, in such a manner as seems strange and unaccountable. That whatever is believed, and always has been, by all Christians, everywhere, as a part of the Christian faith, is perfectly true; but it is a truth which cannot possibly be called in or used to settle any question in dispute; since it is evident, that it relates expressly and exclusively to such points as never have been disputed among Christians.

But it is probable that those who appeal—or, rather, who pretend to appeal—to this maxim, do, in reality, mean by "all," merely "all the orthodox," or those who think rightly. And who are the orthodox? Those, we should be told, whom most persons consider such; and as each would be likely to apply that term to those whose doctrines he approves, the result will be, that the belief of the greater number is to be the stamp or mark of orthodox or right belief; and that this again is to represent universal (or catholic) belief; and, finally, that this so-called universal belief is to be the test or measure of Gospel Truth. By this rule, who were the orthodox, and who the true worshippers in Israel, when Elijah alone was left of the Lord's prophets, while Baal's prophets were 450 men?—I. Kings xviii. 22.

2. Again, the necessity, we are told, is for an infallible interpreter to whom all can easily go. And this no church can even pretend to have provided. Supposing an infallible church to exist in the most convenient position that could be found, still it is not one Christian in ten thousand that could apply directly to its supreme governors. Each individual may, indeed, use its forms of prayer and of belief, and may think them equal in authority to Scripture; but he can be no more fit to interpret the one than the other, or to put in anything left out; he is still in want of an infallible guide to direct him how to agree exactly with his church, and to obey it. And this guide must be, to the great mass of mankind, the pastor or minister under whom each is placed. The pastor's agreement with the church must be taken on his own word. If he be either ignorant, or mistaken, or dishonest; if, in short, every individual pastor be not himself infallible, the Christian people, whose unfitness to judge for themselves has been all along supposed, may be as much misled as in their reading of the Scriptures for themselves.

3. Moreover, the claim to freedom from error and from dissension, if put forth by any church which claims also to include within it all Christians, is thereby at once destroyed. If, indeed, any one claims infallibility, on the ground of personal inspiration in himself, or in the leader he follows, he can only be met by asking him to prove, by the performance of miracles, before our eyes, that his pretensions to this inspiration are better founded than those of others, who differ from him. But when the two claims to freedom from error, and to universality, are both put forward by the same church, they mutually destroy each other, by its being impossible that these two things can exist together in the same church, at the same time. If there be any universal church, of which all professing Christians are members, even though disobedient members—subjects and children, even though undutiful and rebellious—then, that church is manifestly not free from error and dissension; as is plain from the differences and controversies existing among Christians, and the refusal of many of them to submit to the decrees of that church. If, again, there be any church that is free from error among its members, it is, for the same reason, manifestly not universal. We may imagine such a thing as a church, to whose dominion and decisions all Christians ought to submit; but, unless all do thus submit, it cannot properly be called universal.

Vain are the attempts made to get rid of this objection, by urging that all false doctrines are condemned by the authorities of the church, and that the guilt of schism lies upon all who do not obey them. Freedom from error, in any community, consists not in the condemnation of error, but in its not existing among the members of that community. Universality consists not in a claim to universal dominion over all Christians, but in the submission of all Christians. Otherwise there is no sect so small and inconsiderable, that might not pretend, on equally good grounds, to be the universal and unerring church. It might plead that its doctrines were received by all except heretics, and its supremacy acknowledged by all except schismatics: denouncing all as heretics and schismatics who did not receive these doctrines, and submit to that dominion. And this is merely saying, in other words, that all agree with it except those who disagree, and that all submit except such as refuse submission.

The claims, therefore, if so explained, come to nothing. If not so explained, but taken in the natural sense of the words used, they are proved to be false by undeniable and notorious facts.

From these and similar considerations, a thoughtful mind can hardly fail to see, that an infallible guide within the reach of all, such as shall take the place of all exercise of private judgment, and render unnecessary all watchful care and inquiry, and shall hinder all possibility of mistake, has not been in fact provided. And if he still cling to the belief of the necessity for such a guide, as absolutely required with a divine revelation, his road to infidelity is straight and short.

Numbers there are, no doubt, who do not follow up such principles to what they regularly lead to; many, from want of the habit of thinking, and whose minds have not been cultivated; and others from resolutely avoiding all reasoning and all examination, because they have determined to be believers, and consider their faith to be both the more praiseworthy, and also the more safe, the less they reflect and examine. They fear the very danger above alluded to—that reasoning will lead to infidelity; and they seek to escape this danger, not by putting aside the false notion from which that reasoning sets out, but by avoiding all reasoning, and stopping all inquiry and reflection.

But this freedom from all uneasy doubt—a desire for which leads to the craving for infallibility—this, after all, is not always attained by such a plan of acting. A lurking suspicion will often remain in the mind, which a man vainly endeavours to stifle, that the foundation is not sound. The building, indeed, may be complete. Let it be once settled, that the Church, Sect, Party, or Leader, we have taken for our guide, is perfectly infallible, and there is an end of all doubts and cares respecting particular points. But an uneasy doubt will sometimes haunt a man, in spite of his endeavours to keep it down, and however earnestly he may deny, even to himself, its existence—whether the infallibility claimed, which is the foundation of the whole building, be really well established. A suspicion will occasionally cross the mind, however anxiously resisted, "IS THERE NOT A LIE IN MY RIGHT HAND?" And the unwillingness often shewn to examine the foundation, and ascertain whether it is really sound, is a proof, not of full confidence in its firmness, but of a lurking suspicion that it will not bear examination.

It is thus that the craving after the ease of mind produced by infallible certainty is likely to defeat its own object. Many, however, no doubt, do really enjoy the confidence of mind which they boast of, though without any sufficient grounds for it. And many, we may expect, will complain of, and find fault with, and reject, what has been here said, on the ground that it is a "cheerless" doctrine. And this charge is, to a certain extent, true. To be told to "work out our own salvation with fear and trembling," may be less "cheering" than to be told, that we have no need for any fear and trembling. When Paul "ceased not for three years to warn every one, night and day, with TEARS," it was not, certainly, because he judged this to be the most cheering to his people, but because he knew it to be the most for their real good, and the most conformable to truth. It was precisely because he was aware that painstaking watchfulness is less agreeable than confident and boastful ease—it was for this very reason, doubtless, that he was so diligent in these warnings, lest any of his people should be—as so many are now, and in every age—led away blindfolded by their wishes, and flattered to their ruin by deceitful teachers. It is a common error, and one which men always need to be put on their guard against, to trust to boastful promises and to lean upon pleasant and cheering hopes, without examining well whether these promises and hopes can reasonably be depended on.

But it is the part of true wisdom not to lose, in a vain search after what Providence has denied us, the advantages which it does place within our reach.

Difficult indeed it is—or, rather, impossible—for us to understand why God has dealt with man as he has. We may be unable to answer the question, why the revelation he has bestowed has not been accompanied by the gift of an infallible interpreter on earth, within the reach of all men, and hindering all possibility of doubt as to the meaning of any part of it. It may be hard to explain why, both in this and in many other most important matters also, man should have been left to act on his own responsibility, and according to the best of his own fallible judgment; exposed to various dangers, and called on for the exercise of that watchful care, which, we find, is in point of fact, often not exercised. We may be unable, in short, to understand why earth is not heaven—why EVIL of any kind is permitted to exist.

All this we may be unable to explain; but our inability to explain will not alter facts; and it is for us to make the best use of things as they are, instead of wondering or seeking to understand why they were not made otherwise.

That false humility above alluded to, the entire dependence on fallible man, must be discarded; and true humility must take its place. Instead of considering what, according to our notions, God must have done, or ought to have done, we should inquire what he has done; and what use we are allowed and expected to make of it.

If we inquire whether the Holy Scriptures did really come from him, we shall find proof abundantly sufficient to satisfy an honest and humble mind; but not sufficient —strange this may appear to us—to force conviction on the dishonest and proud. And if we inquire for what purposes the Scriptures were given, and how we are to make use of the gift, they will themselves abundantly teach us. They were evidently given us to enlighten the path of those who will open their eyes to the light, and take heed to their steps; but not of such as love darkness better than light, or view the light through the blackened glass of their own prejudices and inclinations, or give themselves up to be led blindfold by blind guides. They were given not to make diligence and watchful care unnecessary, but to teach us to exercise them. They abound (as we have seen) in warnings of the danger of perversions and false doctrines. And they bid Christian ministers "take heed to themselves and to the flocks committed to their care." The pastor is to study, to the best of his power, to attain to the true meaning of them himself, and to explain that meaning to his people; but with a full conviction and confession of his own fallibility.

To complain of this—to reject or undervalue the revelation God has bestowed, urging that it is no revelation to us, or an insufficient one, because unerring certainty is not bestowed also—because we are required to exercise patient diligence, and watchfulness, and candour, and humble self-distrust—this would be as unreasonable as to make light of and reject the bountiful gift of eye-sight, because men's eyes have sometimes deceived them—because men have mistaken a picture for the object imitated, or the dazzling mirage of the desert for a lake; and have fancied they had the evidence of sight for the sun's motion; and to conclude from all this that we ought to blindfold ourselves, and be led henceforth by some guide who pretends to be himself not liable to such mistakes.

The two great books—that of nature and that of revelation—which God has opened before us for our benefit, are in this respect like each other. Both are, in themselves, free from all error: but they do not give complete freedom from all possibility of error to the person who studies them. As the laws of nature are in themselves unchangeable, but yet are sometimes imperfectly known, and sometimes mistaken, by natural philosophers, so the Scriptures are in themselves infallible, but do not give infallibility to the student of them. Even by the most learned, they are in many parts imperfectly understood; by the "unlearned and unstable" they are liable to be "wrested to their own destruction."

We have, indeed, the gracious promise of God's Holy Spirit to "help our infirmities," both in respect of our faith and of our conduct; to guard us not only against error in doctrine or opinion, but also, no less, against sin; to further our growth both in grace, and also in the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. And we are sure that, as far as we are under the guidance of that spirit, we cannot but be right both in our belief and our practice.

But how far we are in each instance thus guided we must not presume to pronounce with certainty. "It is God that worketh in us, both to will and to do" (and we may add, to judge and believe also) "of his good pleasure;" but this is given by the Apostle as a reason, not for sitting down in careless and self-confident security, but that we should "work out our own salvation with fear and trembling." And this same anxious and diligent care must be shown, among other things, in our study of God's Holy Word.

"If we say that we have no sin"—and, equally, if we say that we have no error—"we deceive ourselves:" for, whatever part of our conduct, and of our opinions, may be, in fact, perfectly right, we are not authorized confidently to pronounce that it is so. "I judge not," says the Apostle Paul, "mine own self, for I know nothing by myself"—i.e., I am not conscious of any failure in my ministerial duties — "yet am I not hereby justified; but he that judgeth me is the Lord."

Let Christians, then, listen to this blessed Apostle; learn what he has taught; and attend to the warnings he has given. And let them not be persuaded by any one to think, that by doing this, they will be thrown into distressing and incurable doubts and perplexities. Let them not fear that, by forbearing to forestall the judgment of the last day—by not presuming to dictate to the Most High, and boldly to pronounce in what way he must have given a revelation to man—by renouncing all pretensions to infallibility, whether immediate in themselves, or derived from others—by owning themselves to be neither beyond the reach of sin nor of error (both claims are alike groundless), and by consenting to undergo those trials of watchfulness and of patience which God has appointed for them —let them not fear that by this they will forfeit all cheerful hope of final salvation, all "joy and peace in believing." The reverse of all this is the true state of the case.

As far as any one is conscious of striving, with humble prayer for divine aid, to do his best, in the way God has directed, he may reasonably hope to be preserved from all fatal errors and deadly sins; and he may trust that any mistakes into which he may have fallen, not through carelessness or perversity, but from mere error of judgment or unavoidable ignorance, will not be imputed to him as sins, but that he will "be accepted according to that he hath, and not according to that he hath not."

Those have, in reality, more to fear, who, professing to renounce all private judgment, have based their whole system of faith on human suppositions as to what a divine revelation must necessarily be; and who have shut their eyes to many plain warnings of our Lord and his Apostles, "to take heed to ourselves." Paul has declared, that if even "an angel from heaven preach any other gospel than that which he has delivered, let him be accursed;" and he has left us a written record of his teachings, with which to compare whatever is proposed for our acceptance as gospel truth; and thus, according to our Lord's precept, judging of the tree by its fruits. Great, then, must be the danger of those who, in fact, reverse this precept, and judge of the fruits by the tree; by at once concluding, that whatever is taught by the Holy Church, or whatever such and such a person professes to have had revealed to him from heaven, and to be moved by the Holy Spirit to utter, must be gospel truth, however contrary to God's written Word.

And as their real danger is great, so they do not always succeed even in lulling themselves into complete ease of mind. While they crave for more than God has given, and will not be satisfied without that infallible certainty of freedom from error which would cut off all need of watchfulness against error, and of inquiry after truth, they often (besides raising on a false foundation a building of error) fail also of that confident repose and peace of mind which they have aimed at. And those, on the other hand, who, in true humility, set themselves to act exactly according to God's directions, will be partakers of his promised blessings. While such Christians as have sought rather for peace —for ease of mind, and satisfaction—than for truth, will often fail both of truth and peace, those of the opposite disposition are more likely to attain both from their Gracious Master. He has taught us to "take heed that we be not deceived," and to "beware of false prophets;" and he has promised us his own peace and heavenly comfort. He has bid us to watch and pray; he has taught us, through his blessed Apostle, to "take heed to ourselves," and to "work out our salvation with fear and trembling," and he has declared through the same Apostle, "that he worketh in us;" he has bid us rejoice in hope; he has promised that he "will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able to bear;" and he has taught us to look forward to the time when we shall no longer see as by means of a mirror "darkly, but face to face"—when we shall know, not in part, but even as we are known (I. Cor. xiii. 12)—when faith shall be succeeded by certainty and hope be ripened into enjoyment. His precepts and his promises go together. His support and comfort are given to those who seek for them in the way he has himself appointed. Let Christians, then, trust in God, and not transfer their allegiance to uninspired man. Let them search the Scriptures (like the Bereans of old), "to see whether those things be so" which they are taught: "let them prove all things, and hold fast that which is right;" and not be led away, by bold assertions and arrogant pretensions, into those corruptions of gospel truth which will always, from time to time, arise within the Church. So shall they be enabled to "take up the serpents" they will meet with; and "if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them."

DOES THE ROMAN CHURCH REALLY BELIEVE IN ITS OWN CLAIM TO THE POSSESSION OF AN INFALLIBLE GUIDE?

(From the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal.)

The history of the controversy respecting the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin will strikingly illustrate the remarks which we have already made. In the beginning of the fourteenth century the famous Franciscan schoolman, John Scot, had stated the matter thus—God (he said) was able either to exempt the Virgin altogether from original sin, or to suffer her to remain under it for an infinitesimal moment, or for a longer time. God alone knows (he added) which of these three possibilities is true; but the first is probable, unless it be contrary to Scripture or to the authority of the Church.

The Franciscan order afterwards adopted zealously this opinion, but maintained as absolutely certain, what Scotus had only ventured to pronounce probable; still, however, with the proviso that it be not contrary to the Catholic faith.

The Dominicans, on the other hand, armed with the authority of St. Bernard, and of their famous doctor St. Thomas Aquinas, combated this doctrine vehemently, as contrary to Scripture and to the tradition of the Church, and, therefore, contrary to the Catholic faith.

Still the opinion of the Franciscans grew in popular favour. It had an appearance of piety which recommended it to the devout. The University of Paris formally decided in its favour; and the Council of Basle, after much debate, declared it to be a pious opinion, not contrary to Scripture or Catholic faith, and, therefore, prohibited public teaching or preaching on the other side. Pope Sixtus IV., himself a Franciscan, threw the weight of his authority into the same scale. In 1476, he published a Bull, approving a new office for Festival of the Immaculate Conception, and granting indulgences to those who recited it or assisted at it. In 1483, he issued another Bull, condemning those who called the doctrine of the immaculate conception a heresy, and the celebration of the festival of it a sin.

The Dominicans, however, did not consider themselves in any way bound by these Bulls; and the controversy continued to rage as fiercely as ever. The annual recurrence of the Feast of the Conception was a signal for the renewal of the hostilities; and gave birth every year to scenes of the most scandalous kind. But it is remarkable, that neither of the contending parties ever thought of appealing to the supposed infallible tribunal, in whose Divine authority both, nevertheless, professed to believe. They were content to fight and argue as if they had no such unerring judge of controversies; they disputed, and lost their temper in disputing, just like other men. Is it possible, then, to suppose that they really believed themselves to be the disciples of an infallible guide?

At length came the Council of Trent; and when the doctrine of original sin was there to be discussed, the Franciscans contended that an exception should be made in favour of the Blessed Virgin, in the decree which asserted generally that the sin of Adam had passed upon all his posterity. The Dominicans, on the other hand, contended, that no such exception was necessary, because St. Paul and the holy Fathers had expressed this doctrine generally, without making any exception in favour of the Virgin. This raised a warm debate on the doctrine of the immaculate conception. The Franciscans maintained that the Church, by celebrating the Festival of the Conception, had sanctioned their doctrine. The Dominicans admitted that the doctrine had, indeed, been tolerated by the Church; but argued that there was no ground, either in Holy Scripture or in sound theology, for exempting the Blessed Virgin from the common infection of our nature.

When the existence of this dispute was made known at Rome, instead of embracing the opportunity of having it finally decided by the infallible authority of the Council, orders were given to the Papal Legates, at Trent, to reconcile the contending parties as far as possible, without giving a triumph to either. The directions were—"Not to meddle with this matter, which might cause a schism amongst Catholics; to endeavour to maintain peace between the opposing parties, and to seek some means of giving them equal satisfaction; above all, to observe strictly the brief of Pope Sixtus IV., which prohibited preachers from taxing the doctrine of the immaculate conception with heresy."*

There directions were, no doubt (under the circumstances), eminently wise and prudent; but do they not most clearly show, that the Pope did not believe his own pretence to infallibility, and knew also that his followers did not believe it? Else why not take the present opportunity of settling, by an infallible authority, a controversy which had so long disturbed the church? But to meddle in the matter—that is to say, to decide the question one way or another, might cause a schism amongst Catholics. In other words, these "Catholics," whatever they may pretend, did not really believe in the infallibility of the Pope and Council. Else why should they not desire to have the truth infallibly ascertained? and why should there be any danger of a schism, after the infallible judgment was given? No person would surely be mad enough to separate himself from the church, in consequence of a decision which he believed to be infallibly true, and to have emanated from a supernatural and divinely promised guidance. The only mode of accounting for the conduct of the Pope and of the Council, on this occasion, is to suppose that neither one nor the other really believed in the pretence to infallibility. Acting is, after all, the real test of faith; and here the Pope acts exactly as any prudent, well-advised sovereign would act under similar circumstances—endeavouring to avoid a decision that must irritate one party or the other, and in the meantime seeking to conciliate both parties as much as possible. Although he speaks boldly and loudly before the world of his infallible authority, and of the great blessing of being in a church where there is an infallible tribunal for settling all disputes, yet to "Catholics" he says nothing of all this; on the contrary, he is fully alive to the danger of a schism amongst Catholics, if the infallible tribunal should happen to give an unpalatable decision—in other words, the Pope acts as one who was fully aware that he possessed no infallible tribunal, and as knowing, also, that his "Catholics" believed nothing of the sort, and would run into schism rather than submit to the pretended authority of his infallibility, if it should happen to run counter to their private opinions.

It is impossible to have a clearer proof than this that the Roman communion do not, practically, believe in their own claim to infallibility.

Here, however, we are told that this doctrine of the immaculate conception is not of faith, and, therefore, the promise of infallible guidance does not extend to the settlement of the question.

But if the boasted gift of infallibility does not enable the Roman Church to settle such a controversy as this, the advantages of the gift are very much less than its advocates are wont to pretend. If the infallible judge of controversy is unable to decide any controversy, except one in which some vital article of faith is at stake, we are no longer secured in that communion from all error, but only from the extreme error which uproots the faith. All other controversies and errors may exist, and produce in this infallible church the same evil fruits which they have brought forth and do bring forth in other communions.

But here the real question is, whether this doctrine be of faith or not. For they who maintain the immaculate conception maintain it as of faith; whilst they who deny its truth, deny it on the ground of its being inconsistent with an article of faith. Is the infallible tribunal, then, unable to tell its children whether this doctrine is to be believed and received as of faith, or whether it is to be rejected as inconsistent with other articles of faith? For this is the question at issue.

In point of fact, the infallible tribunal has permitted its children to hold inconsistent and opposite views on this subject, and to carry those views out into inconsistent and opposite practice. On the one hand, the advocates of the doctrine (since the twelfth century) have been permitted, and even encouraged, to celebrate an annual festival in honour of the immaculate conception, and to render that doctrine the same reverence in the public service of the church and in their public teaching, as they render to the Incarnation of our blessed Lord himself. What is this but to treat it as an article of faith? And if there were any doubt that it is and must be practically so regarded, that proof would be afforded by the collect in the office for that festival, which was approved by Pope Sixtus IV. In this collect God is addressed, without any doubt or qualification, as having "prepared, by the immaculate conception of the Virgin, an habitation worthy of his Son;" and the faithful are taught to pray to the Almighty, that as God had preserved her from all stain, so by her intercession, he would grant us to come purified into his presence. "Deus qui per immaculatam Virginis conceptionem dignum Filio tuo habitaculum præparasti, concede, quæsumus, ut sicut ex morte ejusdem Filii tui prævisa, eam ab omni labe præservasti, ita nos quoque mundos, ejus intercessione, ad te pervenire concedas."

Here the fact of the immaculate conception is pleaded in prayer with the Almighty as an article of faith, without any doubt or hesitation. It is not possible to imagine how faith can be expressed in a more effectual manner than when it is thus pleaded before God in prayer. It is thus that the church, in the collects for the highest festivals of our religion, pleads in prayer to God the doctrines of the Incarnation, the Epiphany, the Circumcision, the Resurrection, the Coming of the Holy Ghost, the Holy Trinity, the Ascension; and it is difficult to conceive in what more solemn way our faith in an article of faith could be evidenced or expressed.

The infallibility of the Roman Church has, therefore, permitted this doctrine of the immaculate conception to be practically made an article of faith in the most solemn offices of religion, whilst, at the same time, it tolerates, in a large and influential body, an absolute denial of the doctrine. Does not this savour greatly of worldly policy, and manifestly show that the authorities in the Church of Rome do not really believe their pretended infallible tribunal to be infallible? The pretence that this doctrine is not de fide, will not serve their turn here, because they have practically made it to be de fide to a large and increasing body in their communion, by sanctioning and tolerating the Festival and Office of the Immaculate Conception.

And more than this, divines are permitted, without censure, to connect that doctrine with articles of faith in such a way that, if we receive their statements, a belief in the immaculate conception is necessary to the reception of the faith. For example:—"It is impossible to believe," says Bernardinus, of Sienne, "that the Son of God could have consented to be born of the Virgin, or to have taken upon Him her flesh, if that flesh had ever had a taint of original sin."† What is this but an assertion that the Incarnation of the Son of God is incredible, unless we receive with it the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin? "It is impossible," says this author, "to believe the Incarnation, unless we believe also the immaculate conception of the Virgin;" and yet this assertion is tolerated without censure in a church which continues to exercise the power of censuring all books, even by those authors who are not of its communion.

One cannot imagine a stronger form in which a doctrine can be declared to be an article of faith, than by asserting that unless it be received, the doctrine of the Incarnation is incredible. The Church of Rome has tolerated and sanctioned this assertion, and yet seeks to escape from the inconvenience of tolerating also an opposite doctrine, by pretending that the immaculate conception is only a pious belief of the Church, and not an article of faith.

And accordingly we find that as the strength of the party who were opposed to this doctrine declined, the voice of the Holy See became more and more strong in its favour. In 1616, Paul V. prohibited all preaching, lectures, or public teaching against the immaculate conception—a decree which was again renewed in 1622 by Gregory XV., who extended the prohibition to books and private conversations, reserving, however, an exception in favour of those to whom the Holy See might give a special commission to oppose this doctrine.‡

So that the infallible judge reserves to himself the power of allowing one party in the Church, by a special indulgence, to contravene and refute a doctrine, for which he appoints, at the instance of another party, a special festival with a collect, making it, for those who use that office, an article of faith. He prohibits one party from impugning, even in private conversation, this favoured doctrine, but permits the opposite party to assert and teach openly, that except it be received, the very Incarnation of our Lord is incredible.

All this shows the prudence with which, not only the See of Rome, but the Council of Trent, felt it necessary to act in this matter. The inclination of the heads of the Roman Church has always been to declare this doctrine an article of faith, if they dared to do so, and every day one step after another is made in this direction. A very recent Papal ordinance, directed to the Congregation of Rites, has authorised the introduction of this doctrine into the public service of the church for the festival of the 8th December, amongst the Roman Catholics of Italy, Spain, France, England, Germany, and America, who, it seems, have petitioned to be permitted to add the adjective immaculata to the word conceptione, in the proper preface for that day. This doctrine is, therefore, now practically an article of faith amongst Romanists, in all these countries, and yet the infallible judge of controversies still prudently holds back, and forbears to pronounce that an article of faith, for the whole Church, which he has permitted so large a portion of his followers to embrace as such. In a few years the party opposed to the immaculate conception will probably be extinct, and then, no doubt, we shall find that the prudence of the Holy See, when the fear of causing schism is removed, will take another turn, and a new article of faith will be added to the Tridentine Creed.

All this seems strangely inconsistent with a confident belief in the existence of infallibility. It is the same sort of tortuous and prudent policy that is usually adopted by worldly politicians who have an object to carry, and who fear to give offence to a powerful minority. One party is permitted to go the whole length of celebrating a festival, and introducing their peculiar doctrine as an article of faith into the collect and proper preface for the day. The opposite party are forbidden to preach publicly, or to provoke the hostility of their opponents by troublesome discussions, whether public or private, but receive, nevertheless, a peculiar exemption from the necessity of using any office, or celebrating any festival in which the obnoxious doctrine is assumed—nay, they receive also a private indulgence, enabling them, in their own schools, to teach the opposite doctrine, and all this avowedly from prudence, lest, if the infallible judge should decide in favour of one party, the other should break out into schism.

It is evident, therefore, that neither the contending parties, nor the court of Rome itself, are believers in their own pretence to the possession of an infallible tribunal.

Review.

Love and Loyalty. By the Author of Irrelagh. London: William Pickering. 1851.

We understand this graceful little poem has had the honour of being presented to Her Majesty, and has been graciously received. The welfare of Ireland is evidently dear to the heart of its author, who thus pleads for Erin—

"Nor let the noble oak that stems the blast
Neglect the graceful vine around it cast,
When timely succour might its health restore,
And bid its drooping branches flourish more.
Remember, in thy glance on trophies won,
Thy conquering Wellington is Erin's son.
Around thy brow is not one laurel band,
But hath some flower transplanted from her land.
Her gallant mariners have died to keep
Thy naval flag victorious o'er the deep.
Her pulpit eloquence hath charmed thine ear;
Her manly sense thy senate paused to hear,
And in sweet interchange of kindness flown
Hast seldom failed, nor wilt thou fail her now.

Through the deep waters, guided by her God,
And meekly bending 'neath his chast'ning rod,
The long afflicted hears a still, small voice
Bidding her deeply-stricken heart rejoice.
Thousands, and tens of thousands, press to know
The sovereign balm for every human woe;
The proffer of salvation, full and free;
'Weary and heavy-laden, come to me.'
Whilst Erin, heavy burdened, sorely tried,
Looks in her sorrow to the Crucified;
Casts off her mental, soul-degrading chain,
And hails the light of early days again."

SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF ST. PATRICK.

THERE are few right-minded persons who do not feel pleasure in contemplating the history of the great and good men who, in times long past, have exercised important influences upon the state and spirit of their age; and we would fain hope there are fewer still, who, in looking back upon the illustrious names that adorn the annals of their native land, do not feel a throb of national pride, or, at least, some impulse of a generous enthusiasm stirring within their hearts. We do not envy the man for whom the records of departed greatness have no attractions; still less do we envy him whose sympathies cannot be touched, even by the memories of the wise and the good who have shed a lustre upon the country of his birth. Insensibility to the claims which the illustrious dead have upon the reverence of the living is not, however, one of the faults of Irishmen; on the contrary, our national character is honourably distinguished for a high appreciation of bygone worth, and for an affectionate clinging to the traditions in which the history of our earlier saints and heroes has been enshrined and transmitted from age to age.

These reflections have been suggested by the approach of the day which, in our national annals, has been consecrated to the memory of the apostle and chief patron saint of Ireland.* During a period of more than fourteen centuries the name of St. Patrick has been honoured and cherished by every genuine Irishman. But in this, as in similar cases, the lapse of so many ages has produced the effect that, of the multitudes who regard him as identified with their nationality and religion, there are comparatively few who possess anything like an accurate acquaintance with his history, and the part which he sustained in the evangelizing of the country. Nay, more, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that, besides the want of information which generally prevails upon the subject of the life and times of this eminent servant of God, there are also many erroneous opinions popularly entertained, whether arising from vulgar prejudices, or—as it is to be feared they have done in too many instances—from intentional misrepresentation. We have, accordingly, thought that it might be neither uninteresting nor unprofitable, upon the present occasion, to give a brief summary of those incidents in St. Patrick's life which are most important for us to know, and which, in the opinions of the learned men who have most carefully investigated the subject, are best entitled to our belief.

Sec. 1. CHRISTIANITY IN IRELAND BEFORE SAINT PATRICK.

Before entering on the personal history of Saint Patrick, it may be well to say a word relative to the religious state of Ireland prior to his mission, especially as many persons appear to think that he was in such a sense the Apostle of Ireland, that the sound of the Gospel had never reached our shores before his arrival. Now, this is a great mistake. The express testimonies of ancient writers,† together with other arguments which we cannot now stop to consider, have led Roman Catholic, as well as Protestant, ecclesiastical historians to the conclusion that Christianity was planted in this country very many years before St. Patrick's age, though how, or by whom, it is now impossible to determine. At all events, it is certain, from Prosper's words, which we shall quote in the next section, that Christian believers existed in Ireland before the mission of Palladius, the immediate predecessor of St. Patrick.

Sec. 2. MISSION OF PALLADIUS.

However, though Christianity had been, as we have just said, very early introduced into Ireland, it does not appear to have flourished much down to the beginning of the fifth century. Its professors seem to have been few in number, and confined, chiefly or exclusively, to the southern portions of the island. Accordingly, our native annalists usually begin their ecclesiastical records with the mission of Palladius, who, as we learn from the chronicle of Prosper (a contemporary writer), "was ordained by Pope Celestine, and sent as first bishop to the Scots [i. e., the Irish]† believing in Christ." This famous mission of Palladius took place A.D. 431, the same year in which the œcumenical council—that of Ephesus—was held. It is plain, from the words of Prosper just quoted, that a church already existed in Ireland, when Palladius arrived there, over which he was appointed the first, or, as some understand the Latin word primus, the chief bishop.‡ However, the mission of Palladius proved a complete failure. After remaining for a short time—at the most a year—in Ireland, he was obliged to retire into Scotland, where he died not long after.

Sec. 3. ARRIVAL OF ST. PATRICK IN IRELAND.

It is generally agreed on, that the year after the arrival of Palladius—namely, A.D. 432—is that in which St. Patrick first visited these shores as a missionary. It is a much disputed point whether, like Palladius, he was sent upon this mission by the Bishop of Rome, or whether he was urged solely by the impulse of his own mind to undertake it. Viewing the matter, we trust, impartially, we must confess that the weight of evidence seems to be against the former of these opinions. If St. Patrick derived his commission from the Bishop of Rome, it must have been from Celestine. But Prosper does not say a single word about such a commission; and it is highly improbable that he—the friend, the counsellor, and the panegyrist of Celestine—would mention the abortive attempt of Palladius, and wholly pass over the successful one of St. Patrick. Nor, again, is there any intimation given, in St. Patrick's own writings,§ that he received his commission from the Pope. And, indeed, two of the most learned Roman Catholic writers, Colgan and Dr. Lanigan, candidly admit‖ that the consecration of St. Patrick by Pope Celestine cannot be maintained, though they are, of course, unwilling to concede that his commission was not, in some way or other, derived from Rome.

Sec. 4. HISTORY OF ST. PATRICK DOWN TO THE TIME OF HIS MISSION TO IRELAND.

We may now, before proceeding to give a sketch of the missionary labours of St. Patrick, review briefly the earlier history of his life. Upon the whole of this period much obscurity hangs; and in some particulars we have little else than conjectures, more or less probable, to guide us. This is the case, first of all, with respect to the place of his birth. Primate Ussher, who has been followed by Colgan and most subsequent writers, was of opinion that he was born in Scotland, near the present Dumbarton; whilst Dr. Lanigan has endeavoured to prove, that his birth-place was the town on the north coast of France now called Boulogne.* Other writers have suggested different places. Amongst the rest, the claims of Wales have been lately put forward, but on the authority of comparatively recent writings. The cause of this diversity of opinion is the difficulty of now identifying the ancient names of the places that are mentioned in connection with his birth.†

As to the date of his birth, the year A.D. 372 is usually assigned, though in this particular, also, considerable diversity of opinion prevails.‡ His name, we are told,§ was originally Succait; but he is generally known by the Latin name of Patricius, or Patrick. The statement in one of the ancient lives of him,‖ to the effect that he was of Jewish origin, his ancestors having come into Britain after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, seems to have originated in a false reading of a passage in the "Confession."

From the "Confession" we learn the remarkable fact, that his father was a deacon, and his grandfather a priest—the former being named Calphurnius, the latter Potitus. When about sixteen years of age (i.e., A.D. 388) he was taken captive with many others, by some Irish pirates, carried into the north of Ireland, and there sold to a Pagan prince, named Milcho, who employed him in taking care of his cattle. The scene of his slavery seems to have been somewhere near Ballymena, in the county of Antrim. His affliction produced a happy effect on his mind. He tells us himself in his "Confession," "that up to the period of his captivity, he knew not the true God, but that, in the strange land, the Lord brought him to a sense of his unbelief; so that, although late, he called his sins to remembrance, and turned with his whole heart to the Lord his God, who regarded his low estate, took pity on his youth and ignorance, watched over him before he knew him, and before he could discern between good and evil protected him and comforted him, as a father his own son."

Sec. 5. HISTORY OF ST. PATRICK'S MISSIONARY LABOURS.

Having spent probably about six years in captivity, he contrived to make his escape and regain his native land. He tells us himself, in his "Confession," "that he heard a voice in a dream, which directed him to flee to a certain part of the coast, where he should find a vessel that would convey him to his home. Some time¶ after this, he was again taken captive; but this second captivity lasted only for a short time, as he was restored to his friends within sixty days. It was a few years after this that he felt himself impelled by an irresistible desire to revisit the land of his first long exile, and communicate to the benighted inhabitants the knowledge of the blessed Gospel. He thought he beheld in a vision of the night a person, named Victricius, who brought him innumerable letters from Ireland, inviting him in the name of the people of Ireland to come amongst them. This took place about the year 397. Having made up his mind to devote his future life to this mission, he immediately set about qualifying himself for it; and with this view he placed himself under the care and instruction of the celebrated Germanus, Bishop of Auxerre, in France, with whom he remained a considerable time, "eagerly applying his mind to the attainment of wisdom, and the learning of the Holy Scriptures." He is also said, though on more doubtful authority, to have spent some time with the

* It may, perhaps, be unnecessary to state, that Ireland has three patron saints—St Patrick, St Columbkille, and St Brigget.

† The Irish were generally called by the name of Scots in early times, especially from the fourth to the eleventh century, at the latter of which epochs there is reason to think that the country now called Scotland first received that appellation.

‡ There are other indications which seem to show that an episcopacy existed in Ireland before the arrival of Palladius.

§ On the contrary, in his celebrated "Confession," and in his epistle to Coroticus, he ascribes his mission exclusively to a heavenly call.

‖ Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. i. 191. Colgan, Tr. Thaum. p. 258.

* That Lanigan is wrong, is decisively proved by the following passage of the "Confession" (cap. 19), in which Britain and Gaul are expressly distinguished—"Unde autem possem etiam volumen dimittere illius, et pergere in Britanniam, etiam libentissime paratus eram, quasi ad patriam et parentes; et non id solum, sed etiam usque ad Gallias visitarem fratres meos, ut viderem faciem sanctorum Domini mei."

† In the "Confession" we are informed that his birth-place was called Bonaven. The Hymn of Fiech says he was born at a place called Nemthur, or (as an eminent Irish scholar thinks it should be written) Emter. The author of his life, in the Leabhar Breac, states he was born at Alcluaid.

‡ Ussher gives the above date. Colgan prefers 373. Lanigan reduces it as low as 387.

still more famous St. Martin of Tours, and in the renowned monastery of Lerins, acquiring stores of knowledge and experience for the great work which lay before him.

This brings us to the year 432, in which, as above said (sec. 3), he carried into execution his long projected missionary visit to our shores. If we are right in assigning the year 372 as that of his birth, it follows that he was sixty years old at the commencement of his mission. He first landed on the coast of Leinster, probably at a place now called Wicklow. But having met with violent opposition from the Pagans and their idolatrous priests—the Druids or Magi—he took ship again, and directed his course to the northern parts of Ireland—the scene of his early captivity—and landed on the coast of Down; perhaps in the bay of Dundrum; or, as Dr. Lanigan thinks, at or near Strangford. Here his preaching met with better success. His first convert was Dichu, the chieftain of that district, whose example was followed by a great many of his subjects. It was on this occasion that the celebrated chapel, called Sabhall Phadruig, or Patrick's Barn, was erected: being the first church founded by St. Patrick, and the spot where his mortal remains probably repose. The modern name of this interesting place is Saul.

The following year, A.D. 433, one of the most remarkable occurrences in St. Patrick's life took place—namely, his preaching on Easter-day before Leogaire, the supreme monarch of Ireland, at Tara, in the County Meath, where the national parliament was then assembled for the celebration of the chief Pagan festival. An account of St. Patrick's visit to Tara, with the hymn which he composed on that occasion, and which is known as the Luireach Phadruig, or Patrick's Armour, is given in our last number, to which we, therefore, refer our readers. The subsequent events of his missionary career it is, according to Dr. Lanigan, next to impossible to arrange with a sufficient degree of chronological accuracy.* After preaching throughout Meath, he seems next to have visited Connaught about A.D. 435. Having spent, it is thought, about seven years in his Connaught mission, he then visited Leinster, the province in which he had been at first so unsuccessful. Now, however, it pleased God that his labours should be crowned with success: the princes of the country embraced the Gospel with alacrity, and encouraged their subjects to do the same. Munster was now the only remaining province of Ireland where he had not made known the message of peace. It has been thought that the reason why he left Munster for the last was, that as Christianity had been already planted there, his presence was less necessary than in other parts of the island. One of the first places in Munster which he visited was Cashel, which was then the seat of the royal residence. The date of this was about A.D. 445. The king, Œngus, became a convert, and assisted St. Patrick in setting to rights the ecclesiastical affairs of his kingdom. In Munster he is supposed to have spent about seven years. Having concluded his labours there, he returned to Down somewhere about the year A.D. 452; and took up thenceforth his abode at Saul, the place where, as we have seen, he first succeeded in planting the religion of Christ. About three years after his return to the north—that is to say, about the year A.D. 455—he is supposed by many learned men to have founded the metropolitan See of Armagh.† The date, however, of this event is much disputed. Archbishop Ussher fixes it ten years earlier—i.e., A.D. 445.

Between the metropolitan church of Armagh and the Abbey of Saul, St. Patrick spent the remainder of his days, in retirement and peace. Near the close of his life he seems to have written his famous "Confession," addressed to the people of Ireland, with a view to give them an account of the motives which influenced him to undertake his mission, and the hopes which sustained him in his various trials and dangers: as also, to record the goodness of God towards himself and those among whom he had so long laboured. We may observe in passing, that this work, which there is every reason to regard as the genuine production of St. Patrick, and the most valuable extant document relating to his life, is characterized throughout by an exalted tone of piety, and exhibits an unmistakable evidence of a mind deeply imbued with a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and a profound sense of their supreme authority. The year of his death is uncertain. The most generally received opinion assigns for it A.D. 492 or 493. This would make his age 120 years; which accordingly forms one of the four points of resemblance remarked by certain ancient writers between him and Moses.‡ The day of his decease is undisputed—namely, the 17th of March; which day has, accordingly, from time immemorial, been observed for his commemoration. It may seem strange that the burial place of so great a saint should not be certainly known: yet, so it is. Some claim that honour for Armagh; whilst others, with more probability, maintain that he was buried in Down. The memory of the exact place of his interment must have been lost very early; for we find one of the ancient writers above alluded to,* and who wrote probably about the close of the seventh century, stating the fourth point of resemblance between St. Patrick and Moses to consist in this, that "no one knew where were his bones."

Sec. 7. TWO OPPOSITE ERRORS RESPECTING ST. PATRICK TO BE AVOIDED.

We have all along taken for granted that the various accounts which remain to us of the life of St. Patrick, though differing from each other in many points, are all correct in affirming, as they do, his actual existence and his mission to Ireland; yet a few learned men have been found who have not hesitated to assert that the whole history of his life is a fable.† Some of their reasons are plausible; but they are not strong enough to shake the historical evidence on the other side. This scepticism seems to have been nothing else than a reaction against the boundless credulity with which dark and superstitious ages received and exaggerated the marvellous stories handed down respecting the miraculous powers of the saint. Whilst, therefore, we, on the one hand, feel ourselves compelled to reject such stories as idle tales, we feel no hesitation, upon the other, in protesting against a reckless criticism, which, if pursued to its legitimate consequences, would leave the history of the past an utter blank. To such sceptics, if any such now exist, we recommend the following judicious observations of Dr. O'Connor:—"Even if all the authorities and manuscripts in which St. Patrick is expressly mentioned were destroyed, the laws of just criticism forbid that, after the lapse of so many ages, and the destruction of so many monasteries and libraries as formerly existed in Ireland before the Danish invasions, the silence alone of such authors as remain (supposing such silence) should be admitted in evidence to overthrow a national tradition, so universal in every part of Ireland, Scotland, and Mann, so immemorial and so incorporated as that of St. Patrick is with the traditionary usages, names, anniversaries, monastic ruins, and popular manners of the millions of Irishmen who have existed since his time."‡

PURGATORY.

We avail ourselves of this opportunity, according to the pledge given in our last number, to give our readers some extracts from a valuable work, attributed to St. Patrick, and which has been included in nearly all the collections of his works down to that of the learned Villanueva, published by Grainsberry, Dublin, 1835; and treated as genuine not only by the learned Protestant writers, Archbishop Ussher and Sir Henry Spelman, but also by Father Colgan and other eminent Roman Catholic writers, and which is, at any rate, admitted by all scholars to be a treatise of great value and antiquity. The tract we allude to is entitled "The Three Habitations," or abodes of spirits; the subject of which is so directly connected with the matter in question, that it would be somewhat strange if it did not afford a strong testimony, one way or other, upon it. We think it does afford a striking negative testimony in favour of the assertion of Protestants, that the doctrine of a belief in purgatory is not based upon a tradition as old as the times of the apostles, but is an invention of a more modern date, which men have been led into believing, partly by fear and partly by credulity, without (as we hope hereafter to prove) any adequate proof, either from the Holy Scriptures, reason, or the writings of the early Fathers, when rightly understood. At present, however, we must confine ourselves to the treatise of St. Patrick, to which we have referred: "De tribus habitaculis regno Dei, mundo, inferno."§ The first chapter (we give the translation only, as there can be no dispute about its correctness) commences as follows:—

"There are three habitations under the government of the Almighty God—the upper, the lowermost, and the middle: of these the uppermost is called the kingdom of God, or heaven; the lowermost is termed hell; the middle is named this present world, or this earth. The two extremes are altogether contrary, the one to the other, and have nothing whatever in common with each other; for what fellowship can there be between light and darkness—between Christ and Belial? but the middle hath some similitude with the extremes: whence it is that it hath light and darkness, cold and heat, pain and no pain, joy and sorrow, hatred and love, the good and the bad, the just and the unjust, masters and servants, death and life, and innumerable other such like things; of which the one part bears an image of the kingdom of God, and the other of hell. For, in this world, there is a mixture of good men and bad men together; whereas in the kingdom of God there are none bad—all are good; but in hell all are bad—none are good. And both of these places are being filled up out of the middle; for of the men of this world some are lifted up to heaven, others are dragged down to hell—namely, like are joined to like: that is to say, good to good, and bad to bad; just men to just angels, and wicked men to wicked angels; the servants of God to God, the servants of the devil to the devil; the blessed are called to the kingdom prepared for them from the beginning of the world, the cursed are driven away into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

He then proceeds to describe, in scriptural language, the happiness of the blessed in heaven, and the torments of the damned in hell, where there shall be "weeping and gnashing of teeth," and innumerable kinds of torture. In chapter 3 he eloquently descants on the insanity of those whom eternal punishment does not deter from the pleasures of the world; and whom (in the 4th chapter) he urges to resist the suggestion of Satan, and leave the "broad way" which leads to death for the "narrow path" which Christ trod before us, and which leads to life eternal. In chapter 5 he defends the prescience of God as compatible with the free agency of man; and ends this earnest and beautiful treatise by a chapter on the knowledge or the triple vision of body, spirit, and understanding, of the blessed in heaven. From beginning to end there is not contained in it the slightest allusion to any such place or state as purgatory, or to masses for the dead, or any such topic. This is admitted by Dr. Lanigan and Mr. Brenan, both Roman Catholic historians; though they try to account for it in different ways, both equally unsatisfactory to any unbiassed mind. Dr. Lanigan attempts to explain it, by saying that St. Patrick had no occasion to mention purgatory in this tract, as it is only on permanent habitations; in which case, however, it is obvious that the present world, as well as purgatory, would have been omitted, as no one can conceive this world to be a permanent habitation. Mr. Brenan suggests that, as hope is not excluded from purgatory, purgatory may, perhaps, be included, by the author of this treatise, under the state of happiness, or heaven. To this we shall venture to reply, in the words of Mr. King, in his Church History of Ireland, vol. i., p. 49:—"This is, to say the least of it, an unusually pleasant notion of purgatory; and one that, if generally received, might save some money to many of our poor countrymen, and dissipate, too, some of their purgatorial societies; it will hardly, however, strike our Roman Catholic friends as a very satisfactory way of meeting the troublesome silence of the treatise in question."*

We have thus redeemed our pledge, so far as the opinions of St. Patrick are concerned. We shall take occasion hereafter to call the attention of our readers to other testimonies equally important, including that of St. Leo the Great, himself one of the Popes, who was contemporary with St. Patrick, and died in 461, and who appears to have been as little acquainted with the idea of penitents paying or performing in purgatory what they had failed to pay here, as St. Patrick himself; and we shall also discuss, seriatim, the several passages of Scripture and the Fathers relied on by Roman Catholic writers in favour of their opinions; remembering that the burden of proving their opinions to be true fairly lies on them, and not on those who rest on the distinct revelation of heaven and hell, as to which there is no dispute. In the meantime we would crave the attention of our serious readers to the consideration of the following words of our Blessed Lord, and his holy and beloved apostle St. John, taken from the Douay Testament—"Amen, Amen, I say unto you, that he who heareth my word, and believeth him that sent me, hath life everlasting, and cometh not into judgment, but is passed from death into life."—5th ch. Saint John's Gospel, 24th verse. If the servant of God passeth—nay, is passed—from death to LIFE, and cometh not into judgment, how can he pass from death to the excruciating though terminable pains of purgatory? Those who have eternal life can suffer no intermediate punishment, judgment, or condemnation, according to the doctrine of Christ; and if any are apprehensive lest even the blessed should not be pure enough without purgatorial cleansing, let him read what the blessed apostle St. John says, in his first Epistle, ch. i., v. 7:—"The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from ALL sin." If that be true, what further cleansing is left for purgatory to do? and on that view and on no other, we can easily understand the glorious and comforting words of the same St. John in the Apocalyptic vision, where he writes—"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. From henceforth now, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, for their works follow them."—Apoc. ch. xiv., 13th ver.

CREDULITY AND SCEPTICISM.—Credulity has been well defined to be "Belief without reason;" and scepticism its opposite, as—"Reason without belief." It is difficult to determine which is the more incompatible with practical common sense.

* As to the place called St. Patrick's Purgatory, in Lough Derg, County Donegal, which may occur to the minds of some of our readers, it never was believed by any one to have relation to the future state; and Dr. Lanigan (vol i., p. 368) states that it never was heard of till the eleventh century, 500 years after St. Patrick's time; and that it was demolished in 1497, by order of the Pope, though in some manner restored since.

LOVE FOR THE DEAD.

The grave is the ordeal of true affection. It is there that the Divine passion of the soul manifests its superiority to the instinctive impulse of mere animal attachment. The latter must be continually refreshed, and kept alive by the presence of its object; but the love that is seated in the soul can live in long remembrance. The mere inclinations of men languish and decline with the charms which excited them, and turn with disgust from the dismal precincts of the tomb; but it is thence that truly spiritual affection rises purified from every sensual desire, and returns, like a holy flame to illumine and sanctify the heart of the survivor. The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow from which we refuse to be divorced. Every other wound we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this wound we consider as a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Who can look down upon the grave even of his enemy, and not feel a compunctious throb, that he should ever have warred with the poor handful of earth that lies mouldering before him?

Ay, go to the grave of buried love and there meditate—there settle the account with thy conscience for every past endearment unregarded, of that departed being, who can never more return to be soothed by thy contrition. If thou art a child, and hast ever added a sorrow to the soul, or a furrow to the silvered brow of an affectionate parent; if thou art a husband, and hast ever caused the fond bosom, that ventured its happiness in thy arms, to doubt one moment of thy kindness or thy truth; if thou art a friend, and hast ever wronged, in thought, word, or deed, the spirit that generously confided in thee: if thou art a lover, and hast ever given one unmerited pang to that true heart, which now lies cold and still beneath thy feet—then, be sure that every unkind look, every ungracious word, every ungentle action, will come thronging back upon thy memory and knocking dolefully at thy soul—then, be sure that thou wilt lie down sorrowing and repentant on the grave, and utter the unheard groan, and pour the unavailing tear—more deep, more bitter, because unheard and unavailing.

Then weave thy chaplets of flowers, and strew the beauties of nature about the grave—console thy broken spirit, if thou canst, with these tender, yet futile, tributes of regret; but take warning by the bitterness of this thy contrite affliction over the dead, and henceforth be more faithful and affectionate in the discharge of thy duties to the living.—Washington Irving.

TALK OF THE ROAD—No. II.

Well, a few days after Jemmy Brannan made up his mind to speak to the Rev. Mr. Owens, it happened that Jemmy and Pat Dolan were working together for a farmer; and they were filling a cart out of some manure-heaps that lay on the roadside. And, as they were working, who should come up the road but Mr. Owens himself. Now, Mr. Owens seldom passed people by without saying a word; for he was a pleasant spoken man, and Irishmen like a gentleman that speaks free and pleasant. So Mr. Owens said, "It's a fine day for the work, boys: thanks be to God for it."

"A fine day, your reverence, God be praised," said Jem, very well pleased to have Mr. Owens to speak to that day.

"It would be bad farming without the dung, boys," said Mr. Owens.

"Sure enough, your reverence, that would be bad work," said Pat; "but there's a deal of poor creatures has little dung to put on it since potatoes went."

"And without the spade or the plough, the dung is not much good," said the parson.

"I'm thinking both spade and plough will have to go deeper these times," said Jem.

"Did you ever hear of Jesus Christ digging and dunging?" said Mr. Owens.

"No, your reverence," said both the men, dropping their spades in great amazement.

"Why, did you never read of that in the Bible?" said Mr. Owens.

"No, your reverence," said Jem, "I never did."

"What Bible is it in, your reverence?" said Pat; "is it in the Protestant Bible or the Catholic Bible?"

"And which of these do you read?" said Mr. Owens.

Pat did not like to say he never read a word of either in his life, so he said nothing, and Mr. Owens went on—"I believe it is just the same in both, as I could show you if I had the books."

"Well, your reverence," said Jem, "that is just what I would like to see."

"What?" said Mr. Owens.

"The differ between the two books," said Jem.

"Well, if that is all you want to see," said Mr. Owens, "it is not much; for the 'differ' is so small you will hardly see it at all: but what makes you wish for it?"

So Jem was fairly in for the very thing he wanted; and so he said, "Your reverence, I can't make out why reading the Bible should put people astray, and make them leave the Catholic Church."

"Nor I either," said Mr. Owens. "How could it do that? It comes to us from God himself, that made the Church, and knows what is best for it."

"But sure, your reverence," said Pat, "don't we know that they that gives us the Bible, always wants us to leave the Catholic Church."

"Were the blessed apostles good Catholics—St. Peter, and St. Paul, and St. Matthew, and all the rest of them?" said Mr. Owens.

"Surely they were, your reverence," said Jem.

"And how would their writings, that they wrote to all the people that they made Catholics, how would those writings turn any man away from the Catholic Church?" said Mr. Owens.

"That's just what I want to know, your reverence," said Jem; "and I heard tell that it was the Protestant Bible that did it, and that the Catholic Bible would not do it at all; and that's the reason I wanted to see the differ?"

"I can't show you the 'differ' without the books," said Mr. Owens; "but if you and your neighbour here will come down to my house some evening, I'll put one book in your hand and the other in his, and you can read turn about, and compare them, and see the 'differ.'"

"And when will we come down, your reverence?" said Jem.

"This evening, if you like, when you leave off work," said Mr. Owens.

"With God's blessing, then, I'll go," said Jem.

So Mr. Owens had to leave them, for he had to see a sick man; and when he was gone, Jem asked Pat to go with him that evening; and Pat was not willing at first; so Jem said to him, "Sure you shall hold the Catholic Bible yourself, and you may as well come and see the end of it."

So that evening they both went up to Mr. Owens's, and he brought them both into his study, and got down the two books; and first he opened the Douay Bible, and showed them what was printed in the first page—

"APPROBATION.

"This new edition of the English version of the Bible, printed with our permission by Richard Coyne, 4, Capel-street, carefully collated by our direction with the Clementine Vulgate; likewise, with the Douay version of the Old Testament of 1509,* and with the Rhemish version of the New Testament of 1582, and with other approved English versions, we, by our authority, approve, and we declare that the same may be used, with great spiritual profit, by the faithful; provided it be read with due reverence, and the proper dispositions. Given at Dublin, 2nd September, 1829."

And then Mr. Owens showed them that this approbation was signed by "Daniel Murray, D.D.," the late Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, and he showed them this added to it—"We concur with the above approbation," signed by 24 of the Irish Roman Catholic bishops. So Jem and Pat were both satisfied that this was the right book, and Pat was more easy in his mind; for after reading this he thought it could be no harm for him to look into it; and so he kept this book in his hand, and Mr. Owens handed the other to Jem.

"Now, where would you like to read?" said Mr. Owens.

"Oh, your reverence can chose better than we can," said Jem.

So Mr. Owens opened the Church of England Bible at the First Epistle of Timothy, chap. ii. and verse 5, and Jem read as follows:—"For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus."

"Holy Kitty!" exclaimed Jem.

"Stop a minute, my friend," said the parson, laying his hand on Jem's arm; "who was Kitty?"

"Why, then, indeed, your reverence," said Jem, "I don't know, barrin she might be one of the saints."

"And will you swear by you don't know who? Do you know what our Saviour says about swearing?" said the parson.

"I suppose 'thou shalt not take the name of God in vain,' said Jem; "but what harm is it to swear by holy Kitty?"

"Is it not harm to do what Christ commands us not to do?" said Mr. Owens.

"Surely," said Jem, "there's no denying that."

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "listen to the words of Christ himself, in his own sermon on the Mount (Matthew v. 34), 'I say to you not to swear at all.' and in v. 37, 'Let your speech be yea, yea; no, no: and that which is over and above these is evil.' And the Apostle, St. James, in his epistle, says (chapter 5, v. 12), 'But, above all things, my brethren, swear not; neither by heaven, nor by the earth, nor by any other oath; but let your speech be yea, yea; no, no; that you fall not under judgment.' Now, I ask you, my friends," said the parson, "can it be safe for us to swear by any oath, when we have such directions from God about our talk?"

"Surely not, your reverence," said Jem.

"And if God has given us such directions, ought we not to keep them? and can we keep them without knowing them? Now, did you ever know this before, that Christ had given us orders not to swear by any oath?"

"I never heard it before," said Jem.

"You see, then," said Mr. Owens, "what need we have to study God's word in order that we may know what God commands us to do, or not to do. If we do not know his word, we may be continually doing the very things that make him angry. But come back to the verse you read, Jem; it seemed to strike you forcibly."

"Holy Virgin!" exclaimed Jem.

"Stop again, my friend," said the parson; "are you not doing again the very thing that your Saviour bid you not do?"

"I am, your reverence," said Jem; "but it is so hard for a man to quit, in a moment, what he was used to all his life."

"You see, then," said the parson, "what need we have to study Christ's words, and to learn them carefully that we may keep them. That is the reason that we teach the Bible to our children, that they may learn to avoid habits that are so displeasing to God, and so hard to get rid of. The Jews were told to teach them to their children; and why not to Christian children? And St. Paul praised Timothy for knowing them from a child. And you see now what need there is that the Church should teach Christ's words carefully to people; for it is not once hearing them that will do; we must read and study them again and again, to learn to keep them. And this is why we teach the Bible so much."

"But, your reverence," said Pat, "I hear Protestants swear betimes; and how comes that if they get such instruction?"

"And many," said Mr. Owens, "that heard our Saviour teach, and his Apostles too, were never the better, but the worse of what they heard. Very likely that some that heard the Sermon on the Mount went on swearing; but that was no fault of the teaching. The Church ought to teach Christ's words, whether man will hear them and do them or not. But come back to our verse: what were you going to say of it, Jem?"

"I was going to say, your reverence," said Jem (and he didn't swear this time), "if them isn't the very words that made Johnny Connor, the sexton of the chapel, turn Protestant. Sure I heard him myself, when Father John taxed him in the chapel fornent the people with reading, and wanted to take his Bible, and Johnny wouldn't give it. 'And what do you find in it,' says Father John, 'that you won't give it up?' 'I find in it,' says Johnny, 'that there is one mediator between God and men.' I mind the words well. Now Pat," said Jem, turning sharp round on Pat as he spoke, "look at your book, man, and see if the words is there; and then we will see which book set Johnny Connor astray."

"Read it again in your own book first," said the parson, "and then we will see the 'differ' exactly."

So Jem read again, "For there is one God and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus."

"Now, my friend, will you read?" said the parson to Pat. So Pat read, For there is one God and one Mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus.

"Now," said the parson, "what Bible set Johnny Connor astray?"

"Well, that's plain, anyway," said Jem; "there's but one Mediator; and the one book is as good as the other for that."

"What would you like to have next?" said Mr. Owens. So both told him to choose, for they were at a loss.

"Can you say the commandments?" said Mr. Owens.

"Yes, your reverence," said both of them.

So Mr. Owens turned to Jem, "Say the first commandment;" so Jem said, "Thou shalt have no other gods but me." Then Mr. Owens turned to Pat, and said, "Say the second commandment." "Thou shalt not take the name of God in vain."

"Is there nothing else between the two?" said Mr. Owens.

"No, your reverence," said both Pat and Jem together.

"Were you never taught that something was left out."

"No, your reverence," said they both. So Mr. Owens opened the two Bibles, and made them read what was left out in their catechisms; and Jem read first out of the Protestant book—"Thou shalt not make to thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them; for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and show mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments." And then Pat read out of the Roman Catholic Bible—"Thou shalt not make to thyself a graven thing, nor the likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or of those things that are in the waters under the earth. Thou shalt not adore them nor serve them. I am the Lord thy God, mighty, jealous, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments."—Exodus xx. 4, 5, 6 (Douay Bible).

* This date, 1509, must be a misprint, for the Douay version of the Old Testament was published for the first time in the year 1609.

"I don't see 'images' in the Catholic Bible, your reverence," said Pat.

"And what can a graven thing mean, but a graven image?" said Mr. Owens.

"Never mind that, your reverence," said Jem. "I see the word 'likeness' in both books; and if we must not make a 'likeness' of anything in heaven, how can we make an image of it?"

"Now, then," said Mr. Owens, "you see what God said in his commandments, and you never knew that before."

"Well, that beats all, your reverence," said Jem, "the two Bibles is like enough; and the Catholic Bible that we don't see, and the Catholic catechism that we do see and learn, is not like at all."

"And that, too," said Mr. Owens, "in the matter of God's own commandments that he spoke himself. And how shall we know how to serve God, if we do not know his own commandments?" And here Mr. Owens showed them, in the Douay Bible, the words just before the ten commandments of God—"'And the Lord spoke ALL THESE WORDS.' Now, if God spoke all these words in giving his commandments, should not we learn THEM ALL when we learn the commandments? And here, you see, we should not put our trust in any church or man to teach us God's commandments, but we should look in the Bible to see what God commanded. But it's getting late," said Mr. Owens; "maybe you would come in some other night?"

"Indeed, an' we will," said Jem, "but I'd like to have the book at home."

"Which book?" said Mr. Owens. So then Pat and Jem began debating; for Pat wanted the Catholic book, for he was still afraid the Protestant book might set him astray; so at last they agreed that Jem should take the Protestant Bible, and Pat the Douay Bible, and read them together, verse about in the evenings, till they found all the "differ;" and so Jem asked the price of his book. "A shilling," said the parson; so Jem paid it, well pleased. And then Pat pulled out his shilling.

"Oh," said Mr. Owens, "this book is four and sixpence."

"Four and sixpence, your reverence," said Pat; "and sure Jem's is the purtiest book; for it has a real leather cover on it, and this is only paper; and Jem's is only a shilling."

"I can't help that," said Mr. Owens; "we can't get this book for less."*

"I see now, your reverence," said Jem, "it's the Protestants that wants the poor to have the Bible anyway, when they make it cheap." And so the parson agreed to give Pat his book for two and-sixpence, and to take it at sixpence a week; and when they were going out, Mr. Owens said—"I hope, boys, you don't think that I set you astray."

"And does your reverence not want us to leave the Catholic Church?" said Pat.

"If St. Peter or St. Paul was to preach to-morrow," said Mr. Owens, "would you listen to them? or if they wrote you a letter would you read it?"

"Surely, your reverence," said Pat, "I would."

"And would that make you leave the Catholic Church?" said Mr. Owens.

"It couldn't, your reverence," said Pat.

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "I give you the letters they wrote to you and to all. If I saw St. Peter or St. Paul, I would not ask them to leave the Catholic Church; and no more would I ask you: I want you to be such Catholics as St. Peter and St. Paul were—no more, and no less; and for that I give you their writings to read. Judge for yourselves, my friends, for you have common sense, like most Irishmen, whether they who give you St. Peter and St. Paul's writings, or they who keep them from you, are most in earnest in wanting you to be such Catholics as St. Paul and St. Peter were."

So they left Mr. Owens for that night; and if we hear of anything more, it won't be lost.

CONVERSIONS AND PERVERSIONS.

IN our opening address to our readers we remarked that publications such as this, devoted to the calm consideration of the points of religious difference amongst our countrymen, are particularly well suited to the times in which we live. Fifty or a hundred years ago such a paper would have had no chance of finding readers. The fashion then was to cry down all attempts to meddle with the religious belief of others. "Let every man," it was said, "go to heaven his own way, content himself to believe what his father or his teacher had taught him, and satisfied to let his neighbour believe in peace the creed in which he had been brought up." But a time has now come when this way of talking will no longer impose on any one. We know that in the religious disputes which now prevail, both parties cannot be in the right; and since both parties profess to bring us a message from God, we cannot think it a matter of small consequence, which is in the right and which is in the wrong. No doubt, it is not pleasant to question the truth of the doctrines which we have believed from childhood, and to ask ourselves, "Is it possible that we may have been mistaken in what we have so many years received as certain?" But, pleasant or not, the inquiry cannot but be profitable. If we are in the wrong, it may, perhaps, concern our eternal salvation to find out our mistake in time; and if we are in the right, it cannot but be a comfort and satisfaction to our minds to be able to give good convincing reasons for our belief.

As we began by saying, there has not been a time these hundred years at which men were better disposed than they are now in these countries to see and act on their duty of examining for themselves whether what their parents and their clergy had taught them be true or not. Very many have thus, more or less, examined for themselves; and the result has been, that they have been satisfied of the correctness of what they have been taught, and have decided on abiding by their old religion. But there are a good many more with whom such an examination ends otherwise, and who, for love of what they think truth, are willing to give up all their old opinions, even though they lose thereby the friendship of those most dear to them. But the wonder is, that these conversions take place on both sides. Protestants have become Romanists, and Romanists have become Protestants. Now, we do not mean to dispute the sincerity of either party in their change. The spirit in which this journal is conducted does not allow us to impute unworthy motives, nor are we at all disposed to do so. At first this was done commonly enough by men who cared more for their party than for truth; and those who gained nothing by their change but to be cursed, and pelted, and hooted, to be turned off from their employments, and shut out from the shops where they had been used to deal, were said to have changed their religion only for the sake of the worldly advantages they gained by the change. Now, however, this cannot much longer be said; for the number of converts is now great enough to exhaust any funds which the most liberal imagination can suppose supplied for the purpose of proselytizing. At any rate, let others act as they will, we, in this journal, are determined not to seek for truth by abusing our opponents instead of arguing with them. For the sincerity of their motives we know they must give an account to God; all we are concerned with is, what reason each can give for his change of religion. It is plain enough that when a Protestant becomes a Romanist and a Romanist becomes a Protestant, one of the two must have changed for the worse. One of them must have given up truth, to take falsehood in its stead. It is important, then, that we should hear what reasons each can give, that we may know which is the convert and which is the pervert.

There are some who would settle this question in a very summary manner. They say the converts who have been made to Protestantism are, for the most part, ignorant men, who have not read books of controversy on the points disputed between the churches; those who have given up Protestantism are learned men, who have been able to study what doctrines were held by the Fathers and by the primitive church, and who, no doubt, have embraced the Romish faith, because their reading has taught them that this has been held by the church from the beginning. "Ought we not, then, to attach more weight to the conversion of one such learned man than to the change of the religious opinions of a hundred uneducated peasants?" It is proverbial, however, that a man is likely to bring himself to shame who decides on a matter before he hears it; and so, in this case, we do not think it fair to come to a conclusion without hearing what each party has to say. We must not let our prejudices make us refuse to listen to the one if he has good reasons to offer, nor must we take for granted that the conclusions of him whom we think the more learned are right, unless it appears that it is his learning that has led him to these conclusions.

Of those English clergymen who were the first to go over from Oxford to Rome, Mr. Ward and Mr. Oakeley were two of the most prominent. While still professing to be members of the Church of England, both had written in defence of Roman Catholic doctrine so warmly that the one was deprived of his degrees by his university, and the other was censured by a formal decision of the ecclesiastical courts, and prohibited from performing any ministerial duties until he should retract his errors. Both, in consequence, abandoned the communion of the Church of England, at a time when several, who have since followed their example, were still professing themselves her faithful and devoted children. It is, then, no unfair choice to take Mr. Ward and Mr. Oakeley, the leaders of the movement, as samples for the rest, and to inquire in their case whether superior learning was the cause of the change in their religious opinions. Now, it is very remarkable that both these gentlemen take pains to declare their ignorance of the common controversial writings on both sides, and to profess, too, that it was not any search into the writings of the early Fathers which led to their change of creed. Mr. Ward says—"When the eyes of certain English churchmen were opened by God's grace, some twelve years ago, to discern the fearful precipice towards which religious opinion was hastening among us, they altogether eschewed the idle and ridiculous child's play of examining between rival doctrines by means of patristic and scholastic studies." And Mr. Oakeley says—"So long as the Church of England impressed my own conscience, in spite of her many anomalies, as an adequate object of loyalty and affection, I not only clung to her, but gave myself up to her without examining the question of her historical claims upon my acceptance. And so now, without knowing definitely how Rome makes out her pretensions from the history of past ages (a most interesting question, nevertheless, and one which I am delighted to think is so soon to receive elucidation), I bow myself before her, because she plainly corresponds with that type of the Catholic Church which is deeply and habitually impressed upon my whole moral and spiritual nature." In these and such like passages these writers treat the deciding of religious controversies by learned historical investigations as idle and ridiculous child's play; and they think it only necessary to inquire which religion is best adapted to satisfy their own spiritual wants. Now, it is plain, that when this line of argument is taken up, the opinion of the most refined and highly-educated man is not worth more than that of the poorest and most illiterate. Christ said of his religion, that the poor had the Gospel preached unto them; and he, no doubt, intended his Gospel to satisfy the spiritual wants of the many as well as of the few. And, certainly, the multitude who, within the last few years, have joined the communion of the Church of England, would say that they have done so (amongst other reasons) because her doctrines are best qualified to satisfy their spiritual wants. They would tell us, that once they were ignorant, and that so long as they quietly submitted to the rules of their Church, their spiritual guides cared not to instruct them; but that now they are encouraged to read and love the written Word of God; that once they knew nothing of the real character of the Son of God; that they were taught to regard him as a harsh and stern judge, and that his place in their affections was occupied by other mediators, through whom, they supposed, they must appease him; but that, since they have read the Scriptures for themselves, they know that there is but one Mediator between God and man, and that none other can be more loving, more compassionate, more ready to sympathize with all their feelings, or better deserving of any love they can offer him in return; that once they thought little of sin; that they imagined a few words of confession, followed by the priest's absolution, washed out the old score, and left them at liberty to begin a new one; but that now they dread sin, since they have learned to know it as the abominable thing which God hates—as that which is sufficient, if unatoned for, to plunge the whole of the human race in misery, and which nothing less than the blood of a Divine Saviour will blot out; that once they committed to the grave with shuddering fearfulness the bodies of their departed friends, believing that, even the best of them, had gone to a place of torment, there to remain they knew not how long, and giving as much money as their scanty means would allow to hasten the release of those whom they loved from that state of misery; but that now, when they follow to the tomb one who has died in Christ, their sorrow is only for their own loss; but they dread no sufferings for the departed; they believe that he whom the blood of Christ has cleansed from all sin has no further any debt to pay, and they listen, with joyful confidence, to the consoling words of Scripture, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord; even so, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labours." Now, when these men tell us that the doctrines which they have thus embraced are those best adapted to satisfy their spiritual wants, it is no answer to say, that these men are not learned; for this is a question with which learning has nothing to do. The argument is just as good in their mouths as when Mr. Oakeley and Mr. Ward tell us, that it suits their spiritual necessities best to listen to the voice of the Church speaking with authority, and pronouncing dogmatically on every point of doctrine, and to be spared the trouble of searching out the truth for themselves.

But in point of fact, the Irish converts to Protestantism are more learned than the English converts to Romanism; for they do not content themselves with the arguments just alluded to. They do not pronounce on the truth of a doctrine from its fitness to satisfy the wants of their own minds, without an appeal to antiquity. If asked, why they reject any Romish doctrine? the first answer they would give is, because they find it does not agree with the teaching of the Primitive Church. The doctrines of the Primitive Church have been handed down to us in the writings of the Apostles and Evangelists; and an acquaintance with these is the most valuable learning that a Christian can possess. Such learning the Church of England desires should be possessed by the humblest of her members. She does not ask them to believe any doctrine on her word alone; nor does she wish to keep them in ignorance, in the hope that they will be thus more ready to listen to her teaching; but she wishes them to examine for themselves, whether what she teaches be not the very same which Peter, and John, and Paul taught. And when men say that they have so examined, and have embraced her communion in consequence of such an examination, is not their opinion entitled to more respect than that of men who change their creed without any historical examination at all?

But we do not mean to say that the reasons given by Mr. Oakeley and Mr. Ward are the same as those given by all who have left the Anglican Church. And we are bound, in fairness, to consider the reasons alleged by Mr. Newman, one of the most distinguished of the number. To explain these to our readers, it is necessary to lay before them, a little more in detail, the actual state of the controversy between the churches. Protestants believe that Holy Scripture contains all things which are required to be believed, as necessary to salvation; and they resist every attempt to impose on men's consciences any doctrine, as an article of faith, if that doctrine be not found in the Bible. They hold that the great religious movement, which took place in the sixteenth century, was no more than the clearing of Christ's religion from human additions, which had been made gradually in the course of many centuries, and the restoration of the simple doctrines taught by our Lord and his Apostles. Romish controversialists, on the other hand, contended that the Scriptures do not contain all the doctrines revealed by our Saviour; that some were communicated, by word of mouth, by the Apostles to their converts; that these doctrines were preserved by tradition in the Church, and are to be found in the writings of the early Fathers; and they maintained that those Romish doctrines, which Protestants say have no warrant from Scripture, can, at least, be proved by this Apostolic tradition. Now, learned members of the English Church have not shrunk from meeting them on this ground too. Many of them asserted (and Mr. Newman, when a member of the English Church, constantly maintained this position) that the distinctive doctrines now held by Romanists, are no more to be found in the writings of the early Fathers than they are in Scripture; that we can trace, in church history, the origin and progress of each of these additions made to the pure faith of the Gospel. They say that none of them were made suddenly, but that they grew in the Church—the hints of one writer being taken up and expanded by another, and systematized by a third. And they assert that, at the Council of Trent, a number of doctrines were made articles of faith which had never been considered articles of faith before; and which had been, at best, but the unauthorized speculations of individual divines. Our readers, then, will naturally suppose, that when Mr. Newman went over to Romanism, it must have been because he discovered that he had been mistaken in these views; because by a more extended reading, he had found out passages of early Christian writers, which proved that those doctrines had been held from the beginning, which he had once maintained were later additions to the faith of Christians. Some of our readers may be surprised to hear that the contrary is the case. Mr. Newman admits still the truth of what he asserted formerly—that the doctrines now taught in the Church of Rome are not the same as those taught in the ages which succeeded the Apostles. The following sentence was written by Mr. Newman while a member of the Church of England—"That a certain change in objective and external religion has come over the Latin—nay and in a measure the Greek—Church, we consider to be a plain, historical fact; a change sufficiently startling to recall to our minds, with very unpleasant sensations, the awful words: 'Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel unto you, than that you have received, let him be accursed.'" When Mr. Newman went over to Rome, this plain, historical fact was not denied; but he started a theory to account for it. This theory was contained in the celebrated essay on the development of Christian doctrine, which he published shortly after the change of his religion was acknowledged. In this essay he maintains that God did not intend that the form of doctrine received in the Church should be at all times the same; that he left in his Church an authority of developing new truths from those known before; that Catholic belief is consequently not in all ages the same, but is a constantly-growing thing: so that actually a man may be a heretic in one century for believing, what he would be a heretic in the next century for denying; and a Christian would now be a heretic, were he to believe no more than those who learned from the Apostles thought sufficient for their belief. Now, we do not purpose here to enter into any discussion as to the truth or falsehood of Mr. Newman's theory; but if any one should say—"Is it not very likely that Protestants must be wrong, when we see so learned a man, as Mr. Newman abandoning their creed?" we can answer, "his learning is on the side of Protestantism still." When Mr. Newman says that Romish doctrines are the "development" of Apostolic Christianity; and when Protestants say that they are a corruption of it: they are, at all events, agreed on this "plain, historical fact," that Romish Christianity and apostolic Christianity are two different things. Which of the two is most likely to be right is not a matter for learning to decide, but for natural reason and common sense; to these we must leave it, to determine which is most likely to be right—the man who is satisfied to believe as the earliest ages of the Church believed, or the man who professes to have found out something truer and better.

Perhaps we shall be asked, what do the authorities of the Romish Church think of the line of argument adopted by their new convert? It seems plainly inconsistent with that formerly employed by their controversial writers. People will not know what to believe if one set of defenders of their faith say, the doctrines of our Church have been in all ages exactly the same; and if another set say, God has vouchsafed to us a knowledge of truths not developed in the days of the early Fathers. And Mr. Newman's line of argument appears likely to do a great deal of mischief with those who will accept his admissions that the doctrines of Romanism are not exactly the same as those of the early Church, but who are convinced that Christians ought simply to believe the doctrines which Christ and his Apostles taught, and that they have no right to "develop" them, and make them into another gospel for themselves. Can the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church approve of so dangerous a course of argument? To this question we find it very hard to give an answer. In the preface to his book, Mr. Newman says, that on his conversion he submitted his work for the revision of the authorities of his new Church, but that they declined being responsible for it, and preferred that he should publish it just as it had been written before his admission into their Church. It is strange that the Romish authorities in England should have practised so much reserve. We would think it right that they should tell their convert whether the arguments which had induced him to come over to them were good or bad; or if they were glad to have Mr. Newman for a convert on any terms, one would suppose that they would, at least, take care that he should not damage their cause by exhibiting himself to the world as induced by unsound argument to join their communion. On the whole, then, it is natural to conclude, that the heads of the adherents of Romanism in England think the line of argument sound which Mr. Newman has adopted. And this view is confirmed by the position which Mr. Newman has held in their Church since, by his being proposed as head of the new Irish University, and by the tone of the Dublin Review, which is under the control of Cardinal Wiseman. In America, however, the case is different; and Roman Catholic writers there have seen very plainly that Mr. Newman's views are quite inconsistent with those which represent Catholic truth as always the same, and as handed down unchanged, by tradition, from the earliest ages. Whether Mr. Newman's views will come ultimately to be adopted in the Roman Catholic Church, we cannot predict. They profess to have an infallible judge of controversies; but on any given question, as we have shown in our last number, it is very hard to get his decision, and he generally manages to leave it unsettled until the question has settled itself. The present dispute seems to be one of those open questions; and Roman Catholic divines appear at liberty to maintain either that their doctrines are exactly the same as those which Christ and his Apostles taught, or that they are different and a great deal better. If one of them can persuade himself that he can find the infallibility of the Pope maintained in the writings of St. Cyprian; or the admissibility of image worship allowed in the works of the early apologists for Christianity, &c.; then he may assert that these are truths handed down by Catholic tradition from the times of the Apostles. But, in case this should prove too difficult a task, he can take Mr. Newman's ground, and assert that anything which he cannot find in the writings of the early Fathers is a late authoritative development made by the Church; and, if Protestants endeavour to prove that Saint Ignatius, or Saint Chrysostom, or Saint Augustine, did not believe any particular Romish doctrine, it is quite sufficient answer to say, that they would have believed it if they had not had the misfortune to live before that doctrine had been developed!

In conclusion, lest the object of this article should be misunderstood, we wish to explain that it is not intended as a discussion of the matters in dispute between Anglicans and Roman Catholics. All we wish to do is, to excite our readers to inquiry, by calling their attention to the great movement which is going on in the conversion of many on both sides. But then it became necessary for us to resist the prejudice which would pass by the conversion of so many hundreds to Protestantism, as the mere delusion of unlearned men. We pointed out that those who came over to the Church of England possessed the best of all learning—that most important for a Christian to possess; and we showed that those who had gone over to Romanism, either did so without any application of learning at all, or else, that their learning had led them to the very same conclusions which are held by Protestants. We say, then, that we ought fairly to consider the arguments brought forward by both parties, without allowing ourselves to be prejudiced by the idea that one of the parties is more learned than the other.

To people who adopt the latter mode of judging, we would finish by one plain question. When a priest comes over to Protestantism, who has received the best education Maynooth can give, Roman Catholics are ready to say—"That was an ignorant fellow; his opinion is worth nothing." When a Church of England clergyman goes over to Romanism, they cry—"What a learned man! how can you venture to dissent from his judgment?" If, then, Church of England clergymen are, as a body, so much more learned than Maynooth priests, is not some respect also due to the opinion of the great majority of them, who do not change their religion?

IRISH NATIONALITY.

There is, perhaps, no subject more exciting to the Irish mind than that of Irish nationality. It has been the dream of her most eminent patriots: the watchword of her most successful agitators. By the latter, indeed, the topic has been perverted to the worst of purposes, and the mind of the nation, distracted by the pursuit of impracticable legislative independence, has not been directed to the true objects and advantages of real nationality.

The nationality really to be desired is that which would unite all in claiming from the united legislature the adoption of those measures which would develop the great natural resources of the country; which would seek to elevate the social character of the people; and which would unite all in promoting those measures which carry for their sole recommendation the benefit which they would confer on every class of the community. The nationality which we desire to see is that which has so long distinguished the people of Scotland. There we see a people in number not one half our own, and sending to the Imperial Legislature a number of representatives, about one half the number sent from Ireland, securing to their interests a consideration and a deference that has never been accorded to Ireland. Will it be said that the existence of an Established Church is the great bar to this nationality? In Scotland we find a church voluntarily throwing off its connection with the State, and numbering among its adherents fully one half the Scottish people, and yet can there be a doubt but that all, whether belonging to the church there established, or dissenting from it, would cordially unite in forwarding any object generally advantageous to Scotland? Again, in the province of Ulster the dissentients from the Established Church are greater in number than the members of the Established Church, and yet there can be no doubt that there, too, all would cordially unite in any measure of general utility. No; the true cause, and one which, as long as it exists, will prevent the development of Irish nationality is the supremacy which the Romish priesthood habitually exercise over their laity. The Romish clergy, members of that great corporation which arrogates to itself the title of universal, and which undoubtedly does possess its votaries in every quarter of the world, have ever deemed themselves bound to promote the interests of their church rather than the particular and more limited interest of the individual nation in which they are located; often, perhaps, reconciling such conduct to their conscience by the consideration, that the greater and more important interests of the individual nation are ultimately promoted by the establishment of the supremacy of Rome. From whatever motive, however arising, no attentive reader of history can doubt that in all ages, and in all countries, the supremacy of Rome has been the governing principle of her clergy, and that, to attain and secure that supremacy, national independence and national interests have been unhesitatingly sacrificed. We will not stop here to detail the instances in which this has occurred in other countries. How in France the clergy of Rome marshalled the armies of the League, under the banner of Spain, against the most magnanimous of her princes, and, rather than submit to an heretic king, were willing to enslave France to her hereditary enemy. How in Poland, to extirpate heresy and re-establish the authority of Rome, anarchy was encouraged and the interference of neighbouring monarchs evoked until the precedent was established that soon terminated in her partition and ultimate extinction from the map of Europe; or how, in the present day, in Italy, the Romish clergy are the willing agents of Austrian despotism and French intervention. But we would dwell more at large on those instances which the history of our own country affords of the sacrifice of our independence and nationality at the altar of Papal supremacy. It was Pope Adrian's Bull that, to secure additional power and authority to Rome, first encouraged and sanctioned the invasion of Ireland by Henry II.; and from that time down to the Reformation the Roman pontiffs and the Romish clergy were the willing instruments in promoting and assisting in the subjugation of Ireland. The Reformation in England changed all this. After that event it was no longer, of course, the policy of Rome to encourage English supremacy, and thenceforth we find the Romish clergy head the resistance to English authority. But even then, in their conduct, subjugation to Rome, and not national independence, was the governing idea. Of this we have a most remarkable and instructive instance in the time of Charles I. When the great rebellion broke out in England the Marquis of Ormonde was the king's representative in Ireland, and his great object was to unite all parties in support of the king's authority. At that time, during the weakness of the central authority, an assembly had been summoned at Kilkenny, of the Roman Catholic bishops and peers, and 250 representatives from the general body of the Roman Catholics. This assembly, consisting solely of Roman Catholics most fully represented both their clergy and the laity of that persuasion; and after much negociation, concluded a peace with the Marquis of Ormonde, by which, in consideration of certain concessions, they agreed to assist the king with all their forces. It is to be remembered, that this agreement afforded the only reasonable hope of opposing successfully an invasion by the Parliamentary forces under Cromwell, and the whole body of the Roman Catholic laity were eager and earnest in its support. In pursuance of orders issued by the assembly at Kilkenny, and by Ormonde, the peace was proclaimed in Dublin and in the camp of General Preston, while heralds had been sent to proclaim it elsewhere. But the Pope's legate, Rinuccini, interfered; determined that there should be no peace which did not guarantee supremacy to Rome and the priesthood, he induced the clergy everywhere to resist it. At Waterford and Clonmel, the heralds were prevented from doing their office. At Limerick, the chief magistrate, Sir John Bourke, was suddenly attacked by a tumultuous crowd, led on by a friar of the name of Wolfe. The mayor was wounded and the heralds dispersed. For this outrage the rioters received the thanks and benedictions of the nuncio. By his own authority he displaced the magistrates; pronounced all who adhered to the treaty guilty of perjury; caused the commissioners, and all who had been instrumental in making the treaty, to be excommunicated by his priests, whom he convened at Waterford. He suspended all clergymen and confessors who preached in favour of it, or absolved its adherents. Excommunication was denounced against all who paid any money assessed by the Council at Kilkenny, and against all soldiers who should support the peace; and he framed a new oath of association, never to submit to any peace not approved of by the congregation of the Irish clergy.

This conduct of the nuncio was in accordance with the instructions sent him from Rome; for when, at his first coming over, in his speech to the Council at Kilkenny, he had recommended fidelity first to God and religion, and next to the king, Cardinal Pamfilio, by the Pope's orders, reprimanded him, observing "that the Holy See never could, by any positive act, approve the civil allegiance which Catholic subjects pay to an heretical prince." When the peace was thus denounced by the nuncio, the northern army, under O'Neill, declared itself ready to execute his orders; and thus in a moment, all that power which the confederate Roman Catholics had so long exercised, the whole dignity and authority of their assemblies was entirely dissolved, and its leading members, notwithstanding their previous devotion to the cause, consigned to prison. A few ecclesiastics became absolute lords of the island. The nuncio made his public entry into Kilkenny with all the pomp of royalty, and all affairs, civil and ecclesiastical, were resigned to his direction. He ordered the members of the supreme council and other promoters of the treaty to be imprisoned. By a decree, issued in his own name and of his own authority, he appointed a new council of three bishops and eight laymen. In this assembly he himself acted as president; he modelled the armies, appointed the officers, and determined everything in the plenitude of apostolic authority. [The names of those thus imprisoned were Viscount Mountgarrett, Sir Lucas Dillon, Viscount Costelloe, Col. Bagnall, Mr. Thomas Tyrrell, Mr. Richard Bellings, Sir Percy Crosby, Dr. Fennell, and Mr. Wall. Lord Muskerry was confined to, and guarded in his own chamber; and persons were sent to Galway to arrest Mr. Geoffrey Browne. All these were members of the supreme council, and the most eminent among the Roman Catholic body. These names, and indeed all the facts above stated, are taken from a narrative, by Mr. Richard Bellings, who was secretary to the supreme council, and a principal agent employed by the Roman Catholics in their negociations abroad.—See Desiderata cur. Hib. vol. ii., pp. 275, 347, 375, 384.] And what was the consequence? Ormonde, rather than hand over the whole island to the rule of a Papal nuncio, delivered up his garrisons to the parliament, and a few short months saw the whole of Ireland subdued to the iron yoke of Cromwell.

We ask Roman Catholics to consider these former passages in Irish history, and to ask themselves—Has the spirit which dictated Adrian's Bull, and guided Rinuccini's movements, disappeared altogether from their clergy? Are there no indications of the same disposition to lord it over the laity and control their freedom of action? Is there nothing in the events of our time to point out to Roman Catholic laymen that there is an object dearer to the priests of their church than Irish prosperity and Irish nationality? Is there nothing to show an indisposition to see all ranks and degrees of Irishmen united in the common object of exalting the moral and social condition of her people, and a desire to thwart that interchange of social intercourse, which, forgetting difference of creed and of religious belief, would unite all in the bond of our common humanity? In our desire of promoting such an union, we do not advocate an abstinence from the discussion of those subjects which ought to be the most important in the consideration of each. On the contrary, we invite and earnestly entreat our Roman Catholic countrymen to discuss with us these differences peaceably and charitably. We invite them to the study of history, to see whether submission to Rome has tended to the temporal advantage and external prosperity of any nation. We invite them to consider the several conditions of our own and other nations, to see whether the supremacy of a Romish priesthood has anywhere aided in the development of moral and intellectual excellence. And, above all, we invite them to the study of God's own Word, to see whether the peculiar tenets which submission to Rome requires them to hold are in accordance with that word which cannot err.

ADRIAN'S BULL TO HENRY II.

"ADRIAN, bishop, servant of the servants of God, to his dearest son in Christ, the illustrious King of England, greeting and apostolic benediction:—

"Full laudably and profitably hath your magnificence conceived the design of propagating your glorious renown on earth, and completing your reward of eternal happiness in heaven; while, as a Catholic prince, you are intent on enlarging the borders of the Church, teaching the truths of the Christian faith to the ignorant and rude, exterminating the roots of vice from the field of the soul, and for the more convenient execution of this purpose, requiring the counsel and favour of the Apostolic See. In which, the maturer your deliberation, and the greater the discretion of your proceedings, by so much the happier, we trust, will be your progress, with the assistance of the Lord; as all things are used to come to a prosperous end and issue, which take their beginning from the ardour of faith and the love of religion.

"There is, indeed, no doubt but that Ireland, and all the islands on which Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, hath shone and which have received the doctrines of the Christian faith, do belong to the jurisdiction of St. Peter, and of the holy Roman Church, as your Excellency also doth acknowledge. And, therefore, we are the more solicitous to propagate the righteous plantation of faith in the land, and the branch acceptable to God, as we have the secret conviction of conscience, that this is more especially our bounden duty.

"You thus, most dear son in Christ, have signified to us your desire to enter into the Island of Ireland, in order to reduce the people to obedience unto laws, and to extirpate the plants of vice; and that you are willing to pay from each house a yearly pension of one penny to St. Peter, and that you will preserve the rights of the churches of this land whole and inviolate. We, therefore, with that grace and acceptance suited to your petition, do hold it good and acceptable, that for extending the borders of the Church, sustaining the virtue and the increase of religion, you enter this island, and execute therein whatever shall pertain to the honour of God and welfare of the land; and that the people of this land receive you honourably, and reverence you as their lord: the rights of their churches still remaining sacred and inviolate; and saving to St. Peter the annual pension of one penny from every house. If, then, you be resolved to carry the design you have conceived into effectual execution, study to form this nation to virtuous manners; and labour by yourself and others, whom you shall judge most meet for this work in faith and life, that the Church may be there adorned, that the religion of the Christian faith may be planted, and grow up, and that all things pertaining to the honour of God, and the salvation of souls, may be so ordered, that you may be entitled to the fulness of eternal reward from God, and obtain a glorious renown on earth, throughout all ages."

This Bull was subsequently, and after the conquest of Ireland by Henry II., confirmed by Pope Alexander, who, by his brief, ratified the gift of Adrian, with the reservation of Peter's-pence.

DEAR HARP OF MY COUNTRY.

BY THOMAS MOORE.

[The recent death of the most popular of our national poets gives a melancholy interest to the following lines, taken from his matchless Irish Melodies. The translation is taken from the fourth number of Moore's Melodies, translated into Irish, by Dr. MacHale."]

DEAR Harp of my country! in darkness I found thee,
The cold chain of silence hath hung o'er thee long,
When proudly, my own Island Harp! I unbound thee,
And gave all thy chords to light, freedom, and song!
The warm lay of love, and the light note of gladness,
Have waken'd thy fondest, thy liveliest thrill;
But so oft hast thou echoed the deep sigh of sadness,
That ev'n in thy mirth it will steal from thee still.

Dear Harp of my country! farewell to thy numbers,
This sweet wreath of song is the last we shall twine;
Go, sleep, with the sunshine of Fame on thy slumbers,
Till touched by some hand less unworthy than mine.
If the pulse of the patriot, soldier, or lover,
Have throbb'd at our lay, 'tis thy glory alone;
I was but as the wind, passing heedlessly over,
And all the wild sweetness I waked was thy own.

Ponn—"Langolee."*

ITALIAN NEWSPAPER.

We have been much gratified by receiving several numbers of a religious periodical, "La Buona Novella," published weekly, at Turin, in which a very cordial notice is taken of our Journal, and some of our articles are very kindly translated in full, in the Italian language. We cordially respond to the kind and flattering sentiments of our esteemed fellow-labourer in the cause of truth and religious freedom, and rejoice at the improving prospects of liberty and religious knowledge in the interesting country which is now the field of his labours. We hope we shall continue to be favoured with a copy of his valuable Journal.

AMERICAN PRESS.

We have also been favoured with a number of "The Irish Evangelist," devoted to the spiritual good of Irish emigrants, and published at New York, which appears to be conducted with much ability, by Mr. John Hurley, editor and proprietor. We have directed Mr. Hurley to be supplied regularly with the "Catholic Layman," and hope to be favoured in return with a copy of "The Irish Evangelist," and, if possible from the commencement.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith.

Subscriptions are earnestly solicited, which our friends will observe are payable in advance. The amount may be forwarded either in postage stamps or a post office order, payable to Mr. Wm. Curry, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, MARCH, 1852.

THE influence which the Gospel of Jesus Christ has had upon the social and political welfare of mankind, is one of the greatest of its worldly achievements. It found the world in a fearful position: most nations known to history had been conquered by the Roman arms, and were governed by Roman officers, who purchased the office, to make what they could by plunder and extortion. The Roman empire itself, the mistress of the world, celebrated as it had been for its institutions, its civilization, its greatness, was then a vast tyranny, in which the life, the liberty, the property of every individual was at the mercy of one man. And Roman civilization did not hinder, but did actually promote the most flagrant public crimes. The killing of infants by their own parents, to avoid the expense of rearing them, was a usual and a legal practice. The favourite amusement of the most refined of the Roman ladies was to behold numbers of men fight and kill each other in the public theatres. If but few were killed, the spectators complained of the bad sport. The immoralities of private life, and the disregard of the marriage union, were too bad to be stated. Such was the civilization of the most civilized part of the world, without the Gospel.

From the day that the Gospel of Christ found a footing "in Cæsar's household," it warred against these scandalous crimes, and did so with success. All Christians were required to renounce the deeds of their heathen ignorance; and their example compelled the very heathens to forsake those acts.

This was the first great social triumph of the Gospel.

When the Christian empire of Rome was destroyed by heathen barbarians, and all civilization and learning seemed about to perish in the world, the Gospel of Christ again put forth its power, and saved all that was worth saving in the wreck. That Gospel brought the barbarian conquerors, in their hour of savage triumph, to learn from the conquered whatever was worth learning; and thus was civilization preserved, and by the same Divine power was it improved, in the kingdoms of modern Europe.

If the poorest, weakest, and most degraded state of Christendom, is now infinitely superior in public morals to all civilized states of the ancient heathen world, it is to the Gospel of Christ that it is owing. If any doubt it, let him look at the heathen world of the present day; look at the nations of India, and read of Juggernaut, of the burning of their widows, and the enormity of their political cruelties. The heathen world, at this day, affords no single instance of rational political liberty, or of a social condition that Christians could think tolerable.

And the Gospel has not yet ceased its triumphs. In our own day it has gone far to abolish slavery, and to destroy the slave-trade—that greatest and most crying iniquity of which mankind has been guilty.

Who, that looks on even this brief sketch, can fail to hope, that the Gospel of Christ will yet do still greater things for the social and political welfare of mankind? and the Scriptures of God confirm and authorize this hope. The Scripture tells us, that when "The knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea," that then "The lion shall lie down with the lamb"—that violence and oppression shall cease—"Neither shall the nations learn war any more."

In proportion as the pure gospel of Christ is fitted and intended thus to promote the happiness and welfare of mankind, so are all perversions and corruptions of that Gospel calculated to perpetuate and to increase the miseries of mankind.

It is, therefore, a subject of deep and absorbing interest, to consider how the various forms in which the Gospel has been presented to us have acted on the welfare of nations and of men. LIBERTY is the thing most essential to the progress and prosperity of mankind—slavery the most fatal to all improvement. The Gospel, therefore, tends to liberty, political as well as spiritual.

Look now at Europe, and see what a spectacle we behold! Among the great powers of Europe England alone retains her liberties! Look at France! Four years ago we saw her, as a FREE REPUBLIC, boasting as her motto, "Liberty, fraternity, equality!" Now we see her groaning under an absolute tyranny—martial law and the state of siege! Constitutional government and the liberty of the press—that best guardian of all other liberty—wholly overthrown!

Look at Austria, and we see a similar picture! Look at Hungary, at the feet of her lord! See absolutism ascendant in Prussia—all hope of Italian liberty seemingly extinct—whatever Spain had yet attained of constitutional liberty vanishing away—the small States yet nominally free, such as Belgium and Switzerland, now threatened with the extinction of liberty, and perhaps of existence.

Such is the mournful spectacle which Europe now presents to us. What freeman can but mourn over it?

One bright spot yet exists, and long may it continue! The empire to which we belong, yet stands up before the world as a NATION OF FREEMEN, the last stronghold of liberty in Europe. However little some Irishmen may love England, they cannot but admire and be proud of her in this. Like the old English warrior when he told on the battle-field of the flight or death of all his comrades whom he loved, and bore testimony to the one whom he hated—

> "That misbegotten devil, Falconbridge, > Alone, in spite of spite, holds out the day."

And what part has the Gospel of Christ, in that form in which it is chiefly presented to Europe, taken in all this ruin of her liberties? Alas, the Papacy and the Court of Rome is banded throughout Europe with every form of absolute and tyrannical power, for the destruction of every vestige of constitutional liberty.

Who has extinguished liberty in Rome? Who has consigned the northern provinces of Italy to the iron rule of Austria? Who has taken advantage of the times to establish a law in Spain that no man shall dare to worship God there except after the fashion of Rome? Who has ordered thanksgivings to be offered up in the churches of France, for the destruction of the liberties of France? Who is now the steadfast friend and supporter of every despot in Europe? All this, the Court and Pope of Rome have done. These things cannot last, for the spirit of liberty is strong, and is growing stronger in Europe; but for the present all this is done, and it is done with the sanction, and by the help of the heads of the Roman Church.

Let not our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen hastily condemn us for bringing before them facts at which we know they will blush. We respect and honour the blushes of freemen at the fall of liberty. It is this feeling of respect that has led us into this train of thought. We have marked that Irish Roman Catholics have no sympathy with the enemies of the liberty of Europe; and it is with the single object of bringing out this striking fact that we pen this article. A little ultramontainist faction among Irish Roman Catholics, with Dr. Cullen at their head, may bid God-speed to all this; but no party of the Irish people have done so. In such matters the voice of the public press is the evidence of the feeling of the people; and we look with pleasure on the general tone of the Roman Catholic press in Ireland on this subject. With the exception of one or two organs of a foreign policy, the Irish press have not rejoiced at the downfall of liberty, or at the political part which the Roman Church is now acting in Europe. We trust we may extend this praise to a large majority of the Irish Roman Catholic priests. A few foreign priests alone in Ireland—the immediate emissaries and agents of Rome—will stand forth in the defence of her present betrayal of the dearest rights and liberties of men.

What Irishman would willingly submit to what France now submits to, and what the Pope now orders her to thank God for? Would any Irishman tolerate that the newspaper which he reads, which expresses his opinions and feelings, should be ordered, by a law of the British Government, to print nothing but what had first been submitted to the government, and approved by them? Would he tolerate that the editor of any newspaper, transgressing this rule, should be brought before a government magistrate of police (not before a jury of his country), and punished as that police magistrate should think fit? This is now the law of France and of all the great powers of the Continent of Europe. No voice can there be heard, except what the rulers please. Would Irish Roman Catholics THANK GOD for this? Yet, the heads of the Roman Church in France order Frenchmen to do so. Was there ever such a mockery of thanksgiving to God? Irishmen would not bear this for themselves; and they cannot, and do not approve of its being imposed upon others. We bring these facts before them as a solemn warning how they allow themselves to be guided in their own political conduct, or in the exercise of their political privileges, by the power that has aided in overthrowing the liberties of Europe, and which is now allied with every absolute power to prevent the revival of LIBERTY.

What Irishman's heart does not respond to that word? Who would not bid it God-speed throughout the world? We conclude with one more illustration from France—a law has gone forth in that unfortunate country, that wherever the name of "Liberty" is found inscribed on any public building, it should be erased! and workmen have been employed to fulfil this law! Let us take warning by the fall of others; let us hold fast to the liberty which we possess. And let us not neglect, above all, the true and lasting liberty, "the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free."

ON THE MANNER OF APPOINTING ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOPS IN IRELAND.

IT is admitted by all Irish Roman Catholics that two different methods of choosing bishops are both equally compatible with full communion with the Church of Rome. One is, that the person who is to be made a bishop should be chosen in Ireland, and by Irishmen, and that the Pope should issue a Bull for the consecration of that person: the other is, that the Pope himself should choose whatever person he may please, and that no Irishman should have anything to do with the choice.

This is not a question of empty speculation; it is a practical and present question. Both methods are now before the Irish people. For the last thirty-five years, at least, Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland have always been chosen by the priests of the vacant diocess, who, of course, are Irishmen. The practice has been for the priests to choose three men, of whom the Pope appointed one; so that no man could be a Roman Catholic bishop in Ireland, unless elected by the priests of the diocess. But the Pope and the Court of Rome have lately set all this aside, and have determined to take the choice of Irish bishops into their own hands, and to let no Irishman, whether priest or layman, have anything to do with it. The great step was taken a very short time since, in the case of Dr. Cullen, now Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh. On the death of Dr. Crolly, his predecessor, the priests of the diocess of Armagh assembled, according to custom, and elected three men for the Pope to choose out of. The Pope set aside the three names returned by the priests, and appointed, out of his own will and pleasure, Dr. Cullen, who was not one of the three. We believe that, in another case, which has since occurred, the Pope has done the same thing, showing that it is the result of a deliberate plan and design.

Now, no Roman Catholic will say that the election by Irish priests of those who were made bishops during the last forty years was heretical or improper. The change, therefore, is not made on any Catholic ground, but on some ground or design that is purely Roman, and not Irish. It is not the Roman Catholic religion that required the change, but simply the policy and the designs of the Court of Rome.

No one can say that this is of no importance to the spirit of Irish nationality. So long as the heads of any clergy are elected by natives of that country, so long the clergy itself will partake of the national spirit. But so surely as the heads of a clergy are nominated by the arbitrary will and uncontrolled choice of a foreign power (and Rome is surely a foreign country), so surely will that clergy be divested of all national spirit, and will sink into mere tools of the power that names them.

We cannot suppose that the Pope intended to offer a needless insult to the spirit of Irish independence. This cannot be. There must be some deeper object at the bottom. We propose to show, from the history of all countries, and especially of Ireland, that it has ever been the settled policy of Rome to crush all exercise of national independence, all feeling of national spirit, in order that all may come to depend more entirely on Rome. We are not speaking now of religion, but of political and temporal control. So long as national feeling exists, so long Rome can never have the supreme control of the world which she once enjoyed, and still seeks to regain. We believe that a deep design has been laid, to subjugate all national spirit in Ireland, and to obtain for Roman agents the direction of everything in Ireland.

We appeal to daily events to confirm our view. The advantage which the middle classes may yet derive from the Queen's Colleges has been rejected by purely Roman influence. Had the Irish priests of the diocess of Armagh been allowed to elect their own primate, those advantages would have been secured to the Irish Roman Catholic laity, and the colleges would have been gratefully accepted by the Irish Roman Catholic bishops themselves. But rejected they were by Roman policy. Then an Irish Catholic university was to be established, and funds were extracted from the starving Irish. Was that university to be more "national" than Dr. Cullen's appointment? Let the selection of a rector for it answer. Dr. Newman, an English convert, known to have published since his conversion, opinions directly opposed to the Council of Trent, and to the teaching of Maynooth; but a great friend of Cardinal Wiseman. This appointment is published by Dr. Cullen in a letter to a French paper, the "Univers," with unbounded approbation. Again a Catholic Defence Association was established in Dublin, a secretary was to be appointed, but "no Irish need apply." Mr. Wilberforce, another English convert, and personal friend of Dr. Wiseman, is appointed. Dr. Cullen, indeed, was ill, and could not be present (illness will happen sometimes inconveniently, sometimes not), but no one doubts that he was concurring in the plan. Within a few weeks we have seen a joint letter from several Irish parliamentary representatives, urgently remonstrating against this course, and indignantly reclaiming against it. The Times, and some other papers, have treated all this as if these Irishmen were merely griping after the petty salary attached to the office. We entertain no such thoughts; we believe that these Irishmen see, like ourselves, that there is a deep-laid scheme to eradicate all feeling of Irish nationality, for the furtherance of the objects of Rome; and that Drs. Cullen and Wiseman are agents of Rome, specially selected for the work.

It may be asked, what all this is to us? and we are ready to answer the question. We are Irishmen in heart and feeling; ready and anxious to join, heart and hand, with all our fellow-countrymen, in the spirit of Irish nationality. We speak honestly, and faithfully, and kindly to our fellow-countrymen where we differ from them; but that does not make us less willing or less fit, but more willing and more worthy, to join them in Irish feeling. And when we see a large number of them, who differ from us in submitting to a foreign church, about to fall into a snare for increasing that subjection to an extent which they themselves must confess is not required by their own religious convictions, even to the extent of making their church an instrument of extinguishing in their breasts all feeling of national individuality and independence, we conceive we have a duty, arising from our common nationality, to ask them to resist the attempt. And we believe that they are ready to hear us. The proceedings we have referred to, are not acceptable to the Irish laity. We appeal to the Irish members who signed the remonstrance against the appointment of Mr. Wilberforce. We appeal to the able articles against Dr. Cullen's anti-national spirit which have appeared in the leading provincial Roman Catholic Journal of Ireland, the Cork Southern Reporter. We appeal to our countrymen in general, not to allow their national spirit to be brought into bondage to Rome, which the Roman religion itself does not require. We believe that they will admit our appeal; and we shall in this, and our next number, proceed to show them, from Roman Catholic authorities only, how the policy of Rome has always been to take the management of all Irish affairs out of the influence of Irish nationality; and how intimately that policy has ever been connected with the method of electing those who are to be Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland.

HISTORICAL ACCOUNT OF THE MANNER OF APPOINTING BISHOPS IN IRELAND.

ALL students of Irish ecclesiastical history agree in distinguishing three periods, which are most convenient for our inquiry:—

1. From the first spread of Christianity in Ireland to the Synod of Kells, A.D. 1152, at which the Archbishops of Ireland first received palls from Rome.

2. From the Synod of Kells to the Reformation, or separation of the Church of England from the Church of Rome.

3. From the Reformation to the present time.

In the first period, Ireland had one church, and one only; independent of Rome, though living often in friendship, but sometimes in discord with her.

In the second, Ireland had one church only, growing gradually more subject to Rome.

In the third, two rival churches have existed in Ireland—one independent of Rome, the other in a subjugation to Rome, growing daily more total and hopeless.

One question is, how bishops were appointed in these various periods?

The first period we treat of solely by extracts from the writings of known Roman Catholic historians of the greatest credit, and the statements of Irish Roman Catholic bishops in late times.

I. Our first authority for the first period is the Irish History of Mr. O'Halloran—a man of learning and character, a strict Roman Catholic, and a great lover of Irish nationality.

He states (vol. iii. p. 13), "at a very early period, Christianity was preached in Ireland. The constant enmity betwixt Rome and Ireland cut off all communication between them."

"The Irish received the faith from the early Asiatic or African churches; and Palladius was, therefore, the first bishop sent from Rome to establish the Roman hierarchy here."

(P. 23.) "Amongst the other causes of (Saint) Patrick's great influence on the people, one was, his attention to avoid whatever could alarm the national pride, or alter the established police (policy?) of the kingdom. As to the first we find no hint at a foreign supremacy during the whole of his mission."

(P. 29.) "Christian bishops were appointed to succeed the Archflamens (the heathen priests before the conversion of the Irish), by those families only who, being converted, had a right to the nomination."

After speaking of the opposition of the Irish Church, in the seventh century, to the order of the Roman Church about keeping Easter, he goes on to say—

(P. 42.) "From this period to the middle of the twelfth century, Rome and Ireland had no connection or correspondence."

In pages 395 and 6, describing the state of the Irish Church in the beginning of the twelfth century, he says—"The power of nominating bishops to certain dioceses was received to certain royal and noble families in the different parts of the kingdom, and to them alone . . It does not appear that the Popes ever enjoyed any direct power or authority whatever over that Church (the Irish) . . . . No proof whatever can be produced that the Popes nominated to bishoprics amongst us."

Such is the testimony of Mr. O'Halloran concerning the first period of our inquiry.

If it can be shown that he was wrong in saying that, "No proof whatever can be produced that the Popes nominated to bishoprics amongst us," we suppose some one can produce such proofs relative to the period we are speaking of, and our pages are open to any one who can produce them, as we are only anxious to promote truth.

Our next witness is Dr. Charles O'Connor—a real Irishman of the old stock, and a Roman Catholic. He says, in a note to page 43 of his third letter from Columbanus ad Hibernos, "It will appear evident from the Irish Annals, as well as from the letters of the Ancient Fathers, published by Ussher, in his Sylloge; and from the Lives of Columba, by Adamnan; and of Columban, by Jonas; that the Irish always appointed their own bishops, without so much as the knowledge of Rome."

Dr. O'Connor argues, that this must have been the practice in St. Patrick's time, from a letter written to the Bishops of Vienna and Narbonne, by Celestine, who was Pope at that time, in which Celestine says—"Observe the discipline of the Church exactly . . . Let no bishop be imposed upon any person against their consent, but by the suffrages of the clergy, and the agreement of the gentry and people of the vacant See." Dr. O'Connor justly thinks, that a Pope who told the Gallic bishops that this was the "discipline of the Church," could not have claimed to appoint bishops in Ireland.

* Rome conquered England by arms; but never conquered Ireland, but this so alarmed the Irish, for fear of their being brought into the same subjection, that they became very jealous of Roman influence. England, at the Council of Constance, in 1414, reaped an advantage from the ancient preservation of Irish independence, of which a short notice will be found in our present number.

This suggests to us another argument worthy of our notice. The canon law of the Church of Rome itself, for a thousand years, directs that every bishop should be chosen in his own province, and does not give the Pope any right of appointing bishops.

Our next witness is one above all objection. He is Peter Talbot, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin not 200 years ago—a predecessor of the late respected Dr. Murray.

The point we bring him forward to prove is not exactly the same which the last witness spoke to, but it is one which completes the subject. Mr. O'Halloran and Dr Connor say, that the Pope did not appoint Bishops in Ireland up to the twelfth century. Archbishop Talbot undertakes to prove that the Pope did not make Archbishops in Ireland before that time.

The occasion of Archbishop Talbot writing was this—he claimed the Primacy of all Ireland for himself as Archbishop of Dublin. Dr. Oliver Plunket, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, wrote a book to prove that, as successor of St. Patrick, he was Primate of Ireland. Archbishop Talbot then wrote his book, called "Primatus Dubliniensis," to support the claim of Dublin to the Primacy, which was published in 1674.

He begins by saying,* "Primacy can be nothing else than ecclesiastical jurisdiction, greater than that of an archbishop, conferred upon the prelate of any See or state by the Supreme Pontiff . . . . But that jurisdiction cannot be conferred otherwise than by giving the pall of that order." (N.B.—The pall is a woollen garment made at Rome with some curious ceremonies; and the giving of it by the Pope is supposed to confer the authority of archbishop or primate.)

Having laid down this principle, which Roman Catholics cannot deny (though Protestants do deny it, on the ground that archbishops and primates were not made by the Pope at all in the early Church), Archbishop Talbot goes on to apply it (p. 10)†—"It appears, from St. Bernard, that the pall and primacy of St. Patrick was fabulous . . . . for he says, in his Life of St. Malachy, that to the See of Armagh, the use of the pall, which is the fulness of honour, was yet wanting, and had been wanting from the beginning. And it seemed good in his eyes (Malachy's). if the Church for which he had laboured so much (Armagh, of which he was Archbishop), which hitherto had it not, should acquire it by his zeal and labour. And in section 16, he bore it sufficiently ill, that Ireland should, even as yet, be without the pall. What, I beseech you, is the use of the pall, what the fulness of honour, unless it be the jurisdiction of an Archbishop, and the dignity of Primate? This was wanting from the beginning to the See of Armagh, and to all Ireland, as appears from the words of D. Bernard."‡

This does not prove to Protestants that St. Patrick was not Archbishop and Primate of Ireland; because Protestants are content to follow the early Church, which had archbishops and primates, not made by the Bishop of Rome. But to Roman Catholics, who hold that no man can be a lawful archbishop or primate unless the Pope make him such by giving him the pall, the proof is conclusive that, on their principles, neither St. Patrick, nor any of his successors until 1152, were Archbishops of Armagh or Primate of Ireland. And it proves (what is our concern at present), by the testimony of St. Malachy, Archbishop of Armagh, and of St. Bernard, the last of the Fathers, both of whom lived at the very time, that up to the year 1152, the Pope had never made an Archbishop or Primate of Ireland.

In page 17, Archbishop Talbot says—"St. Patrick himself never was Primate, nor even an Archbishop, since he had not the Pall."§

In page 41, he says—"I have consulted what authors I could, and I have considered the annals treating of that matter, and I here seriously declare, that I have fallen upon no author, worthy of credit, who produces even a probable conjecture, that ever at any time the See of Armagh obtained the Primacy of Ireland from the Apostolic See."

Archbishop Talbot having thus settled the claim of Armagh to the Primacy goes on to establish the claim of Dublin in page 26—

"It remains that we should prove that the Dublin pall was given by the Roman Pontiff to the city of Dublin, for this reason: because it was the chief or principal city, and the head of the Kingdom of Ireland: and at that time, too, when a pall had never before existed in Ireland."‖ And then, he brings forward the pall given to Dublin at the Synod of Kells, A.D. 1152!

Is it not enough to make an Irishman's blood boil in him to hear this Irishman, Peter Talbot, of an old and honourable and patriotic family in Ireland, this Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, deliberately maintaining, that Ireland, the Island of Saints, never had an archbishop or primate until the year 1152? and that neither St. Patrick himself, nor any of his successors, ever was a lawful primate, or even an archbishop—simply because the Pope had never made him such—which is, indeed, true.

Yet this is what all Roman Catholics must now say, unless their pride in the ancient independence of Ireland be greater than their love of subjection to Rome.

This book of Archbishop Talbot's has been carefully suppressed of late years. A copy, in Marsh's library, about twenty-five years ago, was supposed to be the only one in existence. It was stolen out of that library in the year 1828. †

But where is the use of suppressing the book while its principles are maintained? Let Roman Catholics only avow, that St. Patrick was, indeed, a lawful primate and archbishop of Ireland, by the laws of the ancient Church—although he was not created by the Pope—and then they may repudiate this book. But if they persist in making everything depend upon Rome, then they must repudiate St. Patrick as an archbishop, just as their own Archbishop Talbot did.

We have proved our first point—that no bishops nor archbishops in Ireland were made by the Pope up to the year 1152. We shall go on with the next period in our next number.

ANCIENT DIGNITY OF IRELAND.

The following history (which we take from the Appendix to the General Council of Constance)‡ will be interesting to Irishmen, as showing the respect which was paid to the ancient dignity of Ireland.

We must explain, that there was an ancient custom in those councils, of voting by "Nations," as it was called. Four "Nations" were acknowledged—viz., France, Spain, Germany, and Italy. These "Nations" were not "Kingdoms." Each was a collection of several independent kingdoms. We have the lists; and we find that each "Nation" comprised six or eight kingdoms, whose governments were independent of each other.

At the Council of Constance, which was held A.D. 1414, the King of England claimed that the English should be acknowledged as a separate "Nation," having a vote of their own in the Council. The King of France was very jealous at this, and ordered his ambassadors to protest against it in the Council; their protest is given in the appendix of the Council to which we have referred. The ambassadors of France insist, that England had always been reckoned part of the German "Nation" in all general councils; and they maintain that it ought to be so still; for, as England had only twenty-five bishops, it was absurd that so few should have a separate vote in the Council.

The ambassadors of the English King were heard in reply, and they do not deny either of the above statements; but they say, in answer to the fewness of their bishops, that the Irish, who had sixty dioceses, were united with them in the "Anglican Nation," and taking in the Welsh and some Scotch bishops, who joined with them, there were 110 bishops altogether. And in answer to the statement, that England had always been counted part of the German nation, and not a nation in itself, they do not deny it: on the contrary, they seem to admit that this was true; but then they quote St. Albert the Great and Bartholomæus as follows—"That the whole world being divided into three parts—viz., Asia, Africa, and Europe; Europe is divided into four kingdoms—first, the Roman; secondly, the Constantinopolitan; third, the kingdom of Ireland, which is now translated to the English; and fourth, the kingdom of Spain. From which it appears, that the King of England and his kingdom are of the most eminent and the most ancient kings and kingdoms of all Europe, which prerogative the kingdom of France cannot obtain."

Such was the defence of the ambassadors of England. They did not rest their claim upon the rights of England itself, but on her inheriting the ancient rights of Ireland; and thus England obtained dignity in Europe, and influence in Christendom, by her union with Ireland. For this defence having been heard by the Council of Constance, they decided, that England and Ireland united should rank and vote as a separate nation, thus giving them an influence in the Council which the King of France sought to prevent, and which would have been wholly lost if England had stood alone. We observe, as an appropriate acknowledgment of their obligation to Ireland, that the "Anglican Nation" was throughout represented at that Council by "Patrick, Bishop of Cork."

The rank assigned to Ireland among the kingdoms of Europe, in the above extract, may not appear so absurd if we reflect, that all the other kingdoms of modern Europe, which have any antiquity, arose out of the ruins of the Roman Empire, and can trace their origin no farther back than its decay; while Ireland, which had never been conquered by the Romans, could show the successions of her kingdom for ages before. This was, no doubt, the reason of the precedence assigned to her by St. Albert and Bartholomæus.

In the preface to Lynch's Feudal Dignities, it is stated (p. 8), that the French rolls in the Tower contain enrolments of the proceedings, on behalf of England, at the Council of Constance.

Correspondence.

ON TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

We have received the following communication, bearing the Enniscorthy post-mark. We thank our correspondent for it, and we print it with pleasure, conceiving it to be very deserving of a place in our pages. Of course, we think it also our duty, when inserting such communications, to make such observations as seem to us useful. Our correspondent will, we are sure, take this in good part; his object is evidently to promote fair and profitable discussion, and we give his communication verbatim:—

"15th February, 1852.

"Sir—I furnish you with the result of my reading, consequent on my receiving The Catholic Layman, and earnestly hope my extracts may be useful to your end.—I am in charity, yours,

"A Catholic Layman.

"When instituting this sacrament, our Lord himself said—'This is my body'—'The bread I will give is my flesh for the life of the world.'—John vi. 52. 'Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you.'—John vi. 54. You say, perhaps, this bread is no other than what is used for common food. Before consecration it is indeed bread; but no sooner are the words of consecration pronounced, than from bread it becomes the flesh of Christ." St. Ambrose, lib. 4, de sacr. c. 4 et c. 5.

"'Whatever the Lord pleased, he hath done in heaven and on earth.'—Psa. cxxxiv. 6. Although the species of bread and wine are visible, yet faith tells us that after consecration, the body and blood of Christ are alone there."—St. Ambrose de consec., dist. 2, c. omnia.

"Each receives Christ the Lord entire in each particle; he is not diminished by being given to many, but gives himself whole and entire to each."—St. Augustine, de consec. dist. 2, c. singulis.

"'Take and divide it amongst you'—Luke xxii. 17. You see how efficacious are the words of Christ; if, then, the word of the Lord Jesus is so powerful as to summon creation into existence, shall it not require a less exercise of power to make that subsist which already has existence and to change it into another thing?"—St. Ambrose, l. 4 de sacr. c. 4.

"This change mocks the powers of conception, nor can we find any example of it in natural transmutations, nor even in the wide range of creation. The change itself is the object, not of our comprehension, but of our humble faith; and the manner of that change forbids the temerity of a too curious inquiry."—Eccl. iii. 22. 'No word shall be impossible to God.'—Luke i. 37."

Our brother layman does not seem to disclaim the doctrine of transubstantiation, as stated in the article, in our second number to which he refers, and to which we now beg our readers to look back. He rather seems to admit it, and to justify it. We might prefer that he should have disclaimed the doctrine as there stated; yet we feel that the course which he has taken is one entitled to respectful consideration, because he appeals to the Scripture and to the early Fathers; and it is our sincere desire to discuss such arguments in a reverent and candid spirit.

Our correspondent quotes his Scripture proofs from the Douay Bible, at which we do not complain. He seems to use not the modern edition, which is approved by the present Roman Catholic bishops, but the first edition, published in 1582, or some other, which does not contain the modern alterations. We make no objection to this; only we beg of him to observe, that most of the notes in the early editions have been very properly omitted in that now in use.

Our correspondent seems to think that all the words which he quotes from St. John's Gospel were spoken by our Saviour "when instituting this sacrament." If he will examine this more closely, he will see that of the three passages he has quoted, these words only, "this is my body," were spoken at the institution; all the rest were spoken on another occasion, at least a year before the sacrament was instituted. It is, therefore, a question whether these words were spoken of the institution, since they were certainly not spoken at it. Now, it is well known that the Fathers differed about this; and the Council of Trent admits that they differed, for the Council says (Session 21, ch. 1)—"Neither from that discourse in the sixth of John, is it rightly gathered that the partaking of both kinds (bread and wine) was commanded by the Lord; however, it (the discourse) may be understood according to the various interpretations of the holy Fathers and doctors." So the case stands thus: the Fathers differed about whether this discourse was spoken of the institution: we have not, therefore, "the unanimous consent of the Fathers" to interpret this Scripture. The Council of Trent and the Pope could not say which opinion was right; we have, therefore, no guidance here from the infallible judge; and so Roman Catholics and Protestants must form their opinion alike from private judgment on this question, or else they can have no opinion about it at all. We suggest to our friend this way of forming an opinion. Our Saviour said, "If ANY MAN eat of this bread HE shall live for ever." Now, our correspondent will admit that this is NOT true of the consecrated bread in the sacrament. Judas eat of that bread, and perished for ever; many a wicked man eats of it and perishes for ever; but our Saviour's words ARE true of himself as the bread of life. Therefore, we apply his words to that of which they are true, and not to that of which they are not true; we think that he spoke not of that bread blessed in the sacrament, but that spiritual nourishment which Christ gives to those who faithfully use that sacrament which he has appointed for them.

Our correspondent also quotes from the early Fathers, in support of that view of transubstantiation, which we invited Roman Catholics to disclaim. We treat such an argument with respect, though we do not submit to it as infallible; nor do we suppose he produces it as such; for we are sure any person of learning and candour must admit, that many errors might be supported by quotations from Fathers. Still, we give the argument a respectful consideration.

The first step in such an examination is, to inquire carefully whether the Fathers did really say what is attributed to them. We do not, for a moment, suppose that our correspondent would willingly put forward anything, as coming from Augustine or Ambrose, which he knew was not really theirs; but experience has taught us the necessity of such an inquiry; and we think he will see it himself in a new light after hearing what we have to say.

Three of his quotations out of five are from St. Ambrose. Now, Du Pin, a French Roman Catholic divine whose learning rendered him one of the best judges that ever lived of such a question as this, says, in his account of ecclesiastical writers (vol. i., fourth century, St. Ambrose)—"The works of St. Ambrose, above all the other Fathers, have been most corrupted in the ordinary editions. The Roman edition from which those that followed after were made, instead of restoring the text of this Father, hath rendered it more faulty in many places, by the liberty which the supervisors of that edition took of making alterations in it by their own authority." In quoting St. Ambrose, we should, therefore, be very careful to use the best edition, which is that made by the learned Benedictine monks.

Our correspondent, however, has quoted St. Ambrose and St. Augustin, from the Decretum of Gratian. We do not wonder at this; it was most natural for him to do so. A commission of cardinals and others was appointed, by Pope Gregory XIII., to correct the Decretum; and the Pope confirmed the book so corrected by a Bull (A.D., 1580), and made it an integral part of the Roman Canon Law. No wonder that it should be regarded as a book of high authority, on which we might safely rely. Yet it is confessed, by learned men in the Church of Rome, that Gratian was most careless and incompetent in giving the real authors of the passages he quotes. Not only this, but he quotes numberless passages from letters said to have been written by early Popes, which letters are gross forgeries. Nearly all Gratian's authorities for the supremacy of the Pope (for instance) are taken from these forgeries: and the cardinals who corrected, and the Pope who confirmed the book, took no notice of this; yet it is now admitted, to the fullest extent, by every Roman Catholic writer on the subject. It is evident, therefore, that quotations from the Decretum cannot be admitted as coming from the Fathers to whom Gratian attributes them, without some further inquiry.

Our correspondent's first quotation is taken from the Decretum, De Consecr., Dist. 2, c. 55, where Gratian professes to take it from St. Ambrose, and refers to the book de Sacramentis, lib. iv., c. 4 and 5. The latest and best edition of the Canon Law, by Richter, published at Leipsic, 1839, 4to, has a brief and forcible note on this quotation—"Non est Ambrosii"—"It is none of Ambrose's." The learned Benedictine editors give a candid examination of the evidence whether this book were written by Ambrose, and decide it in the negative; among other reasons, because Ambrose never wrote in so mean a style, nor ever used the cold and childish interrogations, of which the book is full. (See Du Pin, as before referred to.) There can be no doubt that this passage was written by some obscure person in the eighth or ninth century, and that Gratian mistook it for St. Ambrose's.

The second passage which our correspondent quotes is to be found De Consecr., Dist. 2, c. 74. It is taken from the same book, on the sacraments, which St. Ambrose did NOT write; at least Ritcher says in his note, that there are "things like it" in that book, for it would seem he could not find the passage itself even there. The learned Berhard, whose book on the Decretum we shall notice presently, says—"Canon 74 is not found in Ambrose, although it is praised by Gratian, under the name of Ambrose."—vol. iv., p. 108. Our correspondent gives it thus—"Although the SPECIES of bread and wine are visible," &c. We think our correspondent has made a mistake in transcribing here; the Latin word is "figura," not "species." We have looked in the splendid original edition of Eggesteyn, Argent, 1471; in the small Paris edition of 1538; in the Roman edition, corrected by the Cardinals and approved by the Pope; and in Richter; and in all the word is "figura." If any edition had "species," Richter would notice it, which he does not. The word makes a great difference: species might mean that there was only the appearance, not the reality of bread: but "figura," means that the bread is a FIGURE of Christ's body, not the body itself; and so the passage means, that when we see this figure, we are to take hold of the thing itself by faith; which is Protestant doctrine.

The third passage which our correspondent quotes, he attributes to St. Augustine: we do not know on what authority. In the place of the Decretum which he refers to, it is attributed to St. Jerome in all the editions mentioned above. But no such passage has ever been found in any of St. Jerome's works. The cardinals appointed by the Pope to correct the Decretum, say that they found it in a Missal which they attribute not to St. Augustine, but to St. Ambrose. But all who understand such matters, know how impossible it is to attribute a Missal to any individual with certainty. The learned Berhard, in his most valuable work, "In Canones Gratiani," vol. iv., p. 115 (Venice, 1777), says, "it is rather to be referred to a certain Missal;" and this is all that can be said of it with truth. We do not altogether agree in our correspondent's translation here: he says "Each receives Christ the Lord entire in each particle; the Latin is, Singuli accipiunt Christum Dominum et in singulis portionibus totus est, &c.—"Each receive Christ the Lord, and he is whole in each portion." We see nothing in the Latin to make us apply this to the particles of the bread, but to the portion of Christ which each receives at the sacrament. All receive Christ equally and wholly.

The next passage quoted by our correspondent, and attributed to St. Ambrose, is from the same place in the Decretum (c. 55), and the same place in the book De Sacramentis, from which his first was taken, of which we have already spoken.

Therefore it appears that none of these quotations are the genuine writings of the persons whose names they bear. All are the opinions of obscure writers in much later ages, which have been mistaken for the writing of the Fathers; but which are really of no weight at all.

We have been particular in our examination of these passages, because we think that much mischief has been done in this controversy for want of such attention. The Fathers have not had fair play, when the works of obscure and mean writers have been allowed to pass under their names. The light which the genuine writings of the early Fathers can throw upon such questions has thus been greatly obscured, and controversy has been made more dark instead of more clear. We thought it our duty to take this opportunity of pointing out such an evil; but we do it with the greatest respect to our correspondent, feeling that he had great apparent reason to rely on the Decretum as he did, and that his letter affords a truly important subject for discussion. We shall be happy to hear from him again, and, in the meantime, we trust he will re-consider our notice of transubstantiation in our last number, and inquire whether Roman Catholics are really willing to admit it, as there stated.

SC.

ON CONCOMITANCY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As you say "We invite Roman Catholics to come forward and disclaim whatever they think is unjustly charged on their religion, and place our pages at their disposal for the purpose," I beg to stand forward in the name of thousands of Roman Catholics in Ireland, and deny boldly and explicitly the doctrine of transubstantiation as explained in your last number.

1st. Roman Catholics do not believe that the consecrated bread is changed into the blood of Christ, but they do believe that it is changed into his body, and that by concomitancy, where the body is the blood must be also. As there was nothing before consecration but bread, which cannot be transubstantiated into blood, the blood of Christ must, of course, come down from heaven to accompany the body on the altar into which the bread has been transubstantiated. Protestants will ridicule this doctrine of concomitancy, and profanely ask—"Does the body come down from the right hand of God along with the blood, or does the blood leave the body above, that it may accompany the body below?" Such questions all true Roman Catholics are not careful to answer. They merely wish to deny that there is any necessity for the divine body of Christ to come down from above, as the bread on the altar is really changed into that very body which sits at the right hand of God; but they acknowledge that there is a necessity for the blood to come down, in order to fulfil the law of concomitancy, and, therefore, they humbly, faithfully, and piously believe that it does so come down, notwithstanding the profane objections of the adversaries. Protestants will again absurdly and impiously inquire, "When the blood leaves the divine body in heaven, to unite itself with the body on the altar, into which the bread has been transubstantiated, does it leave that heavenly body bloodless above?" Again, permit me to say, no true and faithful Roman Catholic is anxious to satisfy such inquiries. I may, however, observe, that there is nothing absurd, but rather according to true doctrine in the belief that, although the whole blood must leave the body above to unite itself to the body on the altar, yet the whole blood still remains in the body above by the same law of concomitancy. If you will prove yourself so impartial as to insert the above, I may, perhaps, continue my observations in a following number.

And am, Sir,
Yours, faithfully,
CATHOLICUS.

It is for Roman Catholics, not for us, to say whether the above answer will satisfy them. It does not satisfy us.

At the same time, we beg to say that we do not "ridicule" the doctrine of "concomitancy," neither do we "profanely ask" the questions which our correspondent attributes to Protestants. We do not "ridicule" any doctrine of the Roman Catholic faith, nor do we assume that any doctrine must be false, because our reason does not comprehend how it can be true. But we do bring all doctrines to the test of Divine revelation, and ask whether God has revealed them; if he have, we accept them with faith.

The doctrine of "concomitancy" is thus stated by the Council of Trent:—"Sed corpus quidem sub specie panis, et sanguinem sub vini specie ex vi verborum, ipsum autem corpus sub specie vini, et sanguinem sub specie panis, animamque sub utraque, vi naturalis illius connectionis et concomitantiæ, qua partes Christi Domini, qui jam ex mortuis resurrexit non amplius moriturus, inter se copulantur, &c."

"The body of Christ, indeed (exists) under the appearance of bread, and the blood under the appearance of wine, from the power of the words, but the body itself (exists) under the appearance of wine, and the blood under the appearance of bread, and the soul under either, by the power of that natural connection and concomitancy, by which the parts of Christ the Lord, who has now risen from the dead to die no more, are connected among themselves, &c."—Sess. xii., c. 3.

However this doctrine may favour transubstantiation, and receiving in one kind only, it seems to us fatal to the mass, as a propitiatory sacrifice for sin; for according to this doctrine, the blood is not shed from the body, and cannot be, and yet the Scripture says—"Without shedding of blood there is no remission."—Hebrews ix., v. 22, Douay Bible. When Christ died on the cross, his blood was shed, and this was the sacrifice for the remission of sin. If his blood cannot be separated from his body in the Sacrifice of the Mass, and this doctrine of "concomitancy" affirms that it cannot; then, according to the Revelation of God, the Mass cannot be a sacrifice for "remission," for "without shedding of blood there is no remission."

READING THE SCRIPTURES.

WE also freely insert the following letter of Mr. Aylmer, which reached us a few days since. It will afford us an opportunity hereafter of explaining our own views more fully, when discussing those of our correspondent. He will not find that we contend for any such absurdities as that of making a child the arbiter of the most important truths; nor shall we contend, either, that there are no difficulties in the Holy Scriptures, or that they may not be misinterpreted. We know they must have been misinterpreted by Churches as well as children, or men could not so differ about them. To consider the subject as fully as its grave importance deserves, would much exceed the space at our command in our present number; but we hope to recur speedily to both the letter and the pamphlet of our respected correspondent; in the meantime, merely expressing our gratification at the frank and independent tone of his communication, as well as the spirit in which it is conceived. Collecting, as we do, from his pamphlet distinctly, that he "does not put the priest above the Scriptures," and from his letter, that he is "decidedly for Scriptural education," we venture to anticipate, that however distrustful he may be of his own judgment in interpreting the Bible, his views of the right and duty of exercising private judgment will not be found to differ very widely from our own; and we are glad to find that his view of the passage in St. John, on which he comments, agrees with our own, and with that of St. Chrysostom, and not with that of St. Cyril.

"Sir—My attention has just been directed to the leading article of the last number of your periodical, on the subject of the Church of Rome allowing or preventing the free use of the Holy Scriptures.

"I confess you have treated the matter fairly enough, in showing, that the Church, both in ancient and modern times, by no means generally prohibited the reading of the Holy Scriptures—quite the contrary; but I must dissent, in limine, to your interpretation of the 39th verse of the 5th chapter of St. John, which I do not at all conceive to be borne out, either by the original or your translation from St. Chrysostom.

"My view of the text you will best comprehend, by my referring you to page 15 of the accompanying pamphlet;* which, at the suggestion of some friends, was published last summer.†

"There is, however, one observation which escaped my notice at the time; and which is, that there is nothing in the original text of St. John to prove that the word corresponding to 'search' is to be taken in the imperative, or the indicative mood. If the latter, your commentary completely falls to the ground. I do not mean to contend for either, as I maintain my interpretation applies equally to both. We, Roman Catholics, translate it imperatively, because most of the Fathers (though not all—St. Cyril, for instance), do so; but Protestants, who disregard tradition, have nothing but the text to guide them; and hence, as Parkhurst observes, some divines of the Church of England have declared for the indicative acceptance of the word.

"The Scriptures, as a sole rule of faith, cannot be otherwise than dangerous; and their indiscriminate reading and circulation most pernicious. Open your Bible, take the three first pages that occur in either Testament, and tell me, without disguise, is there nothing in them too difficult for your comprehension? —"Thinkest thou that thou understandest what thou readest?"—Acts viii. 30. If you find all before you clear and easy, you may thank God for giving you a privilege which he has denied to so many thousands upon thousands of sincere believers! I am decidedly for Scriptural education, but administered in a proper and convenient form. The most wholesome food may disagree with a delicate stomach; and St. Jerome, who was so zealous an advocate for the reading of the Holy Scriptures, in his letter to Lacta respecting the education of her granddaughter, recommended her to put them into the hands of this young lady progressively, in proportion as she advanced in years, capacity, and virtue. The Jews themselves, although accustomed to, and familiar with the oriental tropes and figures of speech, yet used precaution with regard to the reading of Holy Writ. They did not allow the first chapters of Genesis, some of Ezekiel, and the song of Solomon, to be read, except by those who had attained the age of thirty years. Surely, in sober seriousness, you do not contend for making a child the arbiter of the most important truths! It is neither meet nor just, right nor available to salvation to do so. We know that 'out of the mouths of infants and of sucklings praise can be perfected,' without placing this great maintaining power within their reach. Children could cry in the temple 'Hosanna to the Son of David,' while those who were 'masters in Israel' were confounded and moved with indignation.—St. Matthew xxi. 15, 16. No doubt, the revealed truths themselves are to be made known as much as possible to all mankind; but it does not follow from hence that all mankind are to read, search, and be everlastingly digging (as you express it) at the Scriptures. Lord Clarendon, the great historian, Mr. Grey, Doctor Hey, &c., all agree, that the misapplication of Scripture was the cause of the destruction of Church and State, and of the murder of the king. So likewise, the same cause exposed the nation to great calamities in the Protestant riots of 1780. The same might be affirmed with regard to Johanna Southcote, who declared herself to be the woman of Genesis, destined to crush the serpent's head; and the woman mentioned in Revelations, 'clothed with the sun, and crowned with twelve stars!'

"This communication has far exceeded the limits I intended. I have occupied too much of your time; I shall cease to do so; but let me impress upon you, it is exclusively to guard against such fatal abuse, that the Roman Catholic Church prevents an indiscriminate, an independent, and puerile use of the Sacred Volume.

"I am, sir,

"Your obedient, very humble servant,

"M. V. Aylmer."

* Speech of M. V Aylmer, Esq., at the Rotundo Religious Discussion Class. 16th June, 1851.

† In this pamphlet, p. 15, the writer argues that the whole discourse in 5th chap of John has reference, exclusively, to the Jews, to whom it was addressed by our Saviour, on one of the festival days, and relates of course to the Scriptures of the Old Testament which were then alone extant. The Jews were in the habit of reading their Testament; and were referred to it, by our Lord for the testimony or proof of his Divine mission. We regret that we have not space in our present number to transcribe the whole of this argument. We cannot, however, omit noticing one passage in it, of which we cordially approve:—"Let us take care in what spirit and with what dispositions we read and search the Scriptures."

ODE FOR ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

This was a day for gladsome glee—
A day to every patriot dear,
But now, unused to sounds of joy,
'Tis hallowed by a silent tear.
That God would bless, be still our prayer;
We ask, at least, that Heaven will spare.

Oh! honoured be our Ocean Isle,
Of saintly deeds and faith the scene;
That thousand years have not bedimm'd
In memory's light still fresh and green;
But doubly dear for all the woe
Poured on her withered soil below.

And yet, though quenched her joys in night,
Though sunk her manliest sons in grief,
Celestial comforts pure and bright,
And guardian spirits with relief,
Can break o'er this drear, wintry state,
To cheer the dark, the desolate.

And, oh! if such communion be
The solace of our wretchedness—
If grovelling minds be raised above,
And hearts be waked from hopelessness,
Then, who will God's high hand deny,
Or say our doom is misery?

Peace be with thee, afflicted Isle!
Though dark the clouds that o'er thee lower.
May Heaven still lend its pillared ray,
To guide thee in thy drooping hour;
Thy people cheer with trust sublime,
And raise thee in his own good time!

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR MARCH.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

Much of the weather during last month has been totally against sowing spring wheat, beans, and peas; the early part of this month should, therefore, be almost exclusively devoted to getting in the intended breadths of the above crops, as in a short time it will be getting too late for doing so, when it will be necessary to substitute some other crops, which will be attended with much inconvenience; every exertion will, therefore, be necessary, while the present fine weather lasts, to commit those crops to the ground. At the same time, in cold, backward soils and aspects, it may be safer to substitute oats for the wheat, particularly if the land be not in high condition, and well drained; and, instead of beans, potatoes may be planted, and parsnips, carrots, mangels, and other green crops, sown. If the soil be light and dry, peas may still be sown with safety.

Autumn-sown Wheat.—As soon as the land is dry enough, and that this crop has been sown in drills, it will be necessary to hand or horse-hoe between the rows, to break the winter's crust, destroy weeds, and mould the young plants. If it be intended to lay down the autumn wheats with clover and grass seeds, whether the wheat may be sown in drills or broadcast, the most suitable implement will be the harrow, which should be followed by the roller; the grass and clover seed sown lightly, but well bush-harrowed, and finished with the roller.

Oats.—In rich, well-prepared, and early soils, oats should be sown early in the month; but in cold, wet, and backward soils, it will be safer to sow by the end of this or early next month. Lea land is very frequently sown under the harrows; and, if clean, the soil deep, dry, and in good heart, and ploughed early, with a good crest or arrass, sufficient to cover the seed, is a very expeditious mode, and produces well; but if the land be foul, light, or inclined to damp, the best crops will be obtained by ploughing into narrow sets; give a stroke of the harrows up and down, sow the seed, harrow finely, and cover from the furrows, cutting them with the furrow-plough, to raise sufficient mould. The most yielding crops are produced from lea by this mode; and the land turns out more cleanly for the succeeding crops, the sods more decomposed, and the land more friable.

Barley may be sown by the end of the month. The most suitable soils for this crop are those of a gravelly or sandy nature, dry and rich. Soils of the above descriptions, having grown a well-manured green crop, are, therefore, best adapted for barley; and soils wanting the above qualities will be more profitably sown with oats, which is by far the hardiest grain we have, and not so easily damaged by bad weather at harvest time. The pickle recommended for wheat is also applicable to oats and barley, and highly useful in preventing smut in those crops.

Spring Vetches.—Sow another breadth of this valuable crop for summer soiling. Sow in the proportion of three bushels of vetches, and four to five stones of oats to the Irish acre. When well up, sow another breadth, in order to keep up a continuous succession of succulent forage. About four pounds of rape, sown along with the vetches and oats, will help to keep the former off the ground, and add considerably to the bulk of the crop.

Carrots love a deep, sandy loam, which, when well manured with well-decomposed compost, intimately mixed with it, produces this crop in the highest state of perfection. On this account, the best practice is to manure the land heavily in the autumn, and plough it in with a deep, rough furrow; it is then harrowed down as soon as thoroughly dry in the spring, cross-ploughed, well harrowed, rolled, and, if necessary, well grubbed and rolled, so as to reduce it to the finest possible tilth preparatory to forming the drills, which are then rolled, to flat their tops and consolidate them, and immediately sown. If the land has not been manured in the autumn, it may be manured at the time of sowing; but in this case the manure must be short and well decomposed, and put in the drills as is usual for turnips. Carrots may be sown from the middle of the month up till the middle of April; but the earlier the better.

Parsnips like a deep, sappy, heavy soil, not wet; and to produce a heavy crop, it should be rich and well manured with rich compost. The cultivation of the soil is the same as for carrots, and the seed may be sown at the same time; but carrots will produce better, if sown a little later than parsnips.

Cabbages.—Prepare a clean, rich, and well-manured piece of land, and pulverize it well, to sow some cabbage seeds; lay it off in three and a half or four feet beds, with eighteen-inch alleys; level the beds neatly with the back of the spade; sow the seed thinly and evenly, and cover with about an inch of fine earth from the furrows; rake the surface nicely, and when dry enough beat it well with the back of the spade, which will prevent it cracking or fissuring. The large York, Nonpareil York, and Drumhead are the best sorts to sow now, for field culture, and will produce fine plants for planting out in May and June.

Potatoes.—The experience of the last few years sufficiently proves that early planting, and cultivating only those sorts of early maturity, is the best and only security against the disease. No time should, therefore, be lost in getting in the necessary breadths. Potatoes should be planted before they begin to push forth shoots from the eye to such a degree as to cause any injury to them; when the bud is injured a secondary one has to be formed, and the strength of the tuber much weakened in supplying it with the necessary nourishment, till it is enabled to seek it by sending out its own feeders into the surrounding soil. When the land is dry and previously well prepared, which it should be by the necessary deep ploughings, harrowings, cross-ploughings, and rollings, drilling in the potatoes will be the most economical, as regards time, expense, and manure, and the produce good; but in case the land be not thoroughly dry, or that the potatoes are wanted very early, it will be much the best mode to plant the potatoes in lazy-beds, though the manure will be required in greater abundance than by planting in drills. The ease and dispatch with which the potato crop can be got in by drilling, when the land has been properly prepared, has made this mode a general favourite with all cultivators; but the benefits derivable from planting potatoes in ridges, or lazy-beds, by the deep periodical digging of the furrows, thus bringing up fresh soil from a depth below the action of the ordinary plough, and exposing fresh surfaces to the disintegrating and vivifying influence of the atmosphere, have been too frequently overlooked.

Flax.—Land intended for flax demands particular attention now. The land should have been deeply ploughed last autumn, and should, as soon as sufficiently dry, be well harrowed, rolled, grubbed, and well cleaned of all root-weeds, such as scutch, crowfoot, &c. The best soil for flax is a deep, strong loam; and rich stubble land, after wheat, oats, or barley, produces the best sample, particularly if the grain crops have succeeded lea; the seed may be sown by the end of the month, and well harrowed with a short-toned harrow, first one way, and then across, or diagonally, so as to distribute the seeds equally; finish with the roller. The proportion of seed generally sown to the Irish acre is three and a half to four bushels; but it is much safer to sow too thick than too thin. Good crops are taken after potatoes, mangels, carrots, and parsnips; but of late there is a decided opinion setting in in the north of Ireland against growing flax after turnips.

Poultry.—Select and set the eggs of the various fowl intended to increase; put no more than thirteen under the common hen. As soon as the geese eggs set last month are hatched, let the young ones have soft meat and plenty of green feeding, but do not let them have too much access to water. The same rule applies to young ducks, for which the hen is a better nurse than the duck. Collect the turkey eggs as they are produced, and put them by carefully for setting.

ANCIENT IRISH SAINTS AND MODERN ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOPS ON THE FREE USE OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

Our readers will remember that, in a former number, we gave extracts from the writings of some of the early popes and bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, showing the great importance which they attached to the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, both among the clergy and their flocks, and how urgently they exhorted the laity to read and study them. We now proceed to give some information regarding the opinions and practice of the ancient Church of Ireland on this important subject; and we shall then bring forward one or two declarations of the modern Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland, respecting the study of the Word of God, for the purpose of ascertaining how far they agree, how far they differ, from the sentiments of the ancient bishops of the Irish Church.

We have good reason for affirming that, so early as the fourth and fifth centuries, the study of the Holy Scriptures was generally diffused throughout the British Isles. It may be sufficient at present to quote the well-known testimony of St. Chrysostom—"Although," saith he, "thou didst go unto the ocean and those British Isles, although thou didst sail to the Euxine Sea, although thou didst go unto the southern quarters, thou shouldst hear ALL men, everywhere, discoursing matters out of the SCRIPTURE, with another voice, indeed, but not another faith, and with a different tongue, but with an according judgment."* It is, doubtless, a subject of deep regret to every person who takes an interest in the ancient history of our Irish Church, that we do not possess as much information as we could desire, respecting its state and condition during the period which immediately succeeded the first introduction of Christianity. Time, which makes such melancholy ravages in all things earthly, has laid his destructive hand with especial weight upon the literary records of our own and other countries, during those early ages. We can infer, however, even from the documents which have come down to us, and which are doubly valuable from their scarcity, that the ancient Catholic Church of Ireland was adorned by many excellent and pious men, whose learning was conspicuous amidst the darkness by which they were surrounded. Our country, as has been often remarked, bore a very high character for learning in ancient times. Strangers crowded from other lands to be educated in Ireland, looking upon it as one of the principal nurseries of religion and learning in Europe.

But the study which they prized most highly, and cultivated most carefully, was that of the Word of God; and proofs of this fact are continually afforded to us, in the lives and histories of almost all the eminent saints and pious men who adorned our ancient Church.

To begin with St. Patrick himself, to whose missionary zeal we owe the foundation of our Church. An examination of his writings will show how well acquainted he was with the text of Holy Scripture, and how fond he was of quoting it. His mind seems to have been filled with the knowledge of the Word of God, insomuch that, when he began to instruct others, the texts and language of the Bible poured forth from his lips in a copious and abundant stream.

No one can read any of the writings of St. Patrick without perceiving that he felt he had found a sacred treasure in the Holy Volume,* and that he took the Word of God for the rule of his life and conduct; that he not only studied it carefully himself, and impressed its precepts deeply on his memory, but was also anxious that others, whether men or women, should follow his example; that they to whom he preached should become familiar with the Holy Scriptures, and be able to use them profitably for their own guidance and instruction in life.

Our next authority shall be St. Columbanus (of whom we gave a brief and hasty sketch in our first number). We are told of this eminent man, that in his early youth, he placed himself under the care of a "venerable person, of high reputation among his countrymen for piety and learning, who carefully instructed him in the whole of the Divine Scriptures."† And the reverence with which St. Columbanus, in after years, mentions the Holy Scriptures, as the great foundation of his faith and practice, is evident from many passages of his writings, as, for instance, in the following one from his sermon on the Mortification of Sin—"Excepting these statements," saith he, "which either the Law, or the Prophets, or the Gospel, or the Apostles, have made to us, solemn silence ought to be observed, as far as other authorities are concerned, with respect to the Trinity. For it is God's testimony alone that is to be credited concerning God—that is, concerning himself. And this testimony concerning himself he has given, either in the Law, or in a Prophet, or in the Gospel, or in an Apostle, or, in special cases, to individuals, either by himself or by an angel."* It is very clear that the writer of this passage looked to Scripture, and to Scripture alone, for the rule of his faith, and that he deemed it needless, as well as irreverent, to refer to any other authority. And not only did St. Columbanus thus value the Word of God himself, but he earnestly recommended it to all Christians, that they should esteem the Scriptures as their chief riches, as we learn from the following verse of his writings—in which he repeats, under another form, the sentiments of the Royal Psalmist—"The law of thy mouth is good to me, above thousands of gold and silver."—Ps. cxviii. 72, Douay version.

It is equally certain that the Scriptures were carefully studied by the most eminent Irish saints, who came after those just noticed. We are told that the disciples of St. Columba, another most eminent Irish saint, used to support their opinions "by referring to the testimony of Holy Scripture."—Adamnam's Vit. St. Columb., p. 143, quoted in King's Ch. His., i. 320. It is recorded of St. Aidan (who died A.D. 651), by the venerable Bede, that "he endeavoured not to omit any of those duties that he had learned in the writings of the Evangelists, or Apostles, or Prophets, but to fulfil them all to the best of his ability;" and it is added, that "all who went with him, whether those who had undergone the tonsure (i.e., the clergy), or the laity, were bound to employ themselves in reading the Scriptures, or learning the Psalms."—Bed. iii. 5, quoted in King's Ir. Ch. His., i. pp. 205. 320. Dr. Lanigan, the Roman Catholic Church historian of Ireland, informs us that "St. Petrocus, a native of Britain, spent twenty years in Ireland, applying himself to the study of the Scriptures, and to the acquirement of general knowledge."—Vol. i., p. 492. Of St. Finnian, of Clonard, in Meath, he tells us that "he was distinguished for his extraordinary learning and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures."—Vol. ii., p. 21. He mentions, likewise, a curious anecdote in the life of St. Senanus (who died, according to Archbishop Ussher, A.D. 544), while the saint was at Inniscarra (a place five miles west of Cork, where he built a church), "a vessel arrived in Cork harbour, bringing fifty religious persons—passengers from the Continent, whom the love of a stricter mode of life, or a desire to improve themselves in the study of the Scriptures, had attracted to Ireland;" and Colgan, the old author from whom Dr. Lanigan quotes this story, adds the remarkable words, that "the study of the Scriptures, at that time, greatly flourished in Ireland."‡

Perhaps, however, it may be replied, that the study of the Word of God, spoken of in these extracts, was confined to the monks and clergy, who may be supposed to have been familiar with the Latin Vulgate; but that it would be an erroneous inference to conclude that the knowledge of the Scriptures was diffused among all classes, young and old, in their own mother tongue. If this objection could be sustained, the argument which we have endeavoured to derive from the practice of our countrymen in ancient times would, doubtless, lose much of its weight. But we are enabled to prove, by the testimony of the venerable Bede, that the objection is altogether groundless. "The Island of Britain," saith he, "in the language of five nations, doth teach and confess one and the same knowledge of the highest truth, and of the true sublimity—to wit, of the English, the Britons, the Scots (i.e., the Irish, who were anciently always called Scots,) the Picts, and the Latins."* In this passage there is a plain acknowledgment, that such as understood not the Latin might yet, in their own mother tongue, search those "Holy Scriptures, which were able to make them wise unto salvation." Bede, indeed, speaks only of Britain; but it is obvious, from the mention of the Scots, as well as from the constant intercourse which existed between the two countries in his time, that his remarks apply equally to Ireland. Nor was the study of the Word of God confined to persons of mature years; the young were diligently trained, even from their childhood, to read and learn the oracles of God. It was thus, as we have seen, that St. Columbanus was instructed, insomuch that, "while yet a very young man, he wrote an exposition of the Psalms, in elegant language, so thoroughly were the treasures of the Divine Scriptures kept stored in his bosom."† And hence we can readily understand, that our Irish ancestors may have well deserved the character given of them by Aldhelm, the old abbot of Malmesbury, in a letter written about A.D. 690, that they were "ingenious book leaders, and ready-witted arguers out of the Scriptures:" and that so late as the eleventh century, they were described by John, the son of Bishop Sulgen, as "a nation famous for the word of God."‡

These examples might be easily extended to a considerable length, by the aid of the authorities from whom we have borrowed; we think, however, that we have done enough to satisfy our readers, that, in ancient times, the Word of God was prized and valued throughout the length and breadth of Ireland. There is, indeed, no circumstance in our ancient history upon which a true Irishman can dwell with more interest and pleasure, than the singular reputation for letters and advancement in Christian knowledge, by which Ireland was in those days distinguished. Not only did the light of religion and learning then shine so brightly in our land, as to attract to our shores many strangers from distant countries, but its influence even penetrated to the most remote parts of Europe. The labours of the Irish clergy were not confined to their own country; their missionaries crossed the seas to Scotland, to Britain, and to the Continent. They converted heathens; they established schools of learning; they diffused a love of letters among the Saxons and Normans. Burgundy, Germany, and other countries received their instructions; and Europe, with gratitude, confessed the superior knowledge, the piety, the zeal of the "Island of Saints."

But these happy days passed by, and darker times, alas! succeeded. Our Church surrendered the independence which she had long retained; and the authority of the Pope was formally acknowledged by the bishops and clergy of Ireland, in the Synod of Cashel, A.D. 1172. Thenceforward we hear but little of the spread of learning, or the diffusion of religious knowledge. A dark and dreary interval succeeds; until at length, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, Europe was startled from its slumbers by the progress of the Reformation. The Church of Rome took the alarm. She seems to have thought (whether rightly or wrongly, it is not now our purpose to inquire) that the reading of the Bible, in the vulgar tongue, had a tendency to draw men's minds away from herself, and towards the Reformed Churches: and accordingly we find that, from that time forward, various hindrances and obstacles to the free circulation of the Scriptures were interposed by her authority, or with her consent. Among numberless proofs of the fact, we need only refer to the history of the famous Bull, "Unigenitus." Father Quesnel published a book, in which, amongst other propositions, he ventured to assert that, "the reading of the Sacred Scripture is for all," and that, "to interdict from Christians the reading of the Sacred Scripture, particularly of the Gospel, is to interdict the use of light from the sons of light." Any unprejudiced Christian would be apt to imagine that these were sound and wholesome opinions: but Clement XI., who was then Pope, thought otherwise. He seems to have been afraid that, if the Scriptures were generally used, Christianity would be overthrown: and, to prevent such a misfortune, he published a Bull, dated September 8, 1713, in which he declared these propositions, as well as others, to be "false, captious, ill-sounding, scandalous, pernicious, injurious to the Church, seditious, impious, blasphemous, heretical," &c., and consequently "forbids any of the faithful to teach or maintain, or even to mention them, either in public or private, with any other view than to confute them," &c., which, if anybody dares to attempt, he is assured, he will draw upon himself the "indignation of God Almighty, and the Blessed Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul."

Now, we must remember that this Bull is no ordinary document. It is at this present moment actually in force, in the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland: for when the late Archbishop Murray was asked by the Committee of the House of Commons, in 1825 (vide Report, p. 647), "Is the Bull Unigenitus received in Ireland?" his reply was, "It is." Hence it follows that, by the authority of this Bull, the Church of Rome clearly and positively condemns the free and unrestricted reading of the Holy Scriptures. And accordingly we find that Dr. Troy, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, did not hesitate to avow that such was the doctrine of his Church. In a letter which he wrote, dated 23rd July, 1818, and which is published in the Report of the Irish Education Commissioners (p. 46), he thus expresses his views—"Allow me, very reverend sir, on this occasion, to observe, that the Catholic Church in all ages has prohibited the indiscriminate use of the Scriptures, in the vulgar tongues, without note or comment; also the interpretation of them by every one's private judgment. This interpretation has been the fatal and prolific hive, from which swarms of sectaries daily issue; each one finding his religion in the Bible, which has disfigured and distracted the Christian Church since the days of Luther. Wherefore, the Catholic Church condemns the indiscriminate use of the Scriptures in vulgar tongues, without note or comment, and permits it only to the learned, or to the lettered of the laity."

What Dr. Troy here means by the "indiscriminate" use, he does not define, any more than the degree of learning or letters which qualifies a layman for permission from the Church of Rome to read the Holy Scriptures. The majority of mankind unfortunately require but a trifling obstacle to deter them from studying the Sacred Volume, and incentives are more needful than restrictions with reference to it. At any rate, where God has placed no restrictions, we think man has no right to impose limits or hindrances. The Scriptures were obviously written that they might be read, and if the Gospel was preached to the poor, and the poor have souls to be saved, we think it self-evident that the Gospel should be as much open to them, if able to read it, as to the most learned layman in the community.

It is possible that the strong terms used in Dr. Troy's letter, prohibiting and condemning the free use of the Scriptures, may have excited dissatisfaction in the public mind at that time, when Roman Catholics were seeking for political emancipation, and their bishops were anxious to gain a character for liberal and enlightened views. In a document published some few years after, and which was signed by all the Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland, we consequently find somewhat milder language employed. The second clause of the declaration to which we allude, and which was dated Jan. 5, 1826, runs as follows—"The Catholics of Ireland, of mature years, are permitted to read authentic and approved translations of the Holy Scriptures, with explanatory notes; and are exhorted to use them in the spirit of piety, humility, and obedience." As this declaration has never been revoked or modified by the same authority by which it was issued, we suppose it may be fairly taken to point out the amount of liberty which the rulers of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland are willing to allow to the laity, as regards the reading of the Word of God.

With respect to the use of explanatory notes, alluded to in the passage just quoted, it is, of course, not our intention to disparage them in general, or to deter any class of our countrymen from carefully studying learned and pious commentaries on the Word of God, as well as the Divine original. Every man is bound, we think, to avail himself of every means within his reach, whether by written or oral instruction, to arrive at the real meaning of the Sacred Volume. For this the clergy were instituted, to assist and guide the laity by their superior learning and piety. The priest, however, is not to be placed above the Bible; and where he affects to teach anything for which he is unable to show clear Scripture warrant, the laity have a right to question him closely as to the grounds of his teaching; and to require, not the mere assertion of any man or body of men, but clear and satisfactory evidence, "confirmation strong as proof of Holy Writ;" and if they value their own safety, it is but common sense and common prudence for them to do so.

We have now set before our readers the opinions of our ancient saints, and of the modern Roman Catholic bishops, on the use and circulation of the Scriptures; and they can judge for themselves which class of sentiments appear to be most reasonable, and most in accordance with God's revealed will. St. Patrick and St. Columbanus considered the Scriptures to be a sacred treasure, of which all should be invited freely to partake. Their only anxiety seemed to be, that the people should come to the fountain of the water of life, and drink, without stint or hindrance, of its refreshing streams. The Church of Rome, on the other hand, seems, by her language, to look on Scripture with a jealous and unfriendly eye. She speaks of permissions, and prohibitions, and condemnations: the learned or the lettered of the laity may be suffered to draw near, and gaze upon the oracles of God, but the unlearned or the poor are sternly repelled, and we fear, in actual practice, too often denounced as disobedient and heretical, whatever may be their natural powers of mind, or anxiety to improve themselves in religious truth. St. Paul commended Timothy that "from a child he had known the Holy Scriptures:" but it seems the Roman Catholics of Ireland are forbidden, by the united voice of the bishops of their Church, to read the Word of God, until they arrive at "mature years." In the education of youth, at least, the Holy Scriptures are to be a prohibited book, with some honourable exceptions, such as that mentioned in a former number of our journal, to the honour of Dr. Browne, Roman Catholic Bishop of Kilmore. Ireland, as we have seen, was looked upon in ancient times as "a nation famous for the Word of God;" but if the Bull "Unigenitus" is to be enforced among us—if every person who maintains that "the reading of the Sacred Scripture is for all" is to be forthwith denounced as "impious, blasphemous, and heretical," and "deserving of the indignation of God Almighty, and of the blessed Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul," it needs but little wisdom to foresee that, in this point at least, our land will never again be deserving of its ancient renown.

Our limits warn us that we must conclude: and it is a relief to turn from the angry denunciations we have just quoted, to the sweet and touching words which that holy and ancient Father, St. Augustine, addressed to the Christians of his day—"We are brethren: why do we strive? Our Father died not intestate; he made a testament, and so died. Men do strive about the goods of the dead, till the testament be brought forth; when that is brought, they yield to have it opened and read: the judge doth hearken, the counsellors be silent, the crier biddeth peace, and all the people are attentive, that the words of the dead may be read and heard. He lieth, void of life and feeling, in his grave, and his words prevail. Christ doth sit in heaven; and is his testament gainsayed? Open it; let us read, we are brethren; why do we strive? Let our minds be pacified; our Father hath not left us without a testament; he that made the testament is living for ever. He doth hear our words, he doth know His own words; let us read: why do we strive?"*

Unity of Spirit in the Bond of Peace.—The devil being an apostate spirit, revolted and separated from God, doth naturally project and work division. This was his first exploit, and it is still his grand design in the world. And as the devil's work is division, Christ's work is union. He came to dissolve the works of the devil by a contrary work.—1 John iii. 8. He came to make all friends; to re-collect and unite all men to God, and man to man. This was his great project; this he died and suffered for, and this he prayed for.—John xvii. The love of our brethren is not another from the love of God; it is but the streaming forth of it, or the reflection of it. God allows, nay, commands and causes that it stream forth, remaining still in him, as in its source and centre; beginning at him and returning to him, as the beams that diffuse themselves from the sun, and the light and heat yet are not divided or cut off from it, but remain in it, while by emanation they issue from it. The love of God makes us one with God, and dwelling in the heart, enlarges and dilates it, as self-love contracts and straitens it. The bitter root of all enmity in man against God, and amongst men, against one another, is self—man's heart turned from God towards himself. Whence is it that wars, and contests, and mutual disgracings and despisings do so much abound, but that men love themselves, and nothing but themselves, or in relation to themselves, as it pleases, or is advantageous to them? That is the standard and rule. All is carried by interest: thence strifes, and defamings, and bitterness against one another. Nothing short of the Spirit of Christ can undo this selfishness. But let that spirit once dwell in thy heart, and to forgive a wrong, to love even an enemy, will be not only possible, but delightful. The spirit of Christ, which is all sweetness and love, so calms and composes the heart, and fills the soul with lovingness, that it can breathe nothing else. It hates nothing but sin; it pities the sinner, and carries towards the worst that love of good will, desiring their return and salvation. But as for those in whom appears the image of their Father, their heart cleaves to them as brethren indeed. No natural advantages of birth, beauty, or wit, draw a Christian's love so much as the resemblance of Christ; wherever that is found, it is comely and lovely to the soul that loves him.—Archbishop Leighton.

PURGATORY.

We think we may confidently appeal to those readers who have candidly perused the articles on this subject in our former numbers, to testify that we have kept our promise of discussing this momentous subject with a serious regard for the feelings and opinions of others who have been educated in an undoubting belief of the doctrine of the Church of Rome upon it. One class alone can possibly have taken offence at what we have said, even though dissenting from the views we have suggested. We mean the clergy, who not only derive a lucrative traffic from the popular belief, but must needs enjoy thereby a greater authority over that numerous class of persons who are conscious that they do not live so innocently as to be out of danger of purgatorial punishment, and who would, therefore, willingly resort to any means held out to them by their clergy to escape from it. Masses for the dead and indulgences have, no doubt, been of immense importance to the treasury of the Church, whether the laity have derived an equivalent benefit from them or not. That any class of men should take umbrage at a discussion which directly concerns their pecuniary gains, is natural enough; and we are not surprised that priests should endeavour to deter the laity from considering or discussing such a subject, if they give them credit for as much intelligence as we do, and do not feel very sure of successfully maintaining the truth of their doctrines on the calm and full discussion, to which we invited and challenged them in our first number. We write, however, for laymen who desire to read and think, and arrive at truth for themselves; and we firmly believe that every attempt to reduce them to slavish credulity previous to examination, will recoil upon those who are weak enough to resort to it.

We shall now proceed to show that the doctrine of purgatory is neither a truth founded on Scripture or reason, nor even on tradition or the unanimous testimony of the Fathers of the Church. As we commenced with that branch of our subject in our last number we shall take the Fathers first. We have already produced what we think to be a strong argument, that St. Patrick himself was not aware of it, and did not believe in its existence. That such a treatise as that on the Three Habitations should have been for so many centuries attributed to St. Patrick, whether rightly or not, proves, at least, that the views suggested in it could not have been considered heretical or unsound by the early Church of Ireland. We are the less surprised that the early Church were ignorant of this doctrine from finding that St. Leo the Great, who was himself Pope in St. Patrick's time, and whose voluminous writings have been published in two large quarto volumes, appears to have known nothing of the modern doctrine that there was any mode of expurgating, after death, what during life had been left unsatisfied, either in the way of guilt or punishment; for in his Epistle to Theodore, Bishop of Friuli, dated 10th June, 452, speaking of the penitents who had not performed all their acts of penance (or repentance), and thereby received the remission of their sins through that indulgence of God (indulgentia Dei), which cannot (he says) be obtained without the prayers of the priests, he goes on thus (chap. 3)—"But if any one of them for whom we pray unto the Lord, being intercepted by any obstacle, shall fall from the gift of the present indulgence (before spoken of), and, before he arrives at the appointed remedies, ends his temporal life, that which remaining in the body he hath not received, when he is divested of his body, he cannot obtain."* What is this but to say, that though the Lord had delivered to the Church the power of giving ecclesiastical absolution to persons who were penitent, and desirous of being cleansed from their sins (salubri satisfactione purgatos), that power was confined to the present life, and could not be, after death, granted even to the supplication of the priests?

Surely it is not possible to believe that St. Leo would have thus written, if he had known that there was a place where penitents and believers, who had not performed all their penances in this life, could be purged or cleansed, either by their own sufferings, or by the supplications of the clergy or of their surviving friends? St. Leo obviously knew nothing of any such doctrine as that of satisfying in purgatory what had not been paid or completed in this life; and, therefore, we conclude, that no such doctrine as purgatory was handed down by tradition from the time of the Apostles, as otherwise so great a man as St. Leo the Great could not have passed it over without distinctly noticing it. Should we have overlooked any passage in St. Leo's works which may tend to throw light upon the subject, we shall feel obliged to any among the learned who will be good enough to furnish us with a reference to it.

St. Leo and St. Patrick, however, do not by any means stand alone in the views we have expressed; for it is remarkable that several of the ancient Fathers utterly deny that the soul is capable of being purged in another world. St. Gregory Nazianzen, who died A.D. 389, was the most profound scholar of his age, and won from all his contemporaries the prize of eloquence, excelling them (to use the language of Dupin, himself a learned Roman Catholic divine) "in the purity of his words, the nobleness of his expressions, the ornaments of his discourse, the variety of his figures, the justness of his comparisons, the beauty of his reasonings, and the sublimity of his thoughts." This eminent Father of the Church was successively Bishop of Sasimi, Nazianzus, and Constantinople; and living still nearer to the times of the Apostles, could not have been ignorant of such a doctrine as that of purgatory, had any such thing been known in the Church. Most, if not all, of his works are extant (and have undergone a variety of editions), consisting of about fifty orations or sermons, besides letters and poems; and yet, so far from any reference to such a doctrine being found in his works, he, in fact, as directly and formally denies that there is any purgatory in the next life, as any writer could do in an age when the doctrine subsequently introduced was really unknown. After speaking of the scourges by which God purifies man in this life, he adds, in his xvi. Orat.—"It is better to be chastised and purged now (in life) than to be delivered to that torture (after death), since then shall be the time of punishment, NOT OF EXPURGATION,'* expressly contrasting the time of purgation in this life with the time, not of purgation, but of punishment, in the next. How could St. Gregory have thus written, if he knew the doctrine of the Church was, that the departed souls, even of the redeemed, must be purified in purgatory before reaching heaven?

St. Chrysostom, who died A.D. 407, was of the same opinion, for he says, in his Homily de Pœnitentia—"If the soul be purged here that fire shall not hurt it when it departs hence; but the soul that goes hence in sin, that fire shall receive"—meaning not the fire of purgatory, which he never names, but that of hell (Gehennæ), which he had named immediately before.†

To these we might add, but for fear of becoming tedious, St. Cyril of Alexandria, tom. iv., book 12, p. 1069: Paris, 1638. St. Cyprian De Mortalitate, sec. ii., p. 157: Oxford, 1682. St. Hilary on the 120th Psalm, p. 978: Paris, 1652; and several others.

Such was the doctrine of those early ages, when, if tradition from the Apostles ever taught Divine truths distinct from those contained in the Holy Scriptures, they could not have been unknown to the Pope and eminent Fathers we have referred to. Their doctrine was simply that which the Scriptures still teach—viz., the soul that is clear of sin by God's pardon and forgiveness, through the merits of Christ's atoning sacrifice, no fire can hurt; the soul that is not so forgiven, no fire can cleanse. Christ, in fact, does not do his work of atonement by halves—remitting the guilt, and yet leaving the punishment! Where the guilt is removed, the punishment is so likewise, temporal, as well as eternal. Tertullian, Chrysostom, Augustine, all say this; and even St. Bernard, in speaking of the completeness of the Divine pardon, says—"Some there are who forgive injury, so as not to revenge it, but still they upbraid; others there are who are silent, though somewhat remains deeply rooted in their minds, and they retain inward rancour. In neither case is there a full pardon. Far from these is the benignant nature of the Godhead—HE ACTS WITH LIBERALITY—HE FORGIVES ENTIRELY."‡

In corroboration of these views we would observe, that we can find no mention of purgation after death in any of the ancient creeds or councils, or catechetical discourses, in which the other articles of faith are set down and explained. The fifth general council which, A.D. 553, condemned Origen for his errors concerning those pains after death which he conceived restored even the damned, never mentioned any other purgatory in opposition to that which he had heretically invented, nor did any of the Fathers who disputed with Origen, mention any of the purgatory pains which the orthodox faith taught, to distinguish them from those which he erroneously had invented, as they surely could not have failed to do, if such had been then firmly believed by the Church. The fact is, that at a later period Pope Gregory—who died A.D. 604—though he gave considerable countenance to this doctrine, spoke of it with some doubt, not as a point even then firmly resolved by the Church, though no doubt it had, within the preceding two centuries, gained some little credit among the clergy of the west, especially among the monastic orders; and was soon after, under the sanction of Pope Gregory, eagerly seized on by the Benedictine monks, and found so profitable in its operation on the people, that it soon became one of the most favoured (perhaps the most necessary) tenets of the Roman communion. We may probably, in some future number, give some specimens, from Pope Gregory's dialogues, of the mode in which he tries to establish this new doctrine—which, in fact, treats it as a discovery lately made, respecting the condition of souls after death; for which he gives a reason (somewhat singular to us, who are perusing it nearly 1300 years afterwards), that as this world was approaching to its end, men then saw more closely into the secrets of the next.*

If our readers have followed us thus far, they will scarcely be surprised to find that the Church of Rome has always felt considerable difficulty in reasoning upon this subject, and that even the Council of Trent itself, in 1563, nearly 1000 years after the death of Pope Gregory, did not venture to pronounce any definition of purgatory, much less to call it a purgatory fire, but leaves it to the prelates and priests to tell what it is, and in what extent to be believed; which appears to us, and we think it will appear to all rational men, to be rather a convenient way of evading than of satisfactorily clearing up and explaining an important doctrine, and one which, if true, it was clearly desirable to have the decision of an infallible tribunal upon, if such tribunal ever existed on earth; and we presume if it ever did exist on earth all Roman Catholics will assert that its powers must have been in full exercise at this celebrated council.

We hope to show, in our next number, that though the practice of prayers for the souls of the faithful dead, is a more ancient practice than the belief in purgatory, it is not necessarily connected with it, and properly considered affords no sufficient ground to support the doctrine held by the Church of Rome on this subject.

TALK OF THE ROAD—No. III.

WE have not lost sight of Pat and Jem yet, and perhaps our readers may like to know what we have heard. Well, a few days ago, they were setting potatoes for a farmer, working one at each side of the same ridge; and their dinner was brought to them in a tin can and a wooden plate, tied up in a cloth, and they sat down under a thorn bush to eat it; and, when they had done, Pat pulled a book out of his pocket, and Jem leaned over his shoulder, reading with him, till the bell would ring for work. And while they were reading Father John rode down the lane, and though they did not see him, for their backs were towards him, he saw they were over a book.

Now, Father John was getting mighty uneasy in his mind when he saw people reading; so he gave his horse to a boy in the lane, and he walked up quiet, till he got just at their backs, and "What book is that you're reading, boys?" says he.

"Please your reverence," said Pat, holding up the book, "it's 'The Glories of Mary,'" and very glad Pat was that time that it wasn't his Douay Bible he had in his hand.

"Oh, that's all right," said Father John, "that's a good book; where did you get it?"

"Please your reverence," said Pat, "I bought it from Judy Brannigan, down at John Dolan's wake."

"Ah, Judy is a useful woman among the people," said Father John: "she is always selling good books among them."

"And, indeed, your reverence," said Jem, "she made great brags of all she sold of this book; she says there is more of it in the parish now than all other books put together."

"So much the better," said his reverence; "there can't be too much of that book; that's a real Catholic book, and I am glad to see you reading it, boys."

And with that Father John was going away, well satisfied in his mind, when Jem stopped him by saying, "And is it true, your reverence, that the man that wrote it was made a saint by the Pope, just thirteen years ago, in the year 1839?"

"Quite true," says Father John.

"And was that the year he died, your reverence?" said Pat.

"Oh, no," said Father John, "he died more than 150 years before that."

"And why didn't they make him a saint before?" said Pat.

"Oh, it takes a long time," said Father John, "the Church is so particular."

"And didn't the cardinals at Rome read this book, and certify that there was nothing in it against faith or morals?"† said Jem.

"To be sure they did," says Father John; "he couldn't be made a saint without that."

"Well, it ought to be a good book," said Jem.

"Of course it must, when it was written by a saint of the Holy Catholic Church," said Father John; "and I am glad to see that it's such books you are reading, boys."

And with that, Father John was going away; but Jem stopped him with a question.

"Maybe your reverence would explain one thing in the book to me," said Jem.

Now, Father John was so well pleased to see Jem at this book, instead of the Bible, that he stopped to answer him; "and what is it?" said he.

"Well, your reverence," said Jem, "is Mary the mediator between God and man?"

"No," said Father John, "Jesus Christ is the mediator between God and man; but then Mary is our mediator with Jesus Christ."

"Well, your reverence," said Jem, "I find that in this book, sure enough;" and Father John seemed pleased at that; "but I find more in the book foreby," said Jem; and he looked to the page that he and Pat were at, and he read (page 257)—"I am, said Mary, the defence of all that have recourse to me, and my mercy is to them a tower of refuge, and therefore have I been appointed by my Lord the MEDIATRIX of peace BETWEEN SINNERS AND GOD." And then Jem turned back to page 252, and read, "O Mary, thy office is TO MEDIATE BETWEEN GOD AND MAN." "Is that right, your reverence?" said Jem.

"And why wouldn't it be right," said Father John, "when it's in a Catholic book, that the Holy Church approves?"

"Because, your reverence, it's in the Bible that there is one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus; and I don't see how both can be true."

"Didn't I say it was reading the Bible you were?" said Father John.

"And if it wasn't true when your reverence said it, it's true now anyway," said Jem.

"And if you will be reading heretical books," said Father John, "how can I help your going astray?"

"But, your reverence," said Pat, "is not that in the Catholic Bible too?"

"What do you know about that?" said Father John.

"Please your reverence," said Pat. "sure it's the Catholic Bible that I have; and sure, your reverence, that isn't a bad book."

And at that Father John looked less pleased than ever, but he was not just ready with an answer, and Pat did not want to talk much about that; so Pat went on—"But did the Blessed Virgin say that she was appointed the mediatrix between sinners and God? or where did she say it?"

"How do I know," said Father John, getting out of all patience at being so bothered.

"Sure, your reverence, didn't I read it out of this book?" said Jem.

"I tell you what," said Father John, turning round upon Jem, "if it's reading the Bible you are you'll soon be out of the Catholic Church, and out of that there is no salvation. Didn't I often tell you that the Bible would set you astray?"

"Well, your reverence, that's not it," says Jem; "for while I was only reading the Bible I was getting quite contented in my mind, and I was hoping I would go on reading it, and never leave the Catholic Church at all, until I came across this book, and now it's it that is setting my mind astray; for sure when the Bible tells me that there is only one mediator between God and man, and this book, that your reverence says is a Catholic book, says it is Mary's office to mediate between God and man; sure if I can't get some way of settling between them, it will put me astray entirely."

"I'll tell you the way," said Father John, for he was getting afraid of losing Jem entirely, "doesn't this book itself tell you that Jesus Christ is the only mediator of Justice? but that does not hinder Mary to be the mediator of grace and of peace."

"And, please your reverence," said Jem, "does not this book say (page 262), that Mary was 'chosen from eternity to be the mother of God, that her mercy might procure salvation for those whom the justice of her son could not save,' and doesn't that make her a BETTER mediator of salvation that if she was the mediator of justice itself? and isn't that worse and worse?"

"I knew how it would be," said Father John, "when you took to reading the Bible; you're going straight out of the Catholic Church, and out of that there's no redemption, and you will never have a mass said for your soul when you're dead; and what for will you go out of the Catholic Church?"

"If ever I be driven out of it, your reverence," said Jem, "it will be for one thing only."

"And what's that?" said Father John.

"To have the Lord Jesus Christ for my saviour, and him only," said Jem.

"And who told you that there was any other Saviour in the Catholic Church?" said Father John.

"This book, your reverence," said Jem, "the 'Glories of Mary,' that your reverence says was written by a saint, and approved of by the Pope and the cardinals; this book that your reverence says can never set me astray. Sure I turned down the page when I came to it, and here it is—'When we ask of God his graces he sends us to Mary, saying, GO TO MARY' (page 220), and where did God say that at all, or who did he say it to?" said Jem; "and here it goes on—'Our salvation is in the hand of Mary;' and, 'he who is protected by Mary is saved; he who is not protected by her is lost' (page 221); and sure here is a prayer to her—'O pure and immaculate Queen, SAVE ME, deliver me from eternal damnation' (page 220); and here again—'Her mercy procures salvation for those whom the justice of her son could not save' (page 262); and is not all that making her the Savour?"

"Let alone the book," said Father John; "I'm sorry you ever came across it."

"And sure, your reverence," said Jem, "you know well there is more of this book in the parish than there is of the Bible, and many's the time I heard your reverence preach against reading the Bible, and did you ever say a word against this book? And didn't you tell me just now that this book would never set me astray, or put me from the Catholic Church, and that the Bible would put me astray from the Catholic Church? And isn't that the poor case? to say that the writings of man will keep us in the church, and that the writings of God will put us out of it? Isn't that enough to drive a man to think that it is not the Church of God at all? Isn't it——"

"Stop there, will you?" said Father John, "it's not for me to be standing here, arguing with the like of you."

"And it's not for the like of me to be talking this way with your reverence," said Jem, "only for my soul, that you say will be damned if I read the Word of God; and who will I talk to if I don't to my clergy? And sure if your reverence would only read the Catholic Bible to us, and explain it to us, that we mightn't go astray in it—if your reverence would only do that for us——"

"I'll tell you what I'll do for you," said Father John, for he was getting really angry now, "it's on the altar I'll curse you next Sunday; I'll curse you with bell, book, and candle. No man in the parish shall give you employment, no one shall buy or sell with you, no man shall work with you; and if this man digs at the other side of the ridge with you, I will curse him too; and see what your Bible will do for you then."

"Then, your reverence," said Jem, "I'll see if I can't get a blessing from God under all."

And so Father John went off to his horse (and indeed he was mighty cross to the boy that held it for him), and the bell rung for work; so Pat and Jem could not talk any more; but if they did talk afterwards, we hope to find out all about it.

The editor of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN thinks it well to say a few words of the book that Pat and Jem got hold of.

The editor believes it was first printed in English in this country, soon after the writer, St. Alphonso Liguori, with two or three others, were canonized (or made saints) by the Pope, in the Church of St. Peter, in Rome, in the year 1839. The editor believes that the first edition then published in Ireland, contained an account of St. Alphonso, having been made a saint by the Church of Rome, and also a copy of the certificate which the cardinals were required to give on that occasion, that they had read all St. Alphonso's works, and there was nothing found in them CONTRARY TO FAITH or morals.

This certificate was then taken hold of by the Protestants, to fix the doctrines contained in this book upon the Church of Rome; and this, perhaps, is the reason why all mention of St. Alphonso's canonization, and of the certificate of the cardinals, is left out of the editions since published. But the circulation of the book was not stopped; several editions have since been published in Ireland, in a very cheap form, and tens of thousands of copies have been circulated; and the editor cannot find that any priest in Ireland has ever tried to stop it, or has publicly expressed disapprobation of the doctrines contained in it. If any such case of disapprobation have occurred, the editor will be delighted to learn and to publish it.

The edition which the editor possesses is that of 1845. The title is as follows:—

"The Glories of Mary. First Part. A Paraphrase on the Salve Regina, &c., &c. Translated from the Italian of St. Alphonsus Liguori, by a Catholic clergyman. Dublin: Published by James Duffy, 23, Anglesea-street, 1845."

It is from this edition, as being that in most common use, that the editor has marked the pages referred to by Jem.

Some idea may be formed of the book from the titles which St. Alphonso has prefixed to his chapters. The following are a few specimens (ch. ii., sec. 1):—"MARY IS OUR LIFE, because she obtains for us the pardon of our sins." Where note that the Douay Bible says—"Jesus said to her (Martha), I am the resurrection and THE LIFE."—John xi. 25. And again—"Your LIFE is hid with Christ in God."—Ep. to Colos. iii. 3. And—"When Christ shall appear, WHO IS YOUR LIFE."—v. 5. But not one word in the Douay Bible about Mary being our life.

Again, St. Alphonso gives this heading to chapter 3—"Mary is the hope of all. (2), Mary is the hope of sinners." Whereas the Douay Bible says—"Christ in you the hope of glory.'—Ep. to Coloss. i. 27. And again—"Christ Jesus, our hope."—1st Ep. to Timothy i. 1. But not one word in the Douay Bible of Mary being our hope.

* Dupin, Nov. Bibl. Vie de St. Gregoire I.

† It would seem that Jem must have got a copy of an edition published some years ago, in the preface of which all this was related. Everything about Alphonso Liguori being made a saint is left out of the latter editions; we wonder why.—Editor of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Again, St. Alphonso puts this title to chapter 6, section 3—"Mary is the peacemaker of sinners with God." Whereas the Douay Bible says—"We have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ."—Rom. v. 1. And—"He is our peace."—Eph. ii. 14. But not one word in the Douay Bible about Mary being the peacemaker of sinners with God. This will give a fair idea of this book—"The Glories of Mary;" which all true Catholics, who read the Douay Bible, will acknowledge to be a fearful book for the Church of Rome to make herself answerable for; and to allow to be circulated unrestrained among her people.

CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

The following letter to the editor of Saunders's News-letter, appears to us to disclose a mode of interference with the rights and liberties of the laity, which all laymen, of whatever creed, are bound to discountenance and expose. How long is such tyranny tamely to be submitted to by Irish freemen?—

"March 30, 1852.

"Sir,—May I claim the privilege of stating, through the medium of your respected journal, some circumstances with reference to a subject, at which, as a ratepayer and a Roman Catholic, I feel myself aggrieved. On a very recent occasion there was an election for poor-law guardians in this union (Tipperary), and, as it appears, there have been abuses not corrected by the guardians who represented us last year, the ratepayers resolved to, if possible, return two respectable men (both Roman Catholics) to represent this and an adjoining district for the ensuing year, who were in the usual manner nominated. However, as there is no toleration, either in temporal or spiritual matters, allowed by the priests of the Roman Catholic Church, as I will fully demonstrate to you, four of those gentlemen not only cautioned their congregations on Sunday, from their altars, not to vote for the two independent Roman Catholics alluded to, but they went forward to canvass for the men of their choice, and in the teeth of the law called at the several houses of the ratepayers, and actually signed the voting papers for their representatives: this can, if necessary, be proved upon oath. I am happy, however, to say, that in some instances they met with the most decided opposition. Surely, conduct such as I have represented cannot, in the nineteenth century, be tolerated. You will very naturally ask, why have the priests interfered in selecting guardians and adopting this unlawful course? Simply, because there is in this district a most efficient medical gentleman very nearly connected with the candidates before referred to, who, some time ago, renounced the Roman Catholic religion, and, in order that there should be no friend or connection of his a poor-law guardian, the priests adopted this tyrannical course. I must mention, sir, the board of guardians have, up to this time, used every stratagem, if possible, to deprive this gentleman of any share under the Medical Charities' Act, and now the priests want to elect their political and religious slaves, for the purpose of more fully carrying out their views of charity, to frustrate everything that is good, and to trample under foot civil and religious liberty. Yes, sir, those gentlemen have gone the length of cautioning their congregations on Sundays from their altars not to professionally employ this gentleman, threatening us with the extinction of our liberties, and of our very existence, if we disobey their mandates. I wish to ask you, sir, is this the boasted liberty so often made use of by the demagogues who infest this beautiful country? Is this the toleration which the Roman Catholic clergy claim for themselves? Is this the peace and good will which has been instilled into the minds of those men educated at a college which the British Constitution supports? If so, the sooner there is an outburst of indignation against such absolute tyranny the better. Trusting you will, for freedom's sake, give insertion to those few observations,

"I remain, sir,

BIBLE BURNING.

We are so little disposed to impute the errors or misconduct of individuals to the class of which they are members, that we should not notice the following case, even though the subject of a criminal conviction in a court of justice, but from the manner in which the act has subsequently been defended, and even applauded, by a portion of the public press, to which we cannot avoid calling the attention of our readers, though convinced that many of them will feel as much disgust as we do ourselves at such a course of proceeding:—

"At the Mayo assizes, John Syngian Bridgman, otherwise John St. John, otherwise Brother John, a monk of the order of St. Francis, stood indicted 'for that he, not having the fear of God before his eyes, but contriving and intending to scandalize and vilify the true Protestant religion, as by law established within these realms, and to blaspheme the holy Gospel of God and of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, did, on the 23rd day of November, in the 15th of the Queen, at the parish of Ballyovey, unlawfully, wickedly, and blasphemously, in the presence of divers liege subjects of our Queen, set fire to, and partly consume by fire, a copy of the Holy Gospel of God, being the authorized version thereof, appointed to be read in churches, called the New Testament, and then and there holding in his hand the said New Testament, wickedly and blasphemously, in the presence and hearing of divers liege subjects, then and there pronounced and spoke with a loud voice, and published of and concerning said New Testament as aforesaid, these profane and most blasphemous words—that is to say, that "It," meaning the New Testament, "is not the Word of God, but the word of the devil—and the devil's book—Luther's Bible—or your heretic Bible," to the great dishonour of Almighty God, and in contempt of the Protestant religion, and to the great scandal of the profession thereof, and against peace,' &c. The witnesses having been heard in support of the charge, Mr. Keogh addressed the jury on behalf of the prisoner.

"Baron Lefroy (now Chief Justice) charged the jury. He said—I am anxious that this case should be confined within the limits required by the law, and shall state to you what the law is. It is for you to say whether those charges have been proved or not, and whether you are satisfied that he said he was not burning the Word of God, but the word of the devil, and whether the words were applied to the authorized version of the Holy Scriptures; and whether the burning of that book is consistent with the reverence due to that version of the Scriptures authorized by the law of the land. In this case he is indicted for burning the authorised version, but the offence is equally applicable to any other version of the Scriptures, whether it be the Douay Bible or the Rhemish Testament, and the words used would be blasphemous against either version, as showing a want of reverence for the Scriptures, because it is not the version of the Scriptures which will warrant the commission of such an offence. It is not because fallible men cannot agree upon a translation of a portion of the Scriptures that they are to be treated with this want of reverence—that because it is not a particular translation it shall be treated with such vilification. Is it to be held, that when the law of the land sanctions a certain version, and calls it the authorised version—is it to be said that any man, be his opinions what they may, shall pour contempt on it, and thus be guilty of a violation of the law? Is he to be at liberty to throw that book into the fire, and say that he shall vilify that book which the law has sanctioned? It has been said to you that this act must be done with intent, and on that the law is clear: every man is presumed to understand the consequences of his own acts. If a man can throw a book into the fire, whether it be a Douay Bible or the authorized version, and if you believe that he did not intend any contempt, then you should acquit him; but if you believe that he did burn the book and make use of the language, it will be your duty to find him guilty.

"The jury retired, and, after half an hour's deliberation, returned a verdict of guilty. Immediately on the clerk of the crown reading the verdict, Mr. Blake, crown prosecutor, said to his lordship that the crown did not wish to press for any punishment in this case, the object of the prosecutors being to put a stop to such acts. The learned baron was very glad to hear counsel for the crown say so, and trusted there would be no further acts of this kind perpetrated, and, after a brief address to the prisoner, concluded by pronouncing the following sentence—'To give bail, himself in £20, and two sureties in £10 each, to keep the peace and good behaviour of all her Majesty's subjects for seven years, and to come up for judgment when called upon, getting ten days' notice.'"

We cannot help considering this sentence a mild one; but should have anticipated that it would have put a stop to any repetition of similar conduct, had not the following comment upon it appeared in a leading article of the Tablet:—

"The scene to which we refer is a case of Bible-burning; and really if we had wanted an illustration of the gross enormity of our present system of swearing on the Protestant Scriptures, we should find it in this very case.

"Our readers know the tactics of the Bible-readers in these western towns; how they force their way into the houses of the peasantry, insult them by presents of heretical books and pamphlets, tempt them in every possible way to barter poverty for heresy, and to sell their religion for a mess of pottage or a joint of meat. The clergy and monks have to deal with this nuisance as well as they can; and as to too many of their flocks the worldly temptation is, in a human sense, overpowering, it becomes necessary for them to rouse up a strong popular feeling against these diabolical intruders, and make it appear, what it is, infamous for any Catholic to salute them or bid them God speed.

"One of the tricks of these seducers is with a book which they call the Bible—an heretical work, issued by heretical authorities, condemned by the Church, and no more the Word of God than the Koran is the Word of God; we mean, of course, the treatise upon which Catholic witnesses and jurors are sworn in courts of justice. The pretence is, that this book is the Word of God, and when to these poor people—(many of whom are quite as ignorant as the assistant barrister of Kilkenny)—what they suppose to be the Word of God, is brought to them by the canting varlets who seek to entrap them, the veneration for the supposed holiness of the book becomes, or may become, a step to further mischief. It is necessary, therefore, and a duty for the clergy to root out this prejudice, and to convince the people that what the Bible-readers distribute with their soup is not a holy book, but an heretical book; and they would fail grievously in their duty if they did not take some means to this end.

"The means taken at Ballinrobe, it seems, were to burn the heretical volume, and for this act the monk who officiated in the auto da fe was summoned by the Scripture readers before the magistrates to answer two charges—first, that of 'burning a copy of the New Testament;' secondly, that of 'profanely scoffing at the Holy Scriptures.' Now, we really don't want to have these questions of mutual annoyance discussed in the Tablet, if the Scripture readers would give us leave to be silent upon them; but we must say that if 'Brother John,' the defendant in that suit, was guilty of an offence, the present writer is equally an offender. He has burned a Protestant Bible, and is prepared to burn a thousand more if he can gratify his taste economically, and he heartily wishes that the whole seed, breed, and generation of them was extirpated, except, perhaps, a stray copy in a collector's library, as you sometimes find a copy of Jacob's Bœhmen's narrative of the spiritual illumination that fell upon him from the reflection of the sun upon a pewter plate. If an odd volume of the Protestant Bible took its place beside Jacob's aforesaid folio, we would not quarrel with it, but in the present state of the book market, we decidedly consider it, and are prepared to deal with it, in all proper ways, as an objectionable book.

"Having—as we fancy—set an example to 'Brother John' in this particular, we are quite ready to follow his example in another, and to do what the Ballinrobe magistrates call 'profanely scoffing at the Holy Scriptures.' If the Bible readers and other people of that demoralized though respectable class respect the consciences of the poor, it is not either our wish or our taste to speak offensively of what any other man reverences. But, when a bribing Bible reader brings 'Brother John' to the sessions—and the magistrates, espousing the quarrel, send 'Brother John' to the assizes for protecting the faith of the poor, we beg leave perfectly to associate ourselves with 'Brother John' in this particular; to scoff at the book which he scoffed at and to pronounce it—what it is—not the Book of God: not the Holy Scriptures; but a book put together and there circulated by some of the most active friends and servants of the Fire King; in other words, 'the book of the devil.' We say this as 'Brother John' said it, not to insult any one, but to impress on the minds of some ignorant readers a fact it is desirable they should remember, and to confirm and uphold Brother John in his laudable endeavours to teach the truth to the poor."

As we have, from the first, determined not to allow ourselves to be led away into polemic strife from the important object of calm and candid examination of those religious differences which distract our country, by any amount of provocation, we shall abstain from making a single comment upon the above spirited expression of determination to set the law at defiance, and encourage the burning of all versions but the Douay. We entertain, however, a strong opinion, that so long as the Douay Bible remains unburned, and the people have the heart and courage to read it, enough will remain to enable our readers to understand and judge of our views and arguments; especially as we are ourselves in the habit of constantly quoting that version. In doing so, however, we are far from wishing to convey the idea, that we consider the Douay the most accurate translation; and we shall have occasion hereafter to show our readers, that each successive edition of the Douay Testament has approached closer and closer to the authorized Church of England version—thereby acknowledging its value, even when differing from it in some particulars.

Whether the difference between the two versions of the Bible is such as to justify any one in speaking of either as "the book of the devil," and "no more the Word of God than the Koran," is a point which we hope to give satisfactory evidence of in the negative—from time to time—in our pages. We shall at present content ourselves with referring our readers to the following columns of our present number, which will enable them to judge for themselves of the amount of the difference between the two versions, in one important part of the Sacred Writings, referred to by one of our Roman Catholic correspondents, whose letter is also given in this number, as containing one of the strongest passages in favour of purgatory; and which would probably have been one of those mistranslated, if Protestant writers were really in the habit of distorting the Bible, for the purpose either of supporting their own opinions, or opposing the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church.

We are happy to acknowledge as a bright contrast to the bitter and vituperative language of the article we have above quoted, the truly liberal and candid spirit in which the Right Rev. Francis Patrick Kenrick, R.C. Bishop of Philadelphia, writes, in his introduction to his new translation of the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles of St. Paul, the Catholic Epistles, and the Apocalypse, published in 1851, at New York, in which, so far from alluding to the Protestant version in terms of hostility or disrespect, he says expressly —"In adopting occasionally the words and phrases of the Protestant version, I have followed the example of others who have from time to time revised the Rhemish translation. It is not to be regretted that whilst we point to errors which need correction, we acknowledge excellencies which we are free to imitate, thus diminishing the asperity of censure by the tribute which we willingly render to literary merit. I avail myself, however, of the testimony of those who are outside the pale of the church only by way of acknowledgment on their part, or in matters purely critical, in which they have brought their stores of erudition and their natural acuteness of mind to the vindication of the sacred text."

We so cordially agree with the learned and candid Bishop of Philadelphia, in the following eloquent and impressive passage in the same introduction, that we cannot close this brief notice without presenting it also to our readers:—

"A jot or a letter must not be taken for the law; the Word of God must be preserved in its integrity. It is treason against the Supreme Majesty to change a word in a charter under the seal of the Great King. Not without a special design of Providence the closing book of the Sacred Volume denounced woe to the man who shall take away from, or add to, the words of that prophecy—a threat which extends to all who adulterate the Word of God, changing that which should remain inviolate, though heaven and earth pass away."—P. 10.

We shall revert to Bishop Kenrick and his translation of the New Testament again.

LIMITS OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.—The philosopher Locke long since most truly observed, that "man's business in this world is not to know all things, but those which concern his own conduct," and such, too, was the opinion of the profound Bishop Butler. "Not only the reason of the thing," said he, "but the whole analogy of nature should teach us, not to expect to have the like information concerning the Divine conduct as concerning our own duty. Though we are sufficiently instructed for the common purposes of life, yet it is but an almost infinitely small part of natural providence which we are at all let into. The case is the same with regard to revelation. But what is required of us, in consequence of this gracious dispensation [of the gospel], is a subject in which none can complain for want of information."—Butler's Analogy, part ii., ch. 5.

ENGLISH AUTHORIZED VERSION.

AND I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ.

2 I have fed you with milk, and not with meat; for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able.

3 For ye are yet carnal: for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men?

4 For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal?

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believe, even as the Lord gave to every man?

6 I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase.

7 So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase.

8 Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour.

9 For we are labourers together with God; ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building.

10 According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise masterbuilder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

11 For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.

12 Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble;

13 Every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is.

14 If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward.

15 If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.

16 Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?

17 If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

18 Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise.

19 For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written, he taketh the wise in their own craftiness.

20 And, again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain.

21 Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are yours;

22 Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours;

23 And ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's.

DOUAY VERSION.

AND I, brethren, could not speak to you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal. As unto little ones in Christ.

2 I gave you milk to drink, not meat; for you were not able as yet. But neither indeed are you now able; for you are yet carnal.

3 For, whereas there is among you envying and contention, are you not carnal, and walk according to man?

4 For while one saith, I indeed am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollo; are you not men? What then is Apollo, and what is Paul?

5 The ministers of him whom you have believed; and to every one as the Lord hath given.

6 I have planted, Apollo watered, but God gave the increase.

7 Therefore neither he that planteth is anything, nor he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase.

8 Now he that planteth, and he that watereth, are one. And every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour.

9 For we are God's coadjutors: you are God's husbandry; you are God's building.

10 According to the grace of God that is given to me, as a wise architect, I have laid the foundation; and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

11 For other foundation no man can lay, but that which is laid; which is Christ Jesus.

12 Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble:

13 Every man's work shall be manifest; for the day of the Lord shall declare it, because it shall be revealed in fire; and the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is.

14 If any man's work abide, which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward.

15 If any man's work burn, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire.

16 Know you not that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?

17 But if any man violate the temple of God, him shall God destroy. For the temple of God is holy, which you are.

18 Let no man deceive himself: if any man among you seem to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise.

19 For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written: I will catch the wise in their own craftiness.

20 And again: The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain.

21 Let no man therefore glory in men.

22 For all things are yours, whether it be Paul, or Apollo, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; for all are yours:

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1852.

It may scarcely be necessary to remind such of our readers as have perused our pages from the commencement, that the principal object we had in view, in the establishment of such a journal, was to bring before our fellow-countrymen a fair and candid discussion of those doctrinal differences between the Church of Rome, and the Church of England and Ireland, which have too often been discussed with an asperity unbecoming those engaged in the pursuit of truth of any kind, and peculiarly unsuited to promote the cause of either Christian truth or Christian charity.

We have tried, and we trust not without success, to remember "That the servant of the Lord must not wrangle; but be mild towards all men; apt to teach; patient; with modesty admonishing them that wish the truth; if, peradventure, God may give them repentance to know the truth."—2 Timothy ii. 24, 25, Douay Bible. We say not this in the spirit of boasting, nor do we claim any credit for having abstained from using harsh language to those from whom we differ in opinion, either in whole or in part.

We merely call attention to the fact, as an encouragement to those whose learning and talents qualify them to take a part in a controversy, carried on in a mild and candid spirit, to come forward and answer, if they can, any of the positions we have already published, or may hereafter publish in our periodical. We would remind our Roman Catholic friends—and we call them so with unaffected sincerity—that it is quite as much the duty of Roman Catholics to persuade Protestants, by calm reasoning, to adopt the tenets of their church, as it is that of members of the Church of England and Ireland to persuade Roman Catholics to give up what Protestants consider the errors of the Church of Rome. Why is it that the Church of England so freely and so boldly permits and encourages discussion of the points in difference, and allows her adherents freely to read on both sides; and that the Church of Rome is so jealous of such discussions, and prohibits all books but her own? We rejoice to find that many of our Roman Catholic countrymen are beginning to be anxious to promote fair and open discussion, and support their tenets by manly arguments, as the correspondence given in our last and present numbers evinces. But we wish that discussion to be extended to the whole subject, and conducted on broad grounds; grappling with our strong points, and putting their own views in their own language, so as to let Protestants know exactly what the Roman Catholic Church believes and teaches, and for what reasons. We are quite sure that a large number of Protestants would peruse any such discussion with fairness and deep interest; and, for ourselves, we must again repeat what we asserted in a former number, that it is our earnest desire to lay aside all prejudices and all party feeling, and apply ourselves to seek for truth for both ourselves and others, and to embrace it, on whichever side it may be found.

It is in this spirit, and not that of polemic strife, that we now reprint the abstract of a challenge which we inserted in our first number, and which we believe to be of a wholly unexceptionable kind. It is, that any priest or bishop of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland or England (the more able and learned the better), shall not orally, but in print, in our pages, come forward and discuss, in a spirit of candour and Christian kindness, the whole controversy, not hastily, but at full leisure. We do not ask the writers publicly to give their names; so that, if they fail, no personal disgrace will ensue, and their church need not necessarily suffer; and there will, consequently, be the less temptation to lose temper, or use harsh language. All we require is, that Christian temper shall be preserved on both sides; and, where authorities are cited, accurate references given to the volume, page, and exact edition, that time may not be lost in searching for the passages relied on. This we engage on our side to do, and have hitherto studiously done.

Should this challenge be accepted in the spirit of fair play, in which it is proposed, we cannot but think that there is some little chance of intelligent Irishmen being able to decide for themselves which party is in the right, whichever side truth may really be on. But should it be still declined, intelligent laymen will be at liberty to draw their own conclusions as to the true reasons of such refusal.

HISTORICAL ACCOUNT OF THE MANNER OF APPOINTING BISHOPS IN IRELAND.

In our last number we proved, from undeniable authorities, that, up to the year 1152, when the Pope first began to acquire power in the Irish Church, no Irish bishop was ever appointed to his See by the Bishop of Rome.

We propose, in this paper, to show how Irish bishops were appointed from that period (1152) up to the Reformation.

As, in our last paper, we quoted only Roman Catholic authors and bishops, we shall, in this, quote only Roman Catholic laws, passed in Roman Catholic times, by kings, lords and commons, who were members of the Roman Catholic Church, in full communion with the See of Rome. The only exception we shall make is to illustrate those laws from Sir James Ware's "History of the Irish Bishops." We admit this book, (although Sir James Ware was a Protestant), 1st, because it is compiled from documents passed in Roman Catholic times; 2nd, because it is admitted as an authority by all Roman Catholic writers of learning; 3rd, because it is the only history of the bishops of Ireland.

Our first authority is an act passed in the Irish parliament, in the year 1454, more than 100 years before the Reformation, under Queen Elizabeth—32 Hen. VI., c. 1, Irish Statutes, vol. i., page 15:—"At the request of the Commons, that where divers statutes and ordinances, as well within the realm of England, as within this realm of Ireland, have been made against all them that sue provisions to the Court of Rome . . this notwithstanding, provisions are sued from day to other more now than before this time, ... it is ordained and established . . . . . that from henceforward all the acts, ordinances, and statutes, made against the provisors, as well in England as in Ireland, be had and kept in force within this land of Ireland." The act goes on to give treble damages (besides a fine) to all who might in future be aggrieved by "provisors."

Now, this word "provision" was the name given to a Bull from the Pope, appointing a man to a bishopric or benefice; and a "provisor" was a man who claimed a bishopric by virtue of the Pope's Bull.

The Bulls got that name from the Pope undertaking in them "to provide" bishops for the vacant sees.

It appears from this act itself, that it was not the first law passed in Ireland on this subject; for it refers to "divers statutes" previously passed in Ireland, and enacts that they shall be "kept in force." These previous acts are, probably, in the Irish parliamentary office, or among the rolls of Chancery; but as they have never been printed, we are not able to make use of them. But this statute also put into force, in Ireland, all statutes made in England against provisors; and as these are printed, we shall give some specimens of them. 25th Ed. III., statute 5, ch. 22, was passed in the year 1350—that is, 200 years before the Reformation. By this law, any one purchasing a "provision" to have abbeys or priories in England, "shall be out of the king's protection. And that a man may do with them as of enemies of our sovereign lord the king and his realm. And he that offendeth against such provisors (that is, injures the persons that get themselves so appointed) in body or in goods, or in other possessions, shall be excused against all people, and shall never be impeached nor grieved for the same, at any man's suit." Under this law it was held, that any one who killed one of these "provisors" was not guilty of murder in the eye of the law, and could not be punished for it. This was a law of dreadful and unjust severity against the provisors. Yet it continued in force until after the Reformation: for the 5th Eliz., c. 1, was the first act that made it unlawful to kill "provisors."

Statute 6. in the same year, upon "the grievous complaints of all the commons of the realm," against the Pope appointing bishops, &c., by provision, enacts that all persons concerned in such appointments shall be put in prison, and not delivered until they paid whatever fine the king imposed on them, and also made "full renunciation, and find sufficient surety that they shall not attempt such things in time to come."

12 Rich. II., ch. 15, was passed in the year 1388, and by it any person going out of the kingdom, to get any "provision" from the Pope, is put out of the king's protection.

By the 13th Richard II., statute 2, ch. 3, any person bringing into the realm any sentence of excommunication from the Pope against any one, for executing the statutes against provisors, was to forfeit all his goods, and incur "the pain of life and member."

The act 16th Richd. II., ch. 5, recites that the Pope had excommunicated several bishops in England for obeying these laws; upon which the Commons passed this resolution—"That the said things so attempted be clearly against the king's crown and his regalty, used and approved of the times of all his progenitors; whereupon they, and all the liege commons of the same realm, will stand with our said lord the king, and his said crown and his regalty in the cases aforesaid, and in all other cases attempted against him, to live and to die." And it was enacted again, that any person concurring in so offending against the law, should be put out of the king's protection, and forfeit all their goods.

There are some other laws of the same kind, but these are enough for our purpose.

These are the English acts which the Roman Catholic parliament of Ireland, peers, bishops, clergy, and commons (for the clergy sat in parliament then), 100 years before the Reformation, adopted and established as the law of Ireland, in the first act which we have given above. And the very first words of that act are these—"At the request of the Commons." It was the Roman Catholic representatives of the Roman Catholic people of Ireland that asked to have these laws solemnly established in Ireland!

In the year 1467, two more statutes were passed by the Irish parliament (7 Edward IV., ch. 2 and 3), enacting that any man who procured dignities or benefices by Bulls from the Pope, to hold in commendam, should be put out of the king's protection; and that any pardon or licence granted to such persons by the king, should be void, unless it were by act of parliament. The second of these acts is also "at the request of the commons."

Another act, passed in 1495, near 50 years before the first commencement of the Reformation (10 Henry VII., ch. 5) complains of the "many debates and strifes" that had arisen from the Pope's interfering, and says, that "many of the king's true subjects, prelates and beneficers, wrongfully and by strength, be put out of their livelihood, and such persons provisors be put in their places." So we see it is no new thing to have two sets of bishops in Ireland: it was not the Reformation that brought it about; for here we see that, 50 years before the Reformation ever was heard of, there was a set of Irish bishops appointed in Ireland according to the laws of the Church and of the kingdom, and the Bishop of Rome was making another set of bishops at Rome and sending them over to Ireland, to turn out the Irish bishops wrongfully, and by force, out of their bishopries. And to meet this, it was again enacted in that statute, that all acts formerly made against provisors, either in England or in Ireland, should be "duly and straightly executed," the effect of which, as we have seen, was, that all persons so offending, should be put out of the king's protection, so that they might be dealt with by every man as open enemies in war.

We see here the spirit and the laws of our Roman Catholic forefathers. Roman Catholics as they were, it was none of their religion that they must submit to every usurpation and tyranny of the bishop of Rome. They knew how important it was to the SPIRIT OF IRISH NATIONALITY, that Irish Roman Catholic bishops should be appointed in Ireland. They knew that if the Pope's usurpations were once allowed to succeed, there would be an end of all liberty and law; and they resolved to resist those usurpations, and to stand together in defence of the liberty and independence of their church and country. It is for Irish Roman Catholics now, to consider how far they have degenerated, and how far they will yet degenerate more, from the spirit of their Roman Catholic fathers. Will they now suffer the Pope to nominate whoever he pleases to succeed the respected Dr. Murray; or will they insist on a successor being elected by Irishmen and in Ireland?

We have only space to give a few brief illustrations from Ware.

The first trace we find of the Pope's interference was in the See of Armagh, in the year 1202 or 1203. There was an election by the chapter, in which both candidates, LePetit and Tichhull, claimed to be rightly elected. The Pope often took advantage of such cases, and in this he interfered and appointed Eugene M'Gillivider. On this the king sent letters to all the bishops of the province, commanding them not to acknowledge Eugene as Archbishop of Armagh. Great contests followed, which lasted for several years. Two bishops, successively supported by the king, both died during the contest. In what way it was finally adjusted is not recorded, but Eugene got possession of the archbishopric about three or four years afterwards, with the king's consent. It is probable that he renounced his title under the Pope's Bull, and then was allowed by the king to hold it. This became a common practice afterwards, when the Pope pretended to make an appointment. If the king was powerful at the time, he succeeded in keeping in the person elected by the chapter and confirmed by the king. But if the king was not sufficiently powerful thus to vindicate the law, he sometimes contented himself with allowing the person nominated by the Pope to renounce his Bull, and hold the bishopric under the king. Many such documents are still in existence, or on record in history. We find this done in the case of Walter Jorse, A.B., of Armagh, A.D., 1306, and again in the case of Stephen Segrave, A.D., 1322, whose act of renunciation is in the Rymers Federa Tom. iv, page 7, in which he openly, willingly, and expressly relinquishes all clauses in the Pope's Bull prejudicial to the rights and prerogatives of the crown.

Similar cases, in this and other Sees, are too numerous to mention. On the other hand, we find cases where the person appointed by the Pope was never able to get possession at all. Thus, in 1527, Donat O'Fidabra was appointed to Armagh, with the royal assent, and at the same time one Nicholas, Canon of Armagh, was appointed by the Pope's Bull, and was consecrated by the Bishop of Tusculum in Italy, yet Donat was always counted the rightful archbishop, and no more was heard of Nicholas. And when the See was vacant in 1247 the king having notice that the Pope was about to interfere, hastened the canonical election, and no more was heard of the Pope's appointment.

Yet the Pope's interference, as the Irish acts of parliament above quoted testify, became constantly more frequent; and the kings, from inability to enforce the law, or to avoid the trouble of doing so, contented themselves with receiving a renunciation of the Papal appointment, and allowed the same person to hold the office from themselves. By this means they thought that they preserved their right entire; yet this really favoured the Pope's claim, at least he gradually turned it to his own advantage; and this appears to have been the reason that the Irish parliament took away from the king the power of granting pardons to those who accepted appointments from the Pope; for when the king accepted their renunciation and confirmed them in their See, it was legally necessary that he should pardon their breach of the law.

But, all along, THE LAW was as strong against the Pope's appointments as it could be.

We conclude this account of the law, in Roman Catholic times, by referring to the act passed in the reign of Queen Mary. King Edward the Sixth had promoted the Reformation; but when he died, Queen Mary, who was a zealous Roman Catholic, restored the supremacy of the Pope as it had existed before. But in the act which was passed for that purpose, the Irish parliament inserted a clause to this effect, that they did not intend to alter any of the rights or prerogatives of the crown in past reigns; and that the Pope should exercise only such authority as he could lawfully have exercised before the Reformation.—3 & 4 Phil. and Mary, c. 8, sec. 13. So that the acts against provisors remained in full force, and the Pope had no power to appoint a bishop in Ireland during the reign even of Queen Mary.

And now, on what pretence did the Bishop of Rome then strive to violate the laws of this land in Roman Catholic times? It was not that the laws of the land were contrary to the laws of the Catholic Church; for the law of the Catholic Church had always been, and then was, that the bishops should be appointed at home and consecrated by the bishops of the province.

The Pope's claim was founded on this alone, that he chose to say, in opposition to all law, both of the land and of the Church, "We have reserved those appointments to ourselves!" Our Roman Catholic forefathers knew the merits and the objects of this claim, and therefore they opposed it resolutely, as we have shown. It is for their sons to justify or to condemn their conduct, by following or forsaking their example.

In our next number we shall show how the Pope has acted in this matter, and how Irish Roman Catholics have acted in it, too, from the Reformation to this time.

Correspondence.

READING THE SCRIPTURES.

WE inserted in the last number of this journal a letter from a Roman Catholic correspondent, Mr. Aylmer, on the subject of reading the Scriptures. We had not time then to make more than one or two passing remarks on his communication; but we promised to return to the subject on a future occasion, and we avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity of doing so.

Mr. Aylmer's letter is important, chiefly on account of the strange misrepresentations which it contains of the views which we have advocated on the reading and interpretation of the Scriptures. We are quite sure that these misrepresentations are not wilful: but purely the result of unacquaintance with, and misapprehension of, our views. But when an educated man, like Mr. Aylmer, has fallen into those mistakes, we cannot but apprehend that they prevail widely among the members of the church to which he belongs. We, therefore, gladly avail ourselves of the opportunity which his letter affords us of correcting these erroneous notions, by stating plainly and clearly what our views are.

We would commence our remarks, however, by quoting a sentiment expressed by Mr. Aylmer, in the pamphlet referred to in his letter, because it is one which does him honour, and of which we highly approve. He says—"It (the Bible) shall ever be 'a lamp to my feet and a light to my path.'—Psalm cxviii. 105. No change of country or of climate shall rid me of it; wherever I may wander, in whatever region I may seek rest for the sole of my wearied foot—on the banks of the Rhine, the Tiber, or the Arno, it shall be my inseparable companion."

We trust, and entertain no doubt, but the writer will adhere to this pious resolution; but we would caution our friends from thence deducing a hasty inference, that even such men as Mr. Aylmer are altogether free agents in the matter, and beg to remind him that he is not a freeman. As a Roman Catholic, he dare not claim the Bible as his birthright; the privilege of reading it has been conceded to him by his spiritual superiors; but the same power that granted the privilege may, when it pleases, revoke it. In the Church of Rome, the priesthood have, by what we must consider a daring usurpation, set up a claim to the exclusive possession of the treasure of heavenly wisdom, and they may lock it up, and refuse access to it, whenever and to whomsoever they think fit. What say the Roman Catholic bishops and vicars apostolic of Great Britain, as quoted at page 8 of Mr. Aylmer's pamphlet? "There never was a general law of the Catholic Church, prohibiting the reading of the authorized translations of the Scriptures; but considering that many, by their ignorance and evil dispositions, have perverted the meaning of the sacred text to their own destruction, the Catholic Church has thought it prudent to make a regulation, that the faithful should be guided in this matter by the advice of their respective pastors." This means simply that a Roman Catholic may read the Bible if his priest allows him: otherwise not. And on what ground do they claim this power? The ground put forth by the vicars apostolic of Great Britain is. "that many by their ignorance and evil dispositions have perverted the meaning of the sacred text to their own destruction." Now, there is an important principle involved in this, which requires to be examined. The principle is, that a particular class of persons may assume the power of withholding a good gift of God from their fellow creatures, and justify themselves in exercising it, on the ground that the gift is liable to be abused, and that men do, in fact, often abuse it to their own destruction. We object to this, as unsound and dangerous. God himself, in his providential dealings with men, does not act on this principle. Reason is very often abused and perverted by men, to their own and other persons' grievous injury; and yet reason is God's gift to us, and one for which we ought to be most thankful, notwithstanding the awful responsibility which its possession entails upon us. The Christian religion has been charged by infidels with having been the cause of dreadful evils and atrocities; and they have made this an argument to prove that it could not have come from God: but Christians readily refute this by showing that the evils complained of arise from the perversion of the true religion by ambitious and ungodly men, and that they are not justly chargeable on the religion itself. And so, too, with regard to those things which are in our own power and which we may therefore do or forbear doing. The only true and safe principle to go on is, that we should do what is right and our duty, leaving others to bear the burden of the responsibility of their own conduct or misconduct, and trusting the consequences to God. Thus a physician is bound to do his utmost to cure a sick person, although, from his knowledge of the man's character, he may have great reason to apprehend that he will make use of his restored health only to do mischief to himself and others. And thus, too, a statesman, if he has it in his power to educate and civilize a nation of savages, must not shrink from doing so, on the ground that they may fall into certain vices, commonly found in civilized communities, but from which savages are generally exempt. St. Paul felt his own course of duty to be plain, and that was, to preach the gospel to all classes whether they abused it or not. He says, in Roms. i. 14, 15, – "To the Greeks and to the Barbarians, to the wise and to the unwise, I am a debtor; so (as much as is in me) I am ready to preach the gospel to you also that are at Rome." And so we think is every Christian minister a debtor to put the Word of God into the hands of every one capable of reading it. His duty does not, however, end there; he is bound not only to take pains to understand that Word himself, but he is bound, also, to aid all who apply to him, or who will listen to him, to understand it. The private judgment advocated by Protestants, is supposed by most Roman Catholics, and among others apparently by Mr. Aylmer, to be the same as unaided, uninstructed judgment. We repudiate this notion, as well as the other absurdities which Mr. Aylmer attributes to us, of "making a child the arbiter of the most important truths;" or of pretending that there are no difficulties in the Scriptures. We go along with Roman Catholics to this extent, that God has given us a Church as well as a religion; that he has instituted an order of men in that Church, one of whose chief duties it is to give themselves up to the study of God's Word, and to be diligent in teaching and preaching it; and that we have the results of this gracious provision which God has made for the better understanding and more effectual operation of his Word, not merely in the sermons which we hear every Lord's day, but in the Catechisms, the Creeds, the Articles, the Liturgies, and the Scripture commentaries which exist for our guidance and edification. Every individual is bound to seek for the instruction necessary to enable him to understand the Scriptures, from every source within his reach; and every individual is also bound to do what he can to help others to understand what they read—not by invading the office of the ministry, by becoming an official expounder and preacher, but by imparting, in a private manner, any information he may possess to those who ask him, or to those who are so connected with him as to render such a course a duty. But in all this we still recognise the right of man's reason and judgment to examine and comprehend, and be convinced and believe. Protestants appeal to reason; Roman Catholics to authority. An appeal to reason assumes the right use of reason; an appeal to authority does not assume any use of reason at all. To be consistent, the advocates of this appeal to authority should be prepared to say, we believe such and such things to be contained in Scripture, not because our priests have, by their arguments and instruction, enabled us to see that they are so contained in it, but because they say they are. Now, St. Paul says, "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty;" but the doctrine laid down above, is pure and absolute slavery. If the only thing required of us by God were to conform our outward actions to a law, then the priests might be regarded as the judges appointed by God to expound the law, and their expositions be binding. But God requires the truth of his Gospel to be believed and felt, and to influence our thoughts and motives, our will and affections; and such a sanctifying operation of the truth is inconceivable, if the office of the priesthood be, not to guide our judgment and enlighten our reason by the ordinary means employed when any other book is to be explained, or branch of human knowledge is concerned, but authoritatively to lay down the law, and to coerce our assent to their decisions. We venture to say, that we believe the priests of the Church of Rome have no royal road to that knowledge of God's Word which could qualify them, and them only, to be sound expositors of it; and that priests of either Church will be safe guides in this matter only in so far as they are spiritual-minded, learned, sensible, Bible-reading men of God. And as to the claims of the Roman Church to a power of giving the true sense of the Scriptures with infallible certainty, all we shall say is, that if she has this power, it is a pity she has never exercised it. If she might, according to her own showing, have drawn up an infallible commentary upon the Bible, and if the absence of such an unerring commentary has led so many millions into error, we ask every Catholic layman of intelligence and right feeling, is it not a shame and a reproach to her that she has never done it?

As to the text from John v., we have some further observations to make; but the length to which our present remarks have already run, obliges us to postpone them to another occasion.

PURGATORY.

In this and in the last two numbers we have laid before our readers the sentiments of some of the most eminent saints and fathers of the Primitive Church on the state of departed souls, and have given reasons for thinking that for four centuries, at least, after the time of our Lord, the doctrine of purgatory, as now held by the Roman Catholic Church, was unknown. The remarks in our last number have drawn forth a letter from a correspondent, inviting our attention to some Scripture evidence for the existence of purgatory. This appeal from the Fathers to Scripture is one which we cannot refuse to listen to. We very willingly confess, that if it can be proved that our Blessed Saviour or any of the Apostles, revealed, in the Holy Scriptures, the existence of such a place, we are bound to believe in it, even though St. Patrick, St. Leo, St. Chrysostom, or any other saint knew nothing about it, and however strange such ignorance would be. And we earnestly hope that many of our readers will follow our correspondent's example, and will "Search the Scriptures" for themselves, and examine what are the doctrines which it teaches. The following is the letter referred to:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir,—Your proofs against the non-existence of purgatory will not hold good with Roman Catholics. They firmly believe that such a state exists, and their true opinion is confirmed by the following passages:—

"The work of every man shall be manifest, for the day of our Lord will declare it, because it shall be revealed in fire; and the work of every one, of what kind it is, the fire shall try; if a man's work abides [as theirs doth who suffer no purgatory], he shall receive a reward; if any man's work burn [as theirs doth who go to purgatory], he suffers detriment, but himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire."—1st Cor. iii. 13, 14, 15.

"Be thou at agreement with thy adversary betimes, whilst thou art in the way with him [that is, in this life], lest perhaps the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison [purgatory]. Amen, I say unto thee, thou shalt not go out from thence till thou repayest the last farthing."—St. Matt. v. 25, 26.

Now, if the words within parentheses in our correspondent's quotations, were part of the sacred text, then indeed it would be certain that the two passages he has cited have a reference to purgatory. But these words within parentheses are no part of Scripture, but are merely the private interpretation given by "Amicus;" and we hope to show that this interpretation is not consistent with the words of the text—that it cannot possibly be received by any one who determines to interpret Scripture only in accordance with the unanimous consent of the Fathers—and, lastly, that his interpretation is not accepted by Roman Catholic divines of acknowledged authority.

To commence with the passage from Corinthians. The text asserts that the fire shall try the work of every one, of what kind it is; and it implies that some of the works thus tested shall abide, and some shall burn. "Amicus" asserts that the works which abide are the works of those who do not suffer purgatory; it is plain, therefore, from his own admission, that the fire which tries these works is not purgatorial fire. Further, the fire spoken of in the text is to try the work of every one; but purgatory is not a place of trial, but a place of punishment. The fire spoken of in the text is to try the work of every one; but the fire of purgatory is spoken of as having nothing to do with the works of men, but as exercising its power upon men's souls. We conclude, then, that the fire spoken of in the text, which tries, tries the work, and tries the work of every one, is not the same as purgatorial fire, which punishes, punishes the souls, and only punishes the souls of some men.

Thus we have shown that the interpretation of "Amicus" is inconsistent with the words of the text, and it is equally easy to show that it is not supported by the consent of the Fathers. We need only direct our correspondent to the references given by the celebrated Cardinal Bellarmine, in the chapter in which he discusses this very text—De Purgatorio, book i., chap. v. He will there see that several eminent Greek Fathers, including Chrysostom and Theophylact, supposed that the fire spoken of was hell fire: that others understood the text to refer to the fire of that conflagration in which the world shall be burnt up; but that St. Augustine and Gregory the Great interpret the text as referring to the fiery trial of tribulation which takes place in this life. Bellarmine's own opinion is singular. He considers, for nearly the same reasons as we have given, that "the fire which is to try every man's work" cannot refer to purgatory, but must be understood metaphorically; but he endeavours to maintain that the latter clause, "so as by fire," is to be understood of purgatorial fire. Thus he gives to the word fire two different meanings in the two clauses of this short passage: In the first place, where "the fire" is simply mentioned, he understands it metaphorically; and where the expression is, "so as by fire," he understands it literally. If any refutation of this interpretation is needed, it is sufficient to say, that however much the Fathers may differ among themselves as to what is meant by the word fire, they agree as to the necessity of being each consistent with himself, and give the same meaning to the word in all the clauses of the passage.

To one who has no theory to support, the words, "so as by fire," present no difficulty. They form a proverbial expression for escape from danger, not without great hazard and difficulty, like one that, when his house is set on fire at midnight, wakes and leaps out of the bed and runs naked out of doors—See St. Chrysostom, vol. ii., p. 639. Such proverbial expressions for escape from calamity may be found in other passages of Scripture.—See Amos iv. 11, Jude 23.

Thirdly. We shall show that the controversial use of this passage in Corinthians is now given up by the leading Roman Catholic writers. It is to be observed, that Scripture texts are used by Romish divines for two very different purposes. If a member of their own communion asks them to produce some texts in favour of purgatory, then it is sufficient to pick out from a concordance some passage where the word "fire," or the word "prison," occurs, and to say that in this passage purgatory is probably alluded to: but in arguing with an opponent, something more is required than a mere possibility that purgatory may be referred to; it is necessary to show that such is the natural and proper sense of the passage. Thus our readers will see that it is one thing, "suadere probabiliter," another, "demonstrare contra hæreticos." Now, it is in this latter controversial use that we say the passage has been given up by Romish authorities. We shall not quote Erasmus; for though he was a Romanist, and though his arguments on this passage are very convincing, yet as he was suspected of a leaning towards the reformed views, his authority has less weight. But we refer "Amicus" to the discussion given by the approved theologian, Natalis Alexander, of all the texts which relate to the doctrine of purgatory (See Diss. xlv., in Hist. 4th secoli), who, after citing at length the opinions of Chrysostom, of Theodoret, of Augustine, and of Gregory the Great, concludes that this passage cannot be used to demonstrate the existence of purgatory. And accordingly the more recent Roman Catholic controversial writers do not lay any stress on this passage. We give as an instance among their foreign divines Perrone, lecturer at the Jesuit College at Rome (see his Prælectiones Theologicæ, vol. iii.); and among English writers, Cardinal Wiseman (Lectures on Catholic Doctrine, vol. ii, p. 64), who says, "that he adverts to this passage not for the purpose of discussing whether it applies to purgatory or not," and goes on to say—"It is not essential to our belief that this text should refer to purgatory," which he surely would not have said if it was relied on as one of the strongest Scripture proofs.

On the passage in St. Matthew we need say less, because of it the best Roman Catholic writers are agreed that it has no reference to purgatory whatsoever. See the Dissertation of Natalis Alexander already referred to, and also the commentary on the passage of the Jesuist, Maldonatus, who, certainly, cannot be accused of any leaning towards Protestant views. We translate the observations on the passage of Natalis Alexander—an approved Roman Catholic theologian. "Some would understand by 'prison' purgatory, by 'farthing' 'venial sins,' which must be expiated by those who have died in a state of grace and charity before they can escape from purgatory. This interpretation Bellarmine defends by some testimonies from the Fathers, of which scarcely one is clear and express. But this place does not demonstrate purgatory, and its true meaning is very different from that which Bellarmine gives to it. 'Our adversary' is either the Divine law, which accuses us before God (as St. Augustine interprets), or else the man who has anything against us, whom we have offended and called fool [see the context], who pleads against us before God (as St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, and St. Jerome interpret); 'the way' is the time of this life: 'the judge' is Christ; the officer is the devil, whose agency God employs in torturing the damned; 'prison' is hell; 'the last farthing' is the smallest fault, for a farthing was the smallest piece of money; so that to pay the last farthing is a proverbial expression for being punished with the utmost rigour of the law. But as to what is said, that we shall not get out until we have paid the last farthing, it is not meant that we shall get out afterwards; because, since the damned are liable to infinite punishment for every mortal sin, this is a debt which they can never pay. The word 'until,' therefore, must be taken in the same sense as in the first chapter of St. Matthew's gospel—'He knew her not until she had brought forth her first-born son,' whence it is not to be inferred that Joseph did know Mary after she had brought forth. And again, Psalm 109—'Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool.' And again, 1st Corinthians, 15—'He must reign until he have put all enemies under his feet.' As, therefore, it is understood that Christ will always reign, since his enemies will be always under his feet, so in the passage—'Thou shalt not depart thence until thou hast paid the uttermost farthing'—we must understand, that the persons spoken of shall never depart from the prison, because they will be always paying the last farthing, since the punishments of sin are eternal. This is the interpretation of St. Augustine—Book i., on the Sermon on the Mount, cap. 11."

Such are the observations of Natalis Alexander on this passage; and as the best Roman Catholic divines agree with him that this text has no reference to purgatory, we think it scarcely worth mentioning, that St. Chrysostom interprets the whole passage of the dangers which may be incurred in this life by one who omits to be reconciled to his adversary; and understands judge, officer, prison, &c., in their most literal sense.

We think, then, we have said enough to show that the two passages which "Amicus" has brought forward are utterly insufficient to establish the doctrine of purgatory; and we would beg of him to examine further the statements of Scripture on the subject. Now, we are very certain that if the doctrine of purgatory be true, clear and explicit statements of it will be found in Scripture. Our Lord and his Apostles did not seek to make converts by concealing from them any of the sufferings to which Christians should be liable. Our Saviour exhorted those who came to join themselves to him to count the cost well beforehand: and he candidly told them that in this world they should have tribulation, and that they who had persecuted him would also persecute his followers. Now, we may be very sure that he who so faithfully acquainted his disciples with all the sufferings they should have to bear in this life would not keep secret from them any they should have to endure in the world to come.

Besides, if the Romish theory be true, the sufferings to be endured in purgatory may be much shortened by men's prayers, and penances, and sufferings in this life. If this theory be true, then it is impossible but that, among all the advice which is recorded to have been given by our Lord to his disciples, and by the Apostles to their converts, we shall find some directions as to the means of shortening or escaping these dreadful sufferings hereafter. And among the consolations which are recorded to have been given by our Lord and his Apostles to their disciples suffering under persecution, we shall surely find some mention made of the effect of those earthly afflictions in shortening the torments of purgatory. But if nothing of this kind can be found in Scripture; if the only sufferings which the believers in Christ were informed they should have to bear, were the persecutions of this life—the only terror of the Lord denounced against evil-doers were the torments of hell; if the Christians were comforted with the hope that, 'when absent from the body, they should be present with the Lord'—that 'when the house of their earthly tabernacle should be dissolved, they should have a building of God, a house not made by hands, eternal in the heavens'—that 'they who die in the Lord should rest from their labours,' then we think it is a reasonable inference, from the silence of Scripture as to such a place as purgatory, that our Lord and his Apostles did not know of its existence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As a subscriber to the LAYMAN, I hope you will have no objection to afford me, from time to time, some information which I am desirous of obtaining.

I have read attentively, in your last number, an article, headed Purgatory, in which you give extracts from a work attributed, you say, to St. Patrick, entitled, "The Three Habitations." Now, what I want to know from you is, to which of those habitations do children go, who may happen to die without receiving baptism? and, also, was it in a fourth habitation the soul of the Redeemer was from his death till the resurrection?

I hope you may oblige me by enlightening me on these points in the columns of the next number of the LAYMAN.

Your obdt. servt.,
WALTER PLUNKET.

Loughrea, March, 1852.

We shall always be happy to afford to our correspondent whatever information we possess or can obtain. It is a duty which we always discharge with pleasure; but we cannot undertake to give any more information upon any point than what Christ and his Apostles have given to the world. We believe that there must be a vast deal more "in the world of spirits" than Christ has thought fit to reveal to us at present: but we believe that Christ revealed to his Apostles all that it was necessary and profitable for us to know at present. And St. Paul says he kept back nothing that was profitable to us.—Acts chap. xx., v. 20, Douay Bible. Beyond what is so revealed, our only wisdom is to confess our ignorance, and to live as men who look for their Lord's appearing, when all hidden things shall be made plain.

We cannot find that Christ or his Apostles have told us the destiny of children who die unbaptized, and, therefore, we cannot pretend to know it. But we are sure that Christ knows it; and we are also sure that the Judge of all the earth shall do right. To him, therefore, we leave it; not without this ground of hope, that he "died for all" (2 Cor. chap. v., v. 14, Douay Bible), and that "He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for those of the whole world."—1 John chap. ii., v. 2. It is enough for us that we have Christ's gracious invitation to bring our children to him. If any neglect to bring them, Christ will do what seems good to him.

Nor do we see how this question is at all plainer to those who believe the common doctrine of purgatory; for these children have immortal souls, which shall live for ever. But purgatory will not last for ever: and what place are their souls to be in afterwards? Therefore, supposing a purgatory does not solve the difficulty.

With respect to the second question—"Was it in a fourth habitation the soul of the Redeemer was, from his death till his resurrection?—we answer thus, David said, in the 15th Psalm, v. 10 (Douay Bible)—"Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell;" and St. Peter, in the 2nd chap. of Acts, tells us, that David, being a prophet, spoke this—"of the resurrection of Christ," v. 27, 30, 31. But what place is here meant by "Hades" or hell, has been a source of great difference of opinion among the Fathers.

We know that the spirit of man exists in the interval between death and the resurrection of the body. We know that God has it somewhere. We know that our Saviour spoke of Lazarus being "in Abraham's bosom" (Luke, chap. xvi., v. 22, Douay Bible); and of the rich man being "buried in hell"—same verse. This was after they were dead, and before the resurrection of the body. We know that these places were "afar off" from each other (v. 23), and separated "by a great chaos" (v. 26). We believe (with all the Fathers), that Abraham's bosom was a place of happiness, though not so perfect in glory as the state that shall follow the resurrection. We see no difficulty in supposing that it may be connected with heaven, or even as part of it, just as the hell in which the rich man was "buried" may be a part of the hell of the damned, or at least connected with it. Thus, we may easily account for St. Patrick counting only "three habitations"—namely, heaven, earth, and hell.

Now, whether "Hades," to which our Saviour went, be a name which includes the place called "Abraham's bosom," and also that "hell" to which the rich man went; or whether the term "Hades" is applied to the latter alone, is a question which the Scriptures do not seem to decide, and about which the Fathers, therefore, differed widely. We, therefore, think it wise not to assert anything positively, where we cannot be certain.

To either of these places our Saviour went when he "descended into hell." It may be to both. The words which our Saviour spoke, when on the cross, to the thief who was dying beside him—"This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise" (Luke xxiii. 43), are thought, with great reason, to be spoken of the place called "Abraham's bosom;" while the words, "he descended first into the lower parts of the earth" (Eph. iv., v. 9), and also the words, "he descended into hell," are thought, by many, to refer rather to the hell of the rich man. Whichever place it was, or if he went successively to both, there is no need of St. Patrick counting a "fourth habitation," because he must have looked on one of these places as belonging to heaven, and the other to hell.

Our correspondent should remember what we quote St. Patrick's work for. Simply to prove that St. Patrick did not believe in Purgatory, and that it was no part of the religion which he taught the Irish. If our correspondent means to find fault with the omission, why he is condemning the religion of St. Patrick, that is all; and making out St. Patrick a Protestant.

We think it clear that "Abraham's bosom," and the "hell" in which the rich man was buried, cannot be "Purgatory," according to the common notion; because "Abraham's bosom" was, clearly, a place of happiness; and between it and the rich man's "hell" there is fixed a great chaos (or gulf, as the Protestant Bible has it). So that they who would pass from thence to you, cannot "nor from thence come hither."—Luke xvi. 26, Douay Bible. Abraham does not say to the rich man, "Pray to the Blessed Virgin," or "get the Priest to say masses for you;" but he plainly tells him—"You cannot from thence come hither." Surely that cannot be Purgatory.

ON TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Conscious that I am neither talented nor educated sufficiently to convey my thoughts on an important subject in a suitable style, I feel considerable diffidence; but as you will not expect that every layman who reads your paper will be educated, you will not ungenerously criticise a communication from one of them on that score. The subject which led to the few observations I intend to offer, is contained in an article in your paper of the 17th inst., on transubstantiation. Now, it appears to me that the communication you received bearing the Enniscorthy post mark, is conclusive on the point; and that your observations on it are sophistical. You say, that of the three passages he has quoted, these words only, "this is my body," were spoken at the institution; all the rest were spoken on another occasion, at least a year before the sacrament was instituted. I apprehend you mistake your correspondent, for no intelligent Catholic supposes they were; but that they had allusion to the institution is plain, for upon that occasion, discoursing of the bread of life, our Saviour propounded the doctrine of the real presence, and promised that which he afterwards did give at the institution, his body. If, as I think is pretty clear, you use this by way of inuendo, or insinuation, to induce an inference, that because they were not spoken at the institution, that therefore the force of the words used at the institution (which do not admit of cavil) was weakened, this you know would be a mischievous error, and well calculated to do much harm to ignorant people. Your case of Judas amounts merely to a captious objection, and, if used with a disposition to falsify, or contradict the words of Christ, it would unquestionably be blasphemy. That the case of Judas does not serve your argument, I think I will be able to show. But suppose it to apply, would it not tell with equal force against the Protestant interpretation of the text? for you must admit, that eternal life is promised to whosoever eateth Christ's flesh, which you say means that spiritual nourishment which Christ gives to those who faithfully use that sacrament which he has appointed for them. If you are right in that interpretation, then it follows that it was according to the Protestant belief Judas ate it, yet he perished: and so you founder there. True, you qualify it by saying faithfully use it; but as the words "faithfully use it," do not appear in the text, it may be inferred that they are an addition of your own. If there is any difficulty in the case, the true solution of it is found in the 1st Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians—"Therefore, whosoever shall eat this bread, or drink the chalice of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and of the blood of the Lord—xi. 27. But let a man prove himself; and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of the chalice—28. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord—29. Therefore are there many infirm and weak among you, and many sleep—30." Judas ate unworthily, and thereby incurred judgment. It is in this light a Catholic views the subject, and proves himself, by sincere and humble confession, as prescribed by St. James; and by praying to God for grace to be truly contrite: then, with a lively faith* and an animated hope, receives the bread of life, and avoids judgment. I am, with the sincere desire for your salvation, which charity dictates, your obedient, &c. J. B.

"J. B." need fear no criticism from us, except what is intended to bring out the truth.

Our Enniscorthy correspondent appeared to us to speak of the discourse in John vi. as if delivered at the institution of the Lord's Supper. "J. B." is probably right in supposing that this was a mere inadvertence or oversight; but it was not the less our duty, when we published that letter, to point out this oversight, because, if we had not done so, some of our readers might have been led into error by it.

We do not distinguish the time at which that discourse was spoken, "by way of inuendo or insinuation," that the discourse could not have been spoken of the institution: but we use it to prevent any inuendo or insinuation that the discourse must have been spoken of the institution, in order that the question, whether it were so spoken or not, may be considered on its own merits.

"J. B." thinks it "plain" that this discourse was spoken of the sacrament. We have already stated, that the Fathers differed about this question; and how, then, can it be so plain to "J. B."

We must now add, that many of the most learned Roman Catholic divines have publicly maintained, that Christ did not speak of the sacrament in that discourse. Our space is brief; so we mention here, as maintainers of this opinion, only Cardinal Cusanus,† Cardinal Cajetan,‡ and Æneas Sylvius,‖ who was afterwards Pope. We could give a dozen more as high authorities. Now, is it quite plain to "J. B." that he must be right in contradicting all these? Let him remember that the Council of Trent, with the Pope at its head, could not venture to say which opinion was right; how then can "J. B.?" Is it by his "private judgment?"

Our argument was this—Christ said in that discourse "IF ANY MAN eat of this bread he shall live for ever." Judas ate the bread which Christ blessed at his last supper, and that very night Judas perished for ever. The question is, did Judas eat that bread of which Christ said if any man eat of this bread HE SHALL LIVE FOR EVER?" We say, Judas did not eat of the bread of which Christ spoke these words: "J. B." says Judas did eat of it: which of us contradicts the words of Christ?

"J. B." thinks that we want to alter Christ's words—"If any man eat of this bread," and that we want to have it thus, "if any man faithfully eat of it," whereas he thinks it should be, "if any man worthily eat of it," as if "faithfully" and "worthily" were not pretty much the same in this case. But "J. B." mistakes us much. We do not want to put "faithfully" or "worthily," or any other word, into the words of Christ. It is "J. B." who, by his own confession, wants to add to the words of Christ, by putting in the word "worthily" where Christ did not put it. We take the words of Christ, "if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever." We take the words as they are; we take Christ's own words, that he himself was that bread of life." We believe that every one who feeds on Christ as the bread of life, every one without exception, shall live for ever. Is not this to take Christ's words as they are, and to believe them? But "J. B." with his present opinions cannot do this. Christ says, "if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever." "Oh, no!" ("J. B." must say), for many eat and perish: this is not true of ANY man, but only those who eat worthily; and so, to make it true, we must say, 'if any man eat worthily he shall live for ever.'" This proves that "J. B." mistakes of what bread Christ spoke, since he is driven to alter Christ's speech; and that we do not mistake, since we take Christ's words as they are. We repeat again, that when the discourse is of feeding on Christ himself as the bread of life, we do not want to put in "faithfully," or "worthily" or anything else; but when we speak of receiving the sacrament of the body and blood of the soul, then indeed we put in the word "worthily" or "faithfully," as St. Paul has taught us to do. For there, indeed, the distinction is necessary; for they only who eat it worthily do feed on Christ, the bread of life.

This, too, is worthy of notice, that our Saviour was contrasting the bread which he would give with the bread which Moses gave the Israelites from heaven—that is the manna. Our Saviour says that they that ate Moses's bread died, but if any man eat of Christ's bread, "he shall live for ever." This is the contrast, that any man who eats of this bread cannot die; and this cannot be said of the bread in the sacrament. Is this a Protestant argument? We care not; we learned it from Cardinal Cajetan, one of the greatest divines of the Roman Church! (upon John vi., tom. 3. Paris ed., 1543.)

We conclude with a passage from St. Augustine's sermon on the xcviii. Psalm (xcix., Protestant version), to which we entreat "J. B.'s" earnest attention. St. Augustine quotes the 3rd verse of the discourse in John vi.—"It is the Spirit that quickeneth (or maketh alive), but the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I have spoken unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." And St. Augustine thus explains them—"Understand spiritually what I have said, ye are not to eat this body which ye see; nor to drink that blood which they who crucify me shall pour forth. I have commended unto you a certain mystery; spiritually understood, it will quicken."

We shall be happy to hear from "J. B." again. But we advise him to keep in mind, while he is writing, that what he takes to be rank Protestantism in our pages, we may be able to show has been maintained, not only by eminent Fathers, but by the most learned cardinals and most famous divines in the Roman Catholic Church.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR APRIL.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

FROM the very fine seed-time we have lately had, it must be the farmer's own fault if his grain and potato crops are not in a very forward condition.

Oats.—The sooner in the month the breadth intended for oats is sown the better.

Barley sowing should be completed as early in the month as possible. If intended to be laid down with clover and grass seeds, the surface should be rendered as fine as possible, by the liberal use of both harrows and rollers. Immediately after sowing the barley, then sow the small seeds, bush harrow, and roll.

Flax, if not already sown, should now be committed to the earth without delay. The soil best adapted for this crop, is a rich, deep loam. The best fibre is produced after a lea corn crop, or after corn preceded by a manured crop. The land should be well pulverized and thoroughly clean; the surface rendered as fine as possible by repeated harrowings and rollings. Roll before sowing; sow the seed broadcast, by the hand, or by a drilling-machine, from which the coulters must be removed, and cover with a light harrow, drawn first one way and then across, and finish with the roller. Three and a half bushels of clean seed will sow the Irish acre; but it is better to sow too thick than too thin; the seed should be well sifted and cleaned of all foreign seed, which will otherwise vegetate, and give great trouble in weeding. There is no better crop to sow clover and grass seeds with than flax, as far as the after crop is concerned; but the manufacturers complain that the bottom part of the flax stems is much injured by clover, when luxuriant. They do not object so much to sowing carrots, in drills, which, after the flax is pulled, may be thinned and hoed.

Spring Vetches.—A breadth of land, sufficient for consumption in July or August, should now be sown. In small establishments, it would be well to make two sowings, one at the beginning and the other about the middle of the month.

Potato planting should now be finished off without delay; as a general rule, the tubers should be planted before they begin to shoot out. Those previously planted will soon be coming up, and, if planted in drills, no time should be lost in harrowing down the tops of the drills lightly, otherwise they will come out at the sides; and on their first appearance, mould them up with the double mould-board plough, which will protect them from frost, which invariably kills all the exposed potato shoots. If planted in ridges, or "lazy-beds," they should be lightly pointed over, to break the winter's crust and destroy the annual weeds, and, when just coming over the surface, a little fine earth should be raised from the furrows, and scattered over the beds, to protect the young stalks from frost.

Carrots and Parsnips.—No time should now be lost in finishing off the intended breadths of carrots and parsnips. When sown so late as the present, the seeds should be prepared beforehand, by mixing them with damp sand, and keeping them in a dark, warm place; after the first three or four days, they should be turned over daily, and, if getting dry, sprinkle the mass with a little tepid water. They should be sown as soon as they exhibit symptoms of vegetating, which will vary according to the temperature they are kept in; the period may be hastened by putting the seeds, mixed as above, in the bottom of a cucumber or melon frame, or plunging them, enclosed in a bag, in a warm dung-heap; they should be examined daily. The carrot seeds should be rubbed between the hands, to remove the little awns by which they adhere to each other, and insure their even distribution when sowing.

Preparation for Green Crops.—The preparations for the general class of green crops—such as mangel-wurzel, Swedes and other turnips, carrots, parsnips, cabbages, &c.—being the same; and presuming that the previous instructions have been attended to and followed up, as to the deep cultivation of the land by the spade or plough, during the autumn and winter, with the subsequent harrowings, cross-ploughings, and cleansings, to bring the land into a perfectly fine tilth, it is then in a proper state to receive the manure. Some open the drills first, at such distances apart as to receive the cart-wheels—that is, in every breadth of five drills; the horse walks in the centre, and the two wheels travel in the drills at either side, and the two outside drills are vacant as the carts pass along; the manure is dropped at regular distances, a man assisting to drag it out of the cart with an iron drag, made like a dung fork or grape, with the tines crooked or bent. To facilitate this operation the carts are furnished with a tilting bar, so that they be thrown up in front to the bottom, forming an inclined plane, at various angles. Men or women follow, to spread the manure equally in the drills, which are immediately closed by the double mould-board plough. This may be done equally well by the single mould-board plough, but it takes double the time. The drills are then rolled down, and the seeds sown and again rolled. Thus the work goes on very regularly and expeditiously; but this mode is open to some objections: one is, that the bottoms of the drills in which the horse and cart-wheels travel, are very much beaten, and a sort of pan or impenetrable floor formed, which, though not much affecting the potato or turnip crop, is highly objectionable with tap-rooted plants, such as mangels, carrots, parsnips, or chicory; another objection is, that from the carts turning and crossing the drills, they are much broken down and obliterated, and the manure, from this cause alone, cannot be evenly covered, and it is altogether a slovenly method.

That practised by others, and which is free from those objections, is to mark the field all over with the plough, both lengthways and across, at parallel distances of one statute perch apart, thus forming squares of a perch each; the manure is then drawn out and dropped in small, regular-sized heaps on the points where the lines intersect each other, leaving the first breadth of a perch at the side where the plough is to open the drills undunged. Men and women are then placed along the line at regular intervals, counting off to each man so many heaps, whose duty will be to take the manure with a three-pronged fork, if it be long farm-yard manure, or with a shovel, if it be compost or short manure, and deposit it evenly in the drills as the plough passes along opening them. Another plough follows, splitting the ridge and covering the manure. Each man should have his portion finished before the plough returns, opening another drill: thus there will be no necessity for the men crossing or walking on the undunged drills. The drills are then rolled down, sown, and again rolled. If the field be long, say over 20 or 30 perches, it will be necessary to lay off the centre space between every 6 or 8 perches as a cart-track, throwing off 3 or 4 lines at each side, from which the carts diverge to drop the manure. This beaten track must afterwards be ploughed up and harrowed. This method has much to recommend it. The permeability of the bottoms of the drills is much better preserved, the tap-rooted plants meet with no obstructions, the manure is laid on evenly, and the quantity per acre exactly regulated, and the men have their portions lotted out with the greatest regularity. Hence, there is no complaining, no confusion, but everything goes on with regularity and despatch.

Mangel-wurzel should be sown by the end of this or early next month. The seeds should be steeped for 48 hours before sowing, then set to drain, and dried with wood or other ashes. To produce heavy crops they require a very liberal supply of manure. The seeds should be dibbled in two or three in each hole, at 15 to 18 inches apart, in good soils and sheltered situations, and at 12 to 15 inches apart in soils not so good or sheltered, getting from 1½ to 2 inches cover; the drills must not be less than from 28 to 30 inches apart.

Sugar Beet may be sown, and in every way managed similarly to mangel wurzel.

Swede Turnip should be sown about the same time as the mangel. They do not require so much manure; but from 1½ to 2 cwt. of guano assists materially in forcing an early braird and into rough leaf, out of the reach of the fly. Sow with the drill-machine, and, when fit for thinning, hoe and single them out to the same distance apart as recommended for mangel.

Kohl-rabi should now be sown, in beds of rich, clean, and well-pulverized soil, to be ready for transplanting out in drills in May and June.

Chicory may be sown between the middle of the month and the 10th May; the land prepared in the same way as for carrots or parsnips, in raised drills, from 20 to 24 inches apart.

Cabbages.—Sow a successional breadth of cabbage seed, for planting out by the end of May or early in June, and finish planting out the general crop without delay.

Lucerne.—Sow by the middle of the month. The land should be deeply tilled, clean, and rich. Sow in rows 12 inches apart: 16 or 18 lbs. of seed will sow the Irish acre.

Saintfoin.—The soil for saintfoin should be dry and rich; the barley ground may be very profitably laid down with this crop. Sow broadcast about 4½ bushels to the Irish acre; harrow it well with a fine harrow, and roll.

Wheat.—The winter-sown wheats, if intended for laying down with clover and grass seeds, should, if sown broadcast, be now well harrowed, rolled, the small seeds sown, bush-harrowed, and rolled; if the wheat has been drilled, it should be hand or horse hoed, to destroy weeds, levelled with the drill-harrow, the seeds sown, bush-harrowed, and rolled. If the plant be too luxuriant eat it down with sheep, or mow it, then roll and harrow; but this must not be done after the seed-stems or culms begin to shoot, which would injure the produce.

Beans and Peas, if sown in rows, should now be hand or horse hoed between.

Fallows should get a good harrowing and cross-ploughing some time in the month.

Paring and Burning, where practised or requisite, should be attended to closely. Lands subject to this process yield excellent crops of potatoes, turnips, rape, &c., and good after crops of corn, after which they should get a full dressing of putrescent manure for a green crop.

Artificial Manures.—Wheat, oats, barley, and meadow lands may now be top-dressed with guano, superphosphate of lime, gypsum, salt and lime, some time mixed in compost, soot, &c., choosing wet weather for the purpose.

Meadows, if not done before, should be cleaned and rolled without delay, removing everything that may interfere with the scythe, and dig up dockings in wet weather.

The Dairy.—It will now be necessary to make up the full complement of cows for the dairy, by a careful selection of in-calvers; as they drop their calves, comfortable house-room should be provided, with a moderate supply of roots and good, sweet hay, until the rye, winter vetches, and Italian rye-grass come in. Some rock-salt in their troughs will be useful at this period.

Horned Stock should be carefully attended and well fed: this will tell, after being put to grass, in the development of bone, muscle, and flesh before the end of the season.

Fat Sheep must be kept up by a liberal supply of roots and hay, or they will fall off in condition rapidly.

Ewes, with their lambs, should have a good bite of sweet, succulent herbage, rye, clover, and rye-grass, to enable them to suckle their lambs. If they suffer now from insufficient nutriment, no after care will restore them.

Sows and Litters.—This is a good time for sows to farrow; those expected to do so should be kept confined to their styes, which should be clean, warm, and well ventilated, and be supplied moderately with good, nourishing food; and stores kept in condition by a full supply of food.

Manures.—Attend to the accumulation of manure; turn over, break, and mix former collections; clean out all the offices, yards, &c., and cart the manure to the headlands of such fields as are to be green-cropped; bank it up, and cover well with dry earth, to preserve the ammonia.

MISERIES OF INDOLENCE.—None so little enjoy life and are such burdens to themselves, as those who have nothing to do. The active only have the true relish of life. He who knows not what it is to labour, knows not what it is to enjoy. Recreation is only valuable as it unbends us; the idle know nothing of it. It is exertion that renders rest delightful, and sleep sweet and undisturbed. That the happiness of life depends upon the regular prosecution of some laudable purpose or laudable calling, which engages, helps, and enlivens all our powers, let those bear witness who, after spending years in active usefulness, retire to enjoy themselves.—Jay.

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

9', UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN,

HAVE respectfully to invite the attention of the Clergy and others to the following Editions of Important WORKS, now about to be published, and to suggest the desirableness of their taking advantage of the proposed plan of publication.

I.

REV. THOMAS SCOTT'S COMMENTARY ON THE HOLY BIBLE,

In Six volumes, quarto, price THREE GUINEAS.

This is the only edition that has, or can have, the benefit of the final additions and emendations of the Author. For TEN YEARS he was engaged in revising the work, and not only did the whole of the Critical and Explanatory Notes, with the Practical Reflections and the other important parts of the work, undergo a complete Revision, but upwards of FOUR HUNDRED PAGES OF LETTER-PRESS WERE ADDED, consisting chiefly of important critical remarks.

The price at which it was originally published was EIGHT GUINEAS, subsequently reduced to Six Guineas. The work will be issued to Subscribers only, bound in cloth, at THREE GUINEAS per copy.

Orders for copies must be accompanied with a post-office order for TEN SHILLINGS; the remaining part of the subscription to be paid on the volumes being ready for delivery, which, it is expected, will be during the autumn of the present year.

THE HOPE OF THE CHRISTIAN.

SPRING is the season of hope and promise, when the joyous year has just burst from the bands of winter, and entered on a new course of fruitfulness, and a fresh dispensation of the rich bounties of the God of providence and grace—

> "When the gay troops of woodland choristers begin,
> In joyous thought, to plume the painted wing;
> And try again the long-forgotten strain,
> In music unconfined."

On a bright day, in the early part of April, we had been sauntering through the beautiful gardens at Glasnevin, enjoying, with the songsters of the air, the glad promise of every opening flower and budding tree, and the refreshing shade of new spring leaves, and enjoying, besides, a pleasure in which they, perhaps, could not participate—the mirth and laughter of the little parties of children who played upon the green slopes that lead to its tiny river and rustic bridge. As we left this scene, refreshed and gladdened, we returned by the avenue of stately yew trees, which is one of the ornaments and celebrities of these classic grounds. They are called Addison's Yews, and, in their younger days, gave their shelter to Swift, and Steele, and Parnell, and Addison, when they visited the poet, Tickell, once the proprietor of the place. They are sacred to the memory of departed genius, wit, and fancy, and possess a deep interest to the mind of every reader of national literature. As we traversed this avenue, we came to a boundary wall—a low wall, covered with ivy, and surmounted with lofty iron railings, which divides the paradise of flowers from the city of the dead, and reveals to view the long lines of headstones in a thickly-peopled cemetery. Frequently as we have passed the spot, it ever comes upon us with a fresh surprise, a sudden unexpected change—we will not say, an unwelcome intrusion.

On the present occasion, though neither the time nor the season, nor our own frame of mind, were suitable to the mood of melancholy, but rather to the buoyancy of hope, the view that was opened to us was anything but disagreeable. The place had lately become invested with a new and deep interest in our mind—it contained the earthly remains of a dear Roman Catholic friend; and instead of turning from it with the intuitive distaste with which the child of pleasure and the man of the world turns from the funeral procession that meets him in the streets, and obtrusively tells him, "prepare to meet thy God," or with the pang of despair that wrings the heart of an anxious survivor, as he sees the grave close over the body of an impenitent sinner; we could rather look, with a sober complacency, upon the spot where lay the earthly tabernacle of one whose spirit, we believed to be at rest, and in the bosom of Jesus. Born and educated in the faith of Romanism, and never, perhaps, fully awakened to its errors or deadening tendencies, and too gentle for the field of controversy, her mind shrunk with an instinctive knowledge, or rather, a knowledge imparted by the unerring teaching of the Spirit of God, from placing her dependance upon any but Jesus. She would offer no prayers to saints or angels, nor, under the pretence of venerating, would she worship or adore them; and in her last illness, which overtook her in early life, her declared hope was in Christ crucified, and in him alone; and all her virtues, and her merits, and her ceaseless charities, were, in her eyes, but as filthy rags, sinful and vile, unless as accepted in Jesus.

We immediately left the gay gardens and made our way over to the graveyard, and wandered through its labyrinth of tombs and monuments, till we reached the place underneath which were buried the earthly remains of our departed friend. As we passed along we met at every step the Agnus Dei, the representation of the Lamb of God, and the appropriate motto or legend with which the monumental tablets were surmounted—Requiescat in pace. It was indeed in no spirit of controversy or disputation that the solemn reflection suggested itself to our mind, in the midst of ten thousands of the dead, and standing over the grave of a beloved Roman Catholic friend—what is the peace which our Roman Catholic friends are led to hope for? What is the rest which their church leads them to expect? Can it be that after the Almighty God has forgiven every sin ever committed by us as to the eternal punishment, a temporal punishment yet remains to be inflicted, which the blood of Christ has not washed and cannot wash out, but the prayers and suffrages of the faithful on earth can accomplish the remittance of? And that after the eternal punishment has been done away with, we are to be purified in long suffering, and, like the wandering spirits of the heathen poet Virgil, to be

> "Purged in fires
> "Till all the dregs are drained, and all the rust expires."

Is this the rest and the peace which the Christian church reveals to the departing servants of Christ? Is this the sleeping in Jesus in respect of which the Apostle Paul, in 1 Thess. iv. 12 and 13 (Douay Bible), desires the Thessalonians not to be sorrowful as others? or can this be the blessedness of those whom the voice from heaven (in the Apocalypse of St. John xiv. 13), desired the Evangelist to write of, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. From henceforth now saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labours, for their works follow them." Is purgatory this rest? Or was this the hope of St. Paul, when he says (2 Cor., v. 1), "For we know if our earthly house of this habitation be dissolved, that we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in heaven?" Did Paul expect that on the dissolution of his earthly body, or that of his Corinthian brethren, he or they should be consigned to the fires of purgatory? Was this his confidence, as expressed in the same passage (8th verse), when he says, "But we are confident, and have a good-will to be absent rather from the body, and to be present with the Lord?" Was purgatory the presence of the Lord?

This surely was not the hope held forth by our blessed Lord to the dying thief on the cross, who, a moment before, had joined with the other in railing at him. The expiring thief cried to him, "Lord, remember me when thou shalt come into thy kingdom. And Jesus said to him, Amen, I say to thee, this day thou shalt be with me in Paradise" (Luke, xxiii., 42, 43.) Nor was this the prospect which the first martyr of the church, Stephen, had visibly before his eyes, when, looking up steadfastly to heaven, he saw the glory of God and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, and said, "Behold I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God," and with his expiring accents, he cried, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." There was nothing of purgatory there, nor when Paul was declaring the time of his own dissolution to be at hand, did he take such a miserable dishonouring view of the mercy of God, and the sufficiency of the atoning blood of Christ. He cries, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; as to the rest, there is laid up for me a crown of justice, which the Lord, the just judge, will render me in that day." But, it may be said, Paul was an eminent servant and martyr, and this glorious hope was not the common privilege of the humbler members of the Christian Church. But hear St. Paul himself in the concluding words of the passage—"And not only to me but to them also that love his coming." So that it is a crown of justice which the Christian who loves the Lord's coming is privileged to look for, and not the fires of purgatory or hell. And why? Because the blood of Christ cleanseth FROM ALL SIN (1 John i. 7), and because, as St. Paul says, Romans v. 1, "Being justified therefore by faith, let us have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ;" and in 8th chapter, v. 1, "There is now therefore no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not according to the flesh."

Some of these texts suggested themselves to our mind, or, we confess, our reflections would have been mournful; we never could have thought the doctrine of purgatory anything but a cold consolation to the bereaved friend, and disparaging to the stupendous work of redemption; but having a better hope for our dear, departed friend who fell asleep in Jesus, we could joyfully enter into the spirit of the prayer of thanksgiving which the burial service of the Church of England puts into the mouth of the assembled mourners, when they return thanks to Almighty God, "for that it hath pleased him to deliver this, our dear sister, out of the miseries of this sinful world;" and in another service, when we bless God's holy name for "all his servants departed this life in his faith and fear."

We shall return to this most interesting subject again.

PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD.

WE undertook, in our last number, to show that the practice of praying for the dead, which we admit to have been very early practised in the ancient Church, offered no sufficient ground to support the doctrine now held by the Church of Rome on the subject of purgatory. It is, no doubt, true that the doctrine of purgatory includes the practice of praying for the dead; but it is quite another and different question, whether the ancient practice of prayers for the dead necessarily included or implied the existence of purgatory. To that question we shall now apply ourselves in all sincerity, and, we trust, with an ardent desire to arrive at truth, and lead others into it.

The first question is—for whom were those prayers used in the first three centuries, and what was the character of them? If we find them used for the pious and holy men whose souls, according to the belief of the universal Church, were then in heaven or paradise, such prayers obviously do not imply the existence of purgatory, and we must look for some other object in praying for the dead than a delivery of their souls from a state of suffering in any such place. It may be difficult to assign any one reason as the exclusive foundation of a practice which was not clearly referable to the Holy Scriptures; but several may be assigned, all of which seem to have conspired to foster such prayers, long before the period at which the doctrine of purgatory was generally believed, much less formally adopted by the Church. We shall refer to those reasons presently; but first inquire, whether the prayers of the pious living were, as at present, offered up for the relief or delivery of souls requiring to be cleansed in purgatory by suffering the temporal punishment due to their sins committed in their life, or whether the spirits of the blessed (who never were supposed to pass through purgatory) were also the subject of them. Upon this question there is conclusive and most satisfactory proof in the ancient liturgies of the Church, nearly all of which pray for the holy fathers, and orthodox bishops that are dead, as well as all others who had departed this life in their communion. The Liturgies of Alexandria, of Constantinople, of Theodorus, Nestorius, St. Basil, St. Gregory, and St. Cyril, all pray for the faithful dead, and especially those of the sacerdotal order; while that of the Church of Egypt ascribed to St. Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Cyril of Alexandria, and that of the Church of Constantinople, said to be St. Chrysostom's, include the Holy Fathers, the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, confessors, evangelists, and all the souls of the just who have died in the faith, especially the ever blessed Virgin Mary, St. John the Baptist, St. Stephen the first martyr, &c., &c. Now no one can affirm that praying for any of these and that they were centuries after their deaths in purgatory; and we must look for some other cause for mentioning them in those prayers. To explain this, it will be necessary to state, that, in the early ages, many different opinions were held by holy men, which all conspired to encourage the practice of such prayers, but none of which opinions were ever adopted into the church and do not afford any foundation at the present day for continuing such a practice. First, some believed that all the dead in Christ would revive within the compass of a thousand years, some sooner, others later, according as they had lived better or worse lives on earth, and such persons indulged the hope that, by their prayers, they might hasten the felicity of their friends, and accordingly prayed for their speedy rising in Christ's kingdom. Others supposed that in the general conflagration of the world at the last day, all men should pass through the fire, but the better Christian any one had been, the less he would feel the torment of it, and these prayed for the dead that God would have mercy on them in that day, and not suffer them to be burnt, (not in the fire of purgatory) but in the final conflagration at the end of the world. Others believed that the souls of just persons departed went not straight to heaven, but were reserved in a certain place, where they earnestly expected, and continually wished for their absolute consummation with all the faithful in Christ's kingdom, and these prayed that God would give them ease, repose, and refreshment in the bosom of Abraham, that they might be comforted with the blessed company of the holy angels and the vision of our Saviour Christ, till the so-much-wished-for day of judgment should come. Others might be added, some of them fanciful enough; but as the question is not whether the practice of praying for the dead is either innocent, laudable, or availing, but whether it necessarily involves a belief in such a state of suffering, as purgatory is represented to be, we shall not occupy the time of our readers by a repetition of them. The Church of Rome has, long since, discontinued all such prayers for the saints and martyrs, and substituted prayers and invocations to them in lieu of prayers for them. As an example, we may mention St. Leo, whom we referred to in our last number. In the ancient missals, the church prayed for the soul of St. Leo, which, at a later period, was changed into a prayer to God, by the intercession of St. Leo, in behalf of themselves; thus, by their new doctrine making him an intercessor for us, who, by the old doctrine, was supposed to need our prayers to intercede for him. Will any one say that St. Leo the Great was in purgatory during the former period, and that it was only on his escape from thence that he became an intercessor? If not, the conclusion is plain, that praying for the dead, according to the notions of the ancient fathers, did not imply the existence of any such place as purgatory. And, however ancient such practices may have been, they, so far at least, must be admitted to be also antiquated and obsolete, according to the modern doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome. Those who follow the views of Dr. Newman will, doubtless, say, that the true doctrine of purgatory was not then developed—but those who, in a more orthodox manner, base their creed on primitive traditions, alleged to have been handed down from the times of the apostles themselves, will be obliged to look for some better proof of an universal belief in purgatory, in primitive times, than the practice of praying for the sainted dead in the second and third centuries. We believe that some few instances may be found in the writings of the early fathers, which afford some reason to think that they hoped some good might even be done to departed sinners by the prayers and oblations of the survivors; but, they are generally put forward rather argumentatively and as expressing a pious hope (which some even extended to those suffering the pains of hell), than as a settled tenet or doctrine of the Catholic Church, that such prayers did avail to relieving the departed from suffering, much less to relieving or removing them from such a place as the purgatory now received in the Church of Rome.* They appear to have amounted at most to prayers, that God would forgive them their sins, accompanied by the hope that they might impart some consolation and comfort to them, small though it might be; and St. Gregory himself (who at a later period gave countenance to the doctrine of purgatorial fire, as we have already stated, and who did not die till A.D. 604), teaches expressly that "this is to be believed possible only so far as little (nay the least) sins, such as constant idle speaking, immoderate laughter, or too great anxiety about private affairs, or in non-essential matters, the error of ignorance."† If prayers or masses for the dead were now supposed to go no further than the remission of such sins as those, we do not conceive any great confidence would be placed in them, nor any sufficient inducement to purchase these priestly offices at so large a sacrifice as is often made to obtain them. Were we to venture a speculation upon a subject so difficult as that of tracing the origin and progress of what we deem a metaphysical and theological error, we should, perhaps, say, that the practice of commemorating or praying for the faithful dead, in the course of time, led pious men into praying for sinners also, in the hope, rather than the belief, that some sins might possibly be remitted after death, and that at last by degrees the notion of purgatory arose; so that it would be more correct to say the doctrine of purgatory arose out of the practice of praying for the dead, than that prayers for the dead were founded on or originated out of the doctrine of purgatory. We do not find any of the Fathers of the first four centuries asserting that there is such a place as purgatory, much less stating that they possessed any tradition as to it not to be found in the written Word of God; and we beg the intelligent reader to observe, that we do not contend that the question is to be decided by the private opinions of the Fathers, or any of them, but that we refer to the Fathers merely as faithworthy witnesses of high character, of what was held and believed in their times or those preceding them. Where they refer to any tradition, we are willing to credit that such a tradition then prevailed, but their mere reasonings or opinions we must be allowed to take, just as Cardinal Bellarmine and other Roman Catholic writers take them, as the reasonings and opinions of good and learned but fallible men, who not unfrequently differed considerably from one another, more especially in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, to which, in the earliest ages they were constantly, if not exclusively, recurring as an authority. An instructive example may be found in the dialogues of St. Gregory the Great, already referred to, in which he bases his defence of the doctrine of purgatory not on ancient tradition, but on a construction of the passage in Matt., xii., 31, 32, wherein it is said that blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven either in this world, nor in the world to come—from which he deduces (we think erroneously), that there are some lighter sins which may be forgiven in the world to come. Had he known of an universal tradition handed down from the Apostles, is it possible that he could have omitted to refer to it as a well-established ancient doctrine, instead of trying to account for it as a new discovery, only disclosed then because the world was near its close?

* Thus St. Cyril, of Jerusalem, says—"I know there are many who say, what good can it do to a soul which is departed out of this life, whether with sins or without them, to be remembered in this sacrifice? But tell me, I pray you, if a king had sent into banishment some persons that had offended him, and their friends should present him with a crown of great price to appease his anger, might not the king, on that account, show some favour to the guilty persons? So do we address our prayers to God for them who are dead, though they were sinners, not by presenting to him a crown, but by offering up to him Christ, who was sacrificed for our sins, propitiating him who is so merciful for them and for us." St. Cyril died A.D. 386.—Catechesis Mystagog V. p. 228. Paris.

"Ex quibus sententiis constat quia qualis hinc quisque egreditur talis in judicio præsentatur. Sed tamen de quibusdam levibus culpis esse ante judicium purgatorius ignis credendus est, pro eo quod veritas dicit, quia si quis in Sancto Spiritu blasphemiam dixerit, neque in hoc seculo remittetur ei, neque in futuro. In qua sententia datur intelligi, quasdam culpas in hoc seculo, quasdam vero in futuro posse laxari. Quod enim de una negatur, consequens intellectus patet, quia de quibusdam conceditur. Sed tamen ut prædixi, hoc de parvis minimisque peccatis fieri posse credendum est, sicut est, otiosus sermo, immoderatus risus, vel peccatum curæ rei familiaris, quæ vix sine culpa vel ab ipsis agitur, qui culpam qualiter declinare debeant sciunt; aut in non gravibus rebus error ignorantiæ, quæ cuncta etiam post mortem gravant si adhuc in hac vita positis minime fuerint relaxata. Hoc tamen sciendum est, quia illic saltem de minimis nihil quisque purgationis obtinebit nisi bonis hoc actibus in hac adhuc vita positus ut illic obtineat, promereatur."

HINTS TO THE WISE.

"Our fathers believed it, our priests believe it, a great many of our neighbours believe it, and therefore, if I believe it, I cannot be far astray."

This is a very common mode of thinking and speaking, but undeserving of the name of argument. It strikes at the root of all inquiry after truth. The beaten track is followed because it is beaten, though there might be many shorter and safer pathways up the mountain or across the moorland. The man enters the emigrant vessel because he sees others of his countrymen enter it, and they go in because they see him going in; and thus, without examining whether or not their ship be sea-worthy, they huddle in, not knowing whether her timbers are water-tight or unsound. But surely this is not the course that prudence would point out. The careful, diligent, active man, who is about to bring his family on board, and has a concern for the safety of his own life, will naturally look at the ship outside and examine her within, and get every information he can as to her character, ascertain if the captain be skilful and supplied with the best charts, and all other means necessary to secure a safe voyage, if it were for no other purpose than merely to satisfy his own mind that all is right. But he that takes his berth because others do so, and, when a storm is near, feels no anxiety, because his captain is on board, and many others have confided their lives to his supposed skill as well as he, should well consider that others may have embarked as rashly as himself, and that the captain having become fool-hardy from usage to the sea, may have run great risks for the sake of gain, or (as human passions lead men on to great blindness) for the sake of victory, should there happen to be a rivalry between his and another ship.

If men had shut their eyes on all inquiry after human knowledge, as too many Catholic laymen, we fear, have done in the case of Divine knowledge, in what a wretched plight would our world be placed? The darkness of the middle ages would be ten-fold thicker, on account of the successive incrustations of ignorance; for it is a truism, that in nature there is nothing stationary. We must either progress or retrograde. Where now would be the thousands of improvements in almost every science? It were endless to name them. The noble science of astronomy will be a sufficient illustration. For many centuries the Ptolemaic system was in catholic estimation: if men had reasoned respecting this, or rather surrendered their rights and powers of reason, as too many Roman Catholics do respecting the science of theology, where would our present knowledge of the greatness of God's universe be? Let the persecutors of Galileo answer.

But to try the matter in a simple case. Suppose a number of people to be on an island, detached from all communication with the rest of the world, and that an opinion prevailed among them that they were the only people in the earth. Suppose this opinion handed down from father to son, and in no danger of being corrupted by reason of a law, and that a stringent one, that no boat or ship should be built; so that the inhabitants are unable to put off from their island to discover whether or not there be other nations or other islands more blessed and favoured than their own. In such a case suspicions might arise in the minds of some who found pieces of foreign timber cast upon their shore, but still they must stifle such notions, for the law would tell them, and tradition confirm it, that there is no other land but theirs, and that they must not venture from the shore, or they would be inevitably lost amid the world of waters. Who can doubt that many would believe it, either through a slavish deference to the law, though based on the ignorance of its founders, or from a superstitious fear of drifting away on a shoreless ocean. And though some daring Columbus now and then should succeed in evading the coast-guard, and reach some glorious continent over the waves, no doubt still the authorities would try to persuade the poor people that such have miserably perished, and that their letters, conveyed back to their ignorant friends, were mere cheats and tricks of enemies wishing to allure some of the simple people to a similar fate. Is there nothing like this among ourselves? Let those who prefer light, and knowledge, and freedom, to darkness, ignorance, and slavery, answer.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD—NO. IV.

WELL, Father John did not curse Jem after all; at least, not this time. Maybe Father John thought it hard to take the bit out of the mouths of Jem's children; or maybe there were too many to be cursed; or maybe Father John had read the first number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, and saw what came of the priest cursing the miller.

But Pat and Jem did not know yet that the curse was not going to be now, and so it happened, the next day, when they sat down to dinner under the thorn bush, they began to talk of it.

"And what made him so angry, entirely?" said Pat. "Sure we only wanted him to set us right; and if he would only take the trouble to teach us what is right, sure we would be willing to be taught by him, and give him every respect. And sure if we just went on as we used to do, and never offered to learn anything at all about God, or the Bible, or the Saviour of sinners, we would never get a cross word from him no more than some of the boys that thinks no more about religion than the horses and cows does; and yet Father John has nothing but a pleasant word for them; and I never see him get cross, entirely, till it's the Bible that's in it; and what's the reason he was so angry?"

"Indeed," said Jem, "that's what I'm thinking of all day; and there's something in it that's not right; for ask him what I will out of the Bible to get him to explain it to me, or set me right, its not about that thing he'll speak in his answer at all; just as if he did'nt care how far I went astray in it: but it's always the one answer he has, 'it's reading the Bible you are,' says he; that's his cry; as if the very name of it angered him so that he could not teach us anything out of it at all."

"And maybe that's just near the truth," said Pat. "Maybe it's little he knows it himself, and he's afraid to take on him to teach it."

"Well, I'd think that too," said Jem, "only that he gets so angry about it. For when I see that look in his face, when he hears of the Bible, it is'nt like as if he did'nt know it at all himself; its a deal liker as if he knew it too well, and that it would'nt be on his side; and sure its that that would make him angry in earnest, and nothing else that I can see."

By this time Jem was near the end of his dinner, for it was little that day, poor fellow, for he had the wife and eight children at home; and he was just going to peel his last potato, and little enough it was to keep him till night at his work, when his little son, Billy, (just four years old), comes running up the path, with his bright hair blowing in the wind, as pretty as you could see.

"Oh, what will I do with the childer at all, when Father John curses me?" says Jem. And with that Billy runs up to him crying, "Oh, daddy, daddy, gimme a praty."

"Be off out of that, you young thief," says Pat, "and don't be taking the dinner out of your daddy's mouth."

"Easy, Pat," says Jem, "sure if it was the last praty I had in the world, or if I'd never eat a praty again, the darling would get it. Sure its not one of them stones off the field I would be giving him."

And so Jem took Billy on his knee, and gave him the potato.

"Well, if that does'nt beat all," says Pat; "if them is'nt a'most the very words of Jesus Christ himself!"

"What words at all?" said Jem, quite surprised at what Pat said.

"What you said about the stone," said Pat. "Sure I read it in the Douay Bible on Sunday, the purtiest words that ever I saw in the book."

"And what were they at all?" said Jem.

"Why, I haven't just got the words," said Pat, "but I could'nt get the story out of my head, if I tried. Why, Jesus Christ himself was talking to all the people* about him, and teaching them the quietest and plainest way ever you heard. You would think it was the sweetest and quietest voice that ever spoke, to read them words. And says he to all the people that was there, 'is there any one of you at all,' says he, 'standing there, and if one of his little children would come and ask him for a bit of bread, is it a stone that you'd give him?' 'And if the likes of you," says he, "bad as you are, has that heart to your children, what must your Heavenly Father be to them that comes to ask of him? Will he be any worse than you?' Well, when I saw you give the last praty, Jem, to the poor child that I was hunting off you, it just came into my heart; well, now, is that the way our Heavenly Father will do to one of us when we go to ask of him?"

"Well," said Jem, "if them words does'nt teach me more about God than ever I knew before, or ever I learned from Father John; and sure that must be true, surely God could'nt be crosser or worse in himself to me, than the like of me is to the child, but a thousand times better. Sure, if that is not a thought to make us pray to him, and put our trust in him. I would rather hear them words after giving Billy the praty, than all the words that ever I heard. Surely it was the Saviour that knew how to speak to poor people, and to teach their very hearts."

"That's just it, Jem," said Pat; "and its that that is maklog me take to the Bible. Sure, I expected, the first day I read it, to find it all about transubstantiation, and Decalogues, and elephants,† and all kind of hard things that I don't understand, and that every word of it would be disputing and arguefying about everything, the way the Protestants and Catholics is always going on with each other; and that there wouldn't be anything in it, at all, for poor people like me; and, sure enough, I find a great deal that it is'nt easy for me to understand; but here and there I find some of the words of Jesus Christ himself, that's so plain and so loving, and that goes into my heart so easy and so sweet, that I can't help looking out for them words whenever I am reading; and I wouldn't believe Father John, nor the bishop, nor the Pope himself, that them words could do me any harm, or be anything but good for me; for, surely, Jesus Christ was fitter, than the most learned of them all, to give the right sort of teaching for poor and ignorant people; and if Father John would only take and copy some of that teaching out of the Bible, it would be a different way with us."

"Well, now, I'll trust in God, anyway, for the praties," said Jem, "and I am not afraid now of Father John, or his curse, not even when I look at Billy. Sure Father John told me to see what the Bible could do for me; and sure I see it now! to think now that I may go to my Heavenly Father, just the way that Billy came to me; sure that's more comfort than ever I had before this day."

"And its I that am glad that the words did you good, Jem," says Pat; "and that same will make me look for more words like them in the same book; and, indeed, I'm thinking its little we know about the book, till we come to see how it fits us in things like that. Them that is only disputing about it, I'm thinking, knows nothing of the good of it at all. I'm thinking now, there's hardly a thing that we poor people do that we won't find that Jesus Christ had some words to say about that very thing; and sure that's plain teaching for poor people, anyway. Why, as I was sitting at the door last Thursday evening, reading my book, and the children playing about, and they were on for hunting the young chickens in spite of the wife, and there was the old hen majoring about, and looking as big and as grand as if she was fit to pick the heads off them, and the children daren't go near the chickens at all with her; well if I didn't come in the very nick of time to a place in the book (and sure enough I have that marked) where Jesus Christ says he only wants to gather us together just the same as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, to take care of us, the way she does ‡ Sure that's making the very birds teach us, and isn't that plain enough for anybody?"

"Well, Pat," says Jem, "you're teaching me the way to read; and thank you kindly for it; and that's the way I'll read, for I was thinking there was a deal I wasn't fit for, and no wonder, considering how little the clergy ever instructed us about it; and now I'll look for what fits me, and let Father John stop me if he can."

"Well, its that I take to it for," said Pat; "and I suppose there's something in the book for the learned, and something for us, and that everybody may get their share; and though I read a good bit betimes, without coming to what is just for the likes of me, yet when I get it, its worth the looking, and maybe God meant just that same, that we should'nt get it without looking for, no more than anybody will dig these praties without working for them first. And if its his will, that we should get our bit by working for it, and waiting for it, maybe its just the same too with our souls. Anyway I've got enough to make me go on; and, with God's blessing, I'll keep to the reading." And so the bell rung, and Billy ran home, and we must wait till next time.

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES.

THE unavoidable length of the comments that we felt ourselves obliged to make in our last number, upon the important misrepresentations of our views contained in the letter of our respected correspondent, Mr. M. V. Aylmer, prevented us from then adding some observations which we think deserving of serious attention, upon the controverted passage to which he alluded from St. John v. 39, "Search the Scriptures, for you think in them to have life everlasting; and the same are they that giveth testimony of me."

That we may give fair play to Mr. Aylmer, whose letter we inserted at length in our March number, we now extract from his pamphlet the argument contained in it verbatim. After stating that, in objecting to making the Scriptures an ordinary schoolbook, and in expecting the sense rather from the lips of the priest, he does not put the priest above the Scriptures, but is only observing that order between them which exists between the law and the judge; not distrusting the Bible, but merely distrusting his own private interpretation of it, he proceeds thus (p. 15)*:—

"I must now advert to the text so often quoted by our adversaries, from the fifth chapter of St. John, thirty-ninth verse: 'Search the Scriptures, for you think in them to have life everlasting; and the same are they that giveth testimony of me.'

"This is a chapter of the New Testament, which, I assume from the frequent quotation of the thirty-ninth verse, is familiar to the minds of all Protestants; yet there are few parts of the Scriptures, probably, which Christian readers in general are less apt to apply to its proper use and signification. Take and read it from the first to the last verse—mark, learn, inwardly digest it—and tell me in the sincerity of your inmost souls, has not the whole discourse reference exclusively to the Jews, to whom it was specially addressed by our Saviour on one of their festival days, when he went up to Jerusalem? Moreover, 'the Scriptures' therein alluded to, could have been but the Old Testament, which was then alone extant.

"This very Gospel of St. John was not written for considerably upwards of half a century after our Lord's Ascension. St. Matthew wrote about six years after; St. Mark, ten years; St. Luke, twenty-four years; the Acts of the Apostles run over a period, and give an account of the Church, for the space of thirty years. The Apocalypse was written in the Island of Patmos, where St. John was in banishment, by order of the Emperor Domitian, about sixty-four years after our Saviour's time. The various Epistles of St. Paul were written at different periods, all subsequent to our Lord's time, as well as to distinct and different people—to the Romans, to the Corinthians, &c., &c. That text, therefore, 'Search the Scriptures,' has as much reference to the New Testament, which is the better portion of the Bible—in fact, the Christian dispensation—as it could be made to have to the telescope and the wondrous arrangements of the planetary system.

"The Jews were in the habit of reading their Testament, and were referred to it simply by our Lord for the testimony or proof of his divine mission, which it abundantly contained; that is obviously the true intent and meaning of the passage. To say by it that our Redeemer intended every man, woman, and child, in after time, to read and expound the Scriptures is, in my humble judgment, as preposterous from the context, as to insist we are invited, like Peter, to come to Christ upon the waters, as a manifestation of our faith in him (St. Matt. xiv. 28, 29). I challenge any biblical commentator in the United Kingdom to put any other meaning or interpretation on this fifth chapter of St. John, thirty-ninth verse, than that which I have explained; but, leaving controversy aside, your text is replete with spiritual life and instruction. Let us take care in what spirit, and with what dispositions we read and search the Scriptures. The Jews, to whom this sentence was tauntingly addressed by our Saviour, were everlastingly searching the Scriptures, thinking in them to have life eternal; but, alas! they found not the testimony of Him who is 'the way, and the truth, and the life.'—St. John xiv. 6. 'He came unto his own, and his own received him not.'"—St. John i. 11.

The text, John v. 39, can be shown, Mr. Aylmer says, in two ways, not to bear on the question in debate. For, first, it may be translated, "Ye search the Scriptures," and then it is wholly inapplicable; or, secondly, admitting it to be a command, "Search the Scriptures," yet it is quite as satisfactorily disposed of by the consideration that it was addressed exclusively to Jews, and had respect to the Old Testament, and consequently "has as much reference to the New Testament and the Christian dispensation, as it could be made to have to the telescope and the wondrous arrangements of the planetary system." First, then, let us suppose the right rendering to be, "Ye search the Scriptures"—does it follow from this that the text is wholly inapplicable to the question in hand? Before we can conclude this, we must first decide whether our Lord meant to speak of this Bible-reading of the Jews with approbation or disapprobation. If he spoke of it with approbation, as a right thing, then it is hard to see why we should not follow their example. Will it be said that he disapproved of the practice? Let us see what sense we can make of the text on this supposition. "Ye search the Scriptures, for you think in them to have life everlasting;" but I do not approve of your doing so, and I would not have my disciples imitate you, and the reason is, that "it is these same Scriptures that give testimony of me." A very singular reason this to give why their searching the Scriptures was not a thing to be commended or imitated! Perhaps, however, the second mode of getting rid of the text may be more successful. The text had reference to the Jews; therefore, it can have no reference to Christians. What we have already said is sufficient to show the weakness of this inference. If the thing spoken of were part of that ceremonial law which Christ came to abolish, the conclusion might be less objectionable. But if it be of a moral nature—and such, unquestionably, reading the Scriptures is—then we would infer exactly the contrary of that inferred by Mr. Aylmer. We see in it a duty incumbent on the members of God's Church at all times; we see in it a principle of the Divine administration. The Jews were commanded, in Deut. xi. 18—"Lay up these my words in your hearts and minds, and hang them for a sign on your hands, and place them between your eyes. Teach your children that they may meditate on them, when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest on the way, and when thou liest down, and risest up." This command was constantly obeyed by God's faithful servants under the first dispensation. Thus David, in the 118th Psalm, says—"O how I love thy law, O Lord! it is my meditation all the day. Through thy commandment thou hast made me wiser than my enemies; for it is ever with me. I have understood more than all my teachers; because thy testimonies are my meditation." The Scriptures were not intrusted to the priests, to receive from their mouths an infallibly true interpretation, and by them to be given to the people, or to be withheld from them, at their discretion. No—they were intrusted to the people at large; and St. Paul reckons this among their chief privileges. He says, Rom. iii., 1, 2, "What advantage, then, hath the Jew, or what is the profit of circumcision? Much, every way. First, indeed, because the words of God were committed to them." But is it not written in Malachi ii., 7, "For the lips of the priest shall keep knowledge, and they shall seek the law at his mouth; because he is the angel (or messenger) of the Lord of Hosts?" Certainly—such was the duty of the priests; but the very next verse tells us how they discharged it: "But you have departed out of the way, and have caused many to stumble at the law; you have made void the covenant of Levi, saith the Lord of Hosts." And Jeremiah ii., 8, testifies to the same thing: "The priests did not say—Where is the Lord? and they that held the law knew me not, and the pastors transgressed against me, and the prophets prophesied in Baal, and followed idols."—Douay version. And, if such was the case with the Jewish priests, is it not to be feared that the same neglect of their duty and unfaithfulness to their trust, and perversion of God's law, may find place sometimes among Christian priests also? Indeed, the case of the Jews tells strongly against the Romish theory in many ways.

That theory, if it were true, would imply a complete change in the principles of the Divine administration, in passing from the Jewish to the Christian dispensation. The Scriptures, formerly free to all, would be so no longer; but would be put into the hands of the priests, that they might grant or refuse the use of them at their pleasure. The right and the duty of meditating on them, and seeking, by the exercise of their reason, accompanied with prayer to God for the illumination of his Spirit to discover the wondrous things written in his law, would no longer be accorded to the laity; but they would be required to believe that a thing is so, simply because a tribunal, claiming to be infallible, declares it is so. When we consider the freedom and spirituality of the Gospel dispensation, such a change as this will appear the more strange and inexplicable. And it is impossible to believe that such a change would have been introduced without being formally and distinctly notified. We shall anxiously look for Mr. Aylmer's views on this subject, but think we may safely challenge the priests of the Church of Rome to produce any such notification. The contrary is apparent on almost every page of the New Testament. The Scriptures were addressed to all, and were to be read by all. St. Paul says (1 Thess. v., 27), "I charge you by the Lord, that this epistle be read to all the holy brethren." There are constant appeals to men's reason and judgment. The Bereans are commended for searching the Scriptures to see whether what the Apostles alleged from them was correct, and their reasoning valid. But it is quite unnecessary to multiply proofs of this. We shall rather notice a text frequently adduced by Roman Catholics as a set-off against the preceding authorities. In 2 Peter, iii. 16, it is written, "in which (St. Paul's Epistles) are certain things hard to be understood, which the unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction." St. Peter is supposed here to condemn the indiscriminate reading of the Scriptures; but he only condems those who wrest them to their own destruction. The preached word was liable to be wrested and abused no less than the written word. The preaching of it put the persons unto whom it was preached into a state of trial, and if, through their unbelief or unstableness, or hardness of heart, the result of this trial was unfavourable to them, placing them in a state of greater condemnation, and rendering their case more hopeless than it was before, neither God nor his apostles are to blame for that. Hence we read in 2 Corinthians ii. 15, 16, "For we are the good odour of Christ unto God in them that are saved and in them that perish. To the one indeed the odour of death unto death; but to the others the odour of life unto life." We shall hope to hear from Mr. Aylmer again, as the importance of the whole subject (we do not mean the discussion on the particular text, John v. 39, which we only introduced incidentally in our February number, in making some comments upon the notes to the Douay Bible), cannot be overrated, and we are desirous of knowing all that can be said upon it on both sides. In the meantime, we venture to repeat what we said in our last, "Where God has placed no restrictions, we think man has no right to impose limits or hindrances. The Scriptures were obviously written that they might be read, and if the gospel was preached to the poor, and the poor have souls to besaved, we think it self-evident that the gospel should be as much open to them, if able to read it, as to the most learned layman in the community." At the same time, we equally emphatically repeat Mr. Aylmer's words, "Let us take care in what spirit and with what dispositions we read and search the Scriptures," which we doubt not he will agree with us should be a teachable disposition and the spirit of prayer.

CONVERSION OF THE REV. R. WALL, R.C.C.

We (Clonmel Chronicle) are permitted, on the highest authority, to announce the conversion of the Rev. Richard Wall, late Roman Catholic curate of Seskinan, in this diocese. The reverend gentleman has forwarded the formal resignation of his cure to Dr. Foran, the Roman Catholic bishop of Waterford and Lismore. We have been favoured with a copy of that document—a highly interesting one, remarkable for the amount of Scriptural research displayed by the writer, as well as for its peculiar simplicity and earnestness of style.

"TO THE RIGHT REVEREND DR. FORAN, R.C. BISHOP OF WATERFORD AND LISMORE.

"Tournona, Ballinamult, Parish of Seskinan,
May 5, 1852.

"REVEREND SIR—By reading and meditating on God's Holy Word I have been led to ascertain that the Church of Rome does not direct souls in the way which the Holy Scriptures command, as being the only one that leads to salvation. I, therefore, now resign unto you my mission in the ministry of the Romish Church, which I no longer recognise as the Apostolic Church of Christ.

"Whenever a Roman Catholic clergyman thinks it wise and proper to inquire into the doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome, and when, after due examination and search, he finds them opposed to Scripture, reason, and common sense, and then separates himself from the errors of Rome, he is immediately cried down, and an attempt made to hunt him down by the priests of Rome. The usual cant is, 'He is noloss to us, he is no acquisition to the place he has gone to, he has other motives for changing his religion,' &c., &c. Calumnies, lies, and abuse of every kind are heaped upon him, the public press is enlisted in the attack, and his life is oftentimes in danger from the violence of individuals who become the dupes of a tyrannical priesthood. In like manner the chief priests and rulers of the synagogue cursed, abused, and persecuted the Apostles, and all who embraced the religion of Jesus Christ. But our Saviour says—'Blessed are ye when men shall revile and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you for my sake; rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven, for so they persecuted the prophets that were before you.'—Matthew v. 11, 12.

"Whenever any one presumes to differ from or doubt the doctrines or usages of the Church of Rome she lets loose her thunders, she sends forth her anathemas and excommunications against them. But such violent and summary measures are opposed to all principles of sound legislation, whose first efforts should be to convince the mind and the understanding.

"If the Church of Rome has truth at her side, she should enter the lists of fair argument, and show that what she teaches has been revealed and commanded by the Redeemer, and that she has not substituted her own inventions. But this she cannot do. Hence her usual attempt to fetter the thoughts and stop the mouths of all sincere inquirers after truth by thunder and fury, all signifying nothing.

"Whilst a Roman Catholic clergyman continues in the communion of the Church of Rome, whilst he connives at her open disregard of the Word of God, and the illusions which he witnesses every day, there is not one word said in dispraise of him—there is not the slightest imputation cast upon his character or motives; but when the satellites of Rome see that he abandons their errors, and there is danger of exposure, they then let fly all manner of abuse at him, thinking thereby to weaken the effects of his conversion. During a great part of the time I belonged to the ministry at Rome, I took all her doctrines and decrees (as most Roman Catholics do) as inspired from above. At last I began to entertain some doubts of the divinity of those doctrines, and wished to compare them with the Word of God, to see if they accorded therewith. In order to do this, I read the Scriptures over and over most attentively. It was the Douay Bible I used. I searched to see if they declared anywhere the Church of Rome, her popes, bishops, or priests to be infallible; to see if the Church of Rome was called in the Scriptures the Church of Christ; but the inspired word is silent on all these points. I searched the Scriptures to see if I could find the doctrine of transubstantiation, or the change of the elements of bread and wine into the flesh and blood of Christ, taught therein; but there is not a single text in the whole Bible proving such a change, nor saying that bread and wine, by pronouncing a few latin words, lose their substance or accidents. I sought to find if the doctrine of purgatory was authorized by revelation but so far from the existence of purgatory being proved; by any text in Scripture, the name of purgatory is not mentioned therein.

"I enquired if auricular confession, or confession into the ear of a priest, was anywhere commanded by our Saviour or enjoined by revelation, but could not find such a practice commanded or revealed therein.

"I inquired if the pretended celibacy of the priests of the Church of Rome was commanded by Christ, or revealed in Scripture, but could not find such a command given; but on the contrary, rules for the marriage of bishops and deacons laid down by St. Paul—1 Tim., chap. iii.

"I looked through the Scriptures to see if they sanctioned the worship of images and pictures, as enjoined and practised by the Church of Rome, but I found such worship strictly forbidden by the second commandment.—'Thou shalt not make unto thyself any graven thing,' &c. —Exodus, xx. 45.

"I sought to find if the sacred code anywhere commanded or sanctioned the invocation of saints and angels, as taught by the Church of Rome, but could not find such a practice anywhere revealed, 'as Christ is our only mediator.'—John xiv.

"I inquired if the Scriptures commanded or authorized the Church of Rome to withhold the Word of God from the laity. I found that the Bible, on the contrary, recommends the perusal of the Inspired Volume to all—'That the man of God may be perfect and furnished unto every good work.'—2 Timothy iii. 17.

"I read the Scriptures to see if absence from certain meats was commanded, but could not find any one command; on the contrary, St. Paul says—'Whatsoever is sold in the shambles eat, asking no question for conscience sake'—I Cor., chap xi., v. 25. 'For every creature of God is good, nothing to be rejected that is received with thanksgiving'—St. Paul, 1 Tim. iv. 4. 'For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer'—verse 5.

"I searched the Scriptures to see if offering up masses or the elements of bread and wine for the souls in purgatory or for the living, as Romanists say, was commanded by the Redeemer. So far from the Scriptures authorizing such a practice, it directly prohibits it, 'know. that Christ rising again from the dead dieth now no more, death shall no more have dominion over him.'—St. Paul, Rom. vi. 9.

"In reading over the Word of God, I found justification by faith in Christ Jesus inculcated in numberless passages, which I shall give in full when writing on that question.

"I could nowhere find in the sacred writings the doctrine of supererogation as taught by the Church of Rome. For the Scripture says, 'When you have done all things that are commanded you, say we are unprofitable servants.' —Luke xvii. 10.

"Being satisfied that none of the above Romish doctrines and abuses were contained in the sacred writings (or revealed Word of God), I consulted and read over attentively several controversial works, to see what the ablest advocates of the Church of Rome had to say in her defence. Being now fully convinced of the unscriptural character of the doctrines of the Church of Rome, and that they were the mere inventions of an avaricious and crafty priesthood, I at once resolve to remain no longer within the pale or communion of such a corrupt church—to separate from her errors and abuses —lest I be a partaker of her abominations.

"I request all Roman Catholics, and particularly the Roman Catholic clergy, to read the Word of God, as it is in the Bible, attentively—to compare the practices of the Church of Rome with that sacred Word; and if they don't come to the same conclusion and conviction that I have, provided that they approach the subject with unprejudiced minds, and with dispositions prepared to yield to truth, I am egregiously mistaken.

"Prejudices of long standing are not easily removed without examination and inquiry. Roman Catholics, who are in the habit for a number of years of yielding up their judgments and understanding to the dictation of the priesthood, may think it difficult to leave those blind guides. But let them read the Word of God—let them search the Scriptures, and they will find that the Spirit of Truth will descend upon them, which will conduct them unto the bosom of the One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Protestant Church of Christ, as by divine and human law established in these realms.

"When convinced of the errors of Rome, let them come forward manfully—let them act boldly—let them not be afraid of incurring the displeasure of friends or relations for embracing the religion of Jesus. God will assist them in the holy work—the law of the land will protect them—their temporal concerns will be bettered and improved, as they can devote therein the valuable time that is lost in going to hear masses daily, praying for souls in purgatory, worshipping images and pictures, invoking relics and saints, and such like trash instead of adoring and invoking the Redeemer, who is the only Mediator.

"We must all admit that idolatry is one of the greatest of crimes, for by it the worship due to the Creator is transferred to the creatures.

"On the priests, then, of the Church of Rome, &c., be the guilt of drawing down upon the whole nation the vengeance of Heaven, by inducing them daily at their masses (when they exhibit the elements of bread and wine for the worship of all present) to be guilty of this enormous crime.

"Let Roman Catholics—and you, reverend sir, among the number—exercise their judgments and senses in searching the Scriptures, and they will find what a heap of rubbish the Church of Rome has piled over the Word of God, thereby concealing it from the eyes of the children of the cross, for whose instruction and perfection in every good work it is recommended by St. Paul.

"Earnestly and fervently praying that the God of Truth may open your eyes and the eyes of all Roman Catholics, and make them wise unto salvation, as he most assuredly will if you read his sacred Word,

"I remain, with all good wishes, your humble adviser,

"RICHARD WALL,
"Late Priest of the Church of Rome.

"P.S.—To my many reasons for leaving the Church of Rome, I will add that of your Vicar-General, Doctor Burke, P.P. of Clonmel, declining to 'show reason of the faith that is in him.'—1 Peter iii. 15—when challenged lately by the Rev. D. Foley, of Clonmel, which clearly proves he is unable to defend those errors and superstitions he is practising himself and teaching others."

THE RIVAL ARCHBISHOPS.

WE promised to consider in this paper how Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland were appointed after the Reformation.

The first case that meets us after the reformation is a remarkable one: it is one which drives us to consider what sort of an appointment really makes a man the true Roman Catholic bishop of a See.

In the year 1537 the Irish parliament passed laws which abolished the power which the Pope had been so long gaining by little and little. They made no new law about the appointment of bishops, because, as we showed in our last paper, the old laws were sufficient to keep that from the Pope, if only those old laws were enforced: but they made laws which left the Pope no power or authority in the Irish Church. But no change was made then, or for fifteen years after, in the doctrine of the church, or in its worship.

The bishops of Leinster, Munster, and Connaught seem to have joined in abolishing the power of the Pope. But Primate Cromer and the bishops of Ulster still stood up for the Pope's power against those new laws. Thus things stood, until the year 1543 (that is, for six years). In that year Cromer died. George Dowdall, who had been prior of the monastery of St. John at Ardee, and who, at the time of Cromer's death, was Vicar-general of Armagh, was elected Archbishop by the Dean and Chapter of Armagh. He was consecrated by Staples, Bishop of Meath, and by the other bishops of the provinces of Armagh, the King having issued a mandate to them to do so. This George Dowdall was a strict Roman Catholic in doctrine, and continued so all his life; but he thought that the Pope should not have the appointment to bishoprics in Ireland; and so he willingly accepted the primacy without asking the Pope's leave. We showed, in our last paper, that long before the Reformation, the Pope had often tried to set up bishops of his own making, in opposition to bishops made in Ireland: no wonder that he should try to do so now, when he seemed in danger of losing what he had so long been struggling to grasp. Accordingly, the Pope refused to acknowledge George Dowdall as Archbishop of Armagh, and took upon himself to appoint one Robert Waucop, a Scotchman, as primate of Ireland.

It was at a critical period that this happened. The Pope was just going to hold the Council of Trent; and the Pope was greatly at a loss for archbishops and bishops for the council. It may surprise those who hear such great things of the authority of that council, that at its first meeting in the year 1545, the Pope was only able to get together two archbishops and twenty-two bishops, out of the whole Catholic world; less than the number of bishops at that time in Ireland alone! and for several sessions after, it was little better. Now this seemed so shabby a collection for a general council of the whole Catholic Church, the Pope was glad to get anything to make it look a little larger; so he made Waucop Archbishop of Armagh, and he made another man Archbishop of Upsal, in Sweden, and sent them straight off to the council, so as to make a show of four archbishops, just the number in Ireland! and some of the twenty-two bishops were of a like manufacture.

So Robert Waucop, the Scotchman, was appointed Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland, by the Pope, and was actually acknowledged as such by the general Council of Trent. Now, which was he or George Dowdall the right Archbishop of Armagh, according to the laws of the Catholic Church? And which did the Irish Church, and the Irish people of that time consider and acknowledge as their Archbishop? These are important questions at this time. These are questions which the present Pope's late appointment of Doctor Cullen, by the Pope's sole authority, in opposition to the election of the priests of Armagh, compels us to ask and to consider.

In the first place we have to answer, that the whole Irish Church, the whole Irish clergy, and the whole Irish nation at that time, acknowledged George Dowdall as their Primate, and refused to acknowledge Waucop as having any rightful claim to be Archbishop of Armagh! We are aware that this is a bold and a startling assertion. But we make it deliberately. Who were the men who would have been most likely to acknowledge the archbishop appointed by the Pope? Was it not the bishops of Ulster, who had stood by Cromer in maintaining the Pope's authority, when the Irish parliament abolished it? Yet we see these very same bishops now refused to acknowledge Waucop, whom the Pope had appointed; nay, these very same bishops themselves consecrated George Dowdall, in direct opposition to the Pope. They had wished to preserve the Pope's authority, but now they saw that his claim was too monstrous to be submitted to; they saw that nothing would satisfy him but to reduce the Irish Church to total slavery, and that the time was come when it was necessary to assert her ancient independence. When we see those very men, those very bishops who had held out longest in support of the Pope's authority, even against parliament and the law itself, when we see these very men now actually consecrating Dowdall, we may well suppose that there was no one left in Ireland to acknowledge Waucop as Archbishop of Armagh. And the whole history of the time supports this conclusion. There is no trace in the Irish history of that time that either the Irish Church, or the Irish nation, that any Irish bishops or any Irish clergyman, or any Irish layman, ever acknowledged Robert Waucop as Archbishop of Armagh or Primate of Ireland.

We have never found any such evidence: but if any one can produce any proof that this man was then acknowledged by any in Ireland as Archbishop of Armagh, we of course will consider ourselves bound to publish it in our pages, if sent to us with proper references to the books or documents in which it is to be found.

Will any Roman Catholic now say that Robert Waucop was the rightful Primate of Ireland, and that George Dowdall was not? We believe that no Roman Catholic will say so. We believe that all Roman Catholic writers and historians who have mentioned Dowdall, have spoken of him as being the legitimate primate of Ireland. They must admit, then, that the man chosen at home, nominated by the King, and elected by the chapter, and consecrated by the Irish bishops, was the true and lawful bishop, although the Pope set up another out of his own authority. In other words, they must confess that the Pope had no authority to make Waucop Archbishop of Armagh. They must go further still; they must confess that the infallible tribunal of the Roman Catholic Church, the Pope and the Council of Trent together, did not know who was the true Archbishop of Armagh! that they admitted a man who was not archbishop at all, and set him in the Council of Trent, to make infallible decrees about doctrine! For it is a fact that this Waucop sat in the sessions in which the decrees of original sin, of justification, of the sacraments, were passed. Yet neither the Pope nor the council knew who was the right bishop of a see, or who was entitled to sit in the council and vote on questions of faith! An awkward fact this, about the very construction of an infallible tribunal.

But if any will say that the Pope had authority to make Waucop Archbishop of Armagh, and that Waucop was therefore the right archbishop, and that Dowdall was not, then he must say also that in the beginning of the Reformation, the whole Irish Church, and the whole Irish nation did unanimously and with one accord throw off the legitimate authority of the Pope, by rejecting Waucop and adhering to Dowdall. This is a confession which Irish Roman Catholics have hitherto been unwilling to make: yet they must either make it now, or acknowledge that the Pope had no right to appoint a Primate of Ireland; that he was claiming an authority that he had no right to possess; and that the Irish Church and people did what it was right and lawful for Catholics to do, when they rejected Waucop although appointed by the Pope.

And this brings us to the application of this history to our own times. If an appointment by the Pope himself, and a consecration at Rome by the Pope's authority, did not make Robert Waucop Primate of Ireland, then what makes Dr. Cullen Primate of Ireland now? Is an appointment by the Pope's sole authority, and a consecration at Rome, any better now? Does it give any better title now? Is it anything more binding on the Irish Church and people now than it was then? We entreat our readers to consider this question, whether Dr. Cullen's title now to be Archbishop of Armagh, does not rest on just the same grounds that Robert Waucop's rested on then? If the one be bad, can the other be good?

It is not we that have raised this question; the Pope and Dr. Cullen raised it when Dr. Cullen was put in by the same authority that Waucop was appointed by. What was Pope Pius the IX. about? Had he lost his senses, to try again what had once before so signally failed? Was it wise or safe, in this nineteenth century, to try to ride over the Irish Church and nation in a way that they successfully resisted in the sixteenth? Did he think that Irish independence and Irish nationality were now, at length, so utterly extinguished in the Irish heart, that the hour of his last triumph over her liberties was come? Did he think it safe thus openly to beard the Irish people with the former resistance of their nation, and dare them to it again, in that very see of Armagh, from which the Irish Church and the Irish people rejected Waucop, the Pope's nominee?

If any think that this can be safe at present, we refer them again to the able articles in the Cork Southern Reporter, the leading provincial organ of Irish Roman Catholics. We do respect and feel an honest pride in the true independence and nationality of that paper. We refer especially to its article on the choice of Dr. Cullen by the priests of Dublin; of which it justly says, "nor can we avoid regarding the fact as one ominous of serious mischief, in many ways." Of the real feeling of the Irish priests (not those of Dublin) that article says—"We cling yet to the confidence that Dr. Cullen's Roman notions are repudiated by a large proportion of the Irish Catholic priesthood;" and of the laity, it says—"As to the laity, we are sure that all the intelligent portion of them never will submit to that species of domination that men of Dr. Cullen's stamp would try to establish over them." Should we be very much surprised after this, if we were yet to see, in that influential organ of the Roman Catholic laity, an article on the appointment of Robert Waucop, and the example which the Irish people in that instance have left to their children?

We know of no answer that can be made to this, except that some very ignorant and reckless men have taken upon themselves to deny that Robert Waucop ever was appointed by the Pope, or ever sat in the Council of Trent. They offer no proof in support of their denial, but we can give proof of the fact. The following account is given by the Rev. Charles O'Connor, a man of great learning, and an Irish Roman Catholic priest (Columbanus, No. v., p. 50):—"What was the case of Dr. Dowdall? He was a most zealous Catholic; official to his predecessor, George Cromer; elected by the chapter of Armagh; and consecrated without the knowledge of the Pope, by a mandate from King Henry VIII., directed to Edward Staples, Bishop of Meath, in December 1543. Though he was a man of irreproachable manners and great learning, yet because he consented to be consecrated without a bull, the Pope nominated another to supersede him. This was the celebrated Robert Waucop, who, arriving in Ireland, endeavoured, in vain, to raise a party against Dowdall, and wandered among the Irish chiefs, leading a vagabond life in Ulster for several years. . . . . On Queen Mary's accession he (Dowdall) was recalled and re-established, and though Waucop was appointed by the Pope, and a man of considerable learning, who had assisted at the Council of Trent from the first session in 1545, to the eleventh in 1547, yet was he rejected by the Irish nation! He died at the Jesuit's Convent, in Paris, 1551, and was the first who introduced the order of Jesuits into Ireland."

But we do not rely solely on Dr. O'Connor, who lived so long after. We find the same account in the histories of the times. As, for instance, in Father Paul Sarpi, "Historia del Concilio Tredentino, page 144, second edition, 1629;" a similar account is given of Waucop, by Cardinal Pallavicini, who wrote his history of the Council at the request of the Pope (Hist. Concil Trident, lib. 6, ch. 5, lib. 15, ch. 13), also by Father Orleans, lib. 3, p. 85. Spondanus, another Roman Catholic historian, gives the same account (ad. an. 1546). Dr. Hugh M'Mahon, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, in the year 1728, also mentions Robert Waucop as Archbishop of Armagh, and Archbishop M'Mahon should have known also his predecessors were (Jus Primatiale Armachanum, 1728, p. 7), "and again, Spondanus, at the year 1546 (whom Cardinal Pallavicini cites and follows; Book 6, History of the Council of Trent, ch. 5), speaking of Robert Venantius,* Archbishop of Armagh, who was present at the Council of Trent." Mark here that M'Mahon quotes Spondanus as speaking of Waucop as Archbishop of Armagh, in the year 1546. Now, if we turn to page 19 of the Jus Primatiale, we find the following account:—"Robert Venantius (or Waucop), of whom Father Orleans, of the Society of Jesus, writes, book 3, p. 85, succeeded by the grant of Paul III. to Dowdall, in the See of Armagh, who was present at the Council of Trent, and was acknowledged there by the fathers and declared Primate of this kingdom." . . . Now, observe these dates: Dowdall was made Archbishop of Armagh, in 1543; he continued to hold the See of Armagh until some time after October 20, 1550; he fled then because he would not join in reforming the Roman Catholic doctrine. He was restored again to his archbishoprie in 1553, by Queen Mary, and continued to hold it until he died, in 1558. M'Mahon had already cited Spondanus, as speaking of Waucop as Archbishop of Armagh, in 1546 (page 7); yet here (page 19) he speaks of Waucop as succeeding to Dowdall by the grant of Pope Paul III. Observe this, now, that Pope Paul III. died the 10th of November, 1549 (see Labbe and Cossart, vol. 14, p. 484), and Dowdall was Archbishop in 1558! How, then, did Waucop succeed to Dowdall by the grant of Paul the 3rd? This account of Dr. M'Mahon proves nothing but that he felt how damaging it was to his Church to admit that Waucop was appointed by the Pope, while Dowdall was actually Archbishop of Armagh.

But we have better proof still than even the high Roman Catholic historians that we have quoted. For in the records of the Council of Trent, as they are published by the highest Roman Catholic authorities on the subject, we find Waucop entered as attending the first ten sessions of the council as Archbishop of Armagh—i. e., from 1545 to 1547.

The copy we refer to is the Concilia Generalia by Labbe and Cossart, two French Jesuits, a work of the highest character. (Vol. 14, page 741, &c. Ed. Paris, 1672). In the first four sessions he is entered as "Armachanus;" but in Session 5, and the following, he is entered thus—"The Rev. Lord Robert Waucop, Archbishop of Armagh, a Scotchman." This is in the year 1546. How then did he succeed to Dowdall? We believe that he is entered in the same way in the copy of the councils by Severinus Binius, Archbishop of Cologne, and in all the other large copies. If our readers should look in the small modern editions of the Council of Trent, they will not find Waucop's name, and we think it well to explain how this happens. The Council held ten sessions from 1545 to 1547. It ceased to meet until the year 1551, and continued to sit, at intervals, until 1563. In the first ten sessions, the names of those who sat are entered in the proceedings of each session. In the sessions from 1551 to the end, the names are not given in the proceedings of each session; but one list is given, at the end, of all who sat at the council from 1551 to the end. Now, Waucop did not sit in this latter period, because he died in 1551; his name is not, therefore, in this latter list. Now, the editors of the smaller editions, in order to shorten the proceedings, or perhaps to avoid showing the fewness of the names, have left out the names of the persons present at the first ten sessions, and have only printed the list of those who sat from 1551 to 1563, and thus the name of Waucop does not appear in the list printed by them. But we conceive that we have given abundant proof that he sat during the first ten sessions; and that, therefore, he did not succeed to Dowdall, but was appointed by the Pope, Archbishop of Armagh, during the time that Dowdall was really Bishop of the See, and so the question necessarily arises, "which of them was the true and lawful Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland?"

* The Latin name for Waucop, according to the custom of those times; just as some Irishmen have an English and Irish name now, as Braddin or Fisher, M'Shan or Johnston.

POLITENESS.—Lord Chesterfield, walking along the street one day, met a drunken man of whom he wished to take the wall. "No, no," hiccuped the fellow, "I never give way to a rascal." "I always do," said his lordship, pulling of his hat and bowing as he passed.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith. We must request our Enniscorthy correspondent to comply with the foregoing announcement.

We shall feel particularly obliged to our correspondent, "Amicus," to supply us with his name and address, which shall be treated as strictly confidential. We have heard several complaints of miscarriages of our paper through country post-offices, and are determined to call the attention of the Postmaster-General to the subject, should our paper be similarly intercepted again. Those who have been disappointed by not receiving the LAYMAN in due course, are earnestly requested to communicate, without delay, with Mr. Curry, 9, Upper Sackville-street, on the subject.

Subscriptions are earnestly solicited, which our friends will observe are payable in advance. The amount may be forwarded either in postage stamps or a post-office order, payable to Mr. Wm. Curry, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, MAY, 1852.

THE MIRACLES AT RIMINI, IN ITALY.

WE have, on several occasions, expressed our resolution not to attribute to any Roman Catholics, things which they themselves disclaim and disavow. We have laid down this rule for ourselves, believing, in the first place, that it is our duty, under that law of Christian charity which "hopeth all things" (1 Cor. xiii. 7, Douay Bible); secondly, because we believe that thus alone can discussion (which we seek to promote) be made an instrument of bringing out the truth, rather than a means of exciting men's passions against each other. It is our earnest desire to lead to a calm and dispassionate search after truth, and to avoid anything that can tend to inflame men's passions. We trust that we can safely appeal to our former numbers for the fidelity and sincerity with which we have pursued this course, and we believe that to this is mainly owing the favourable and kind reception which we have met with from our Roman Catholic readers.

We conceive that this course on our part both entitles and enables us to point out to our Roman Catholic readers, the things which are commonly attributed to them by Protestants, and the ground on which those things are attributed to them, in order that Roman Catholics may have an opportunity of disclaiming and repudiating those things, if they do not really believe them. And we trust that the manner in which we deal with the subject, will dispose Roman Catholics to co-operate with us, willingly and earnestly, in clearing themselves of all such things as they do not really believe.

The subject we have to bring before them in this paper, is the miracles attributed of late to certain pictures of the Blessed Virgin in Italy. We take our accounts from documents inserted in "Battersby Catholic Directory," for the year 1851.

One word about this book—the "Catholic Directory." It has an immense circulation among Roman Catholics, especially among Roman Catholic priests: it is supported by their subscriptions. In the number for 1851 (preface), Mr. Battersby calculates on 5,000 numbers being taken by Roman Catholic ecclesiastics in England, Ireland, and Scotland; and 5,000 more by laymen. He says that the publication of the Directory for that year, at the low price of 2s. 6d., was an experiment, to try if he could get this great amount of support for the work upon its own merits, and he intimates, that if he did not get such support, the price must be raised. Now, as the Directory for 1852, equal in size, has been published for the same price (2s. 6d.), we must suppose that Mr. Battersby's experiment was successful, and that he did get the support he expected. This gives great authority to the work. We cannot suppose that 5,000 Roman Catholic clergymen would give their money to circulate what they believed to be false and mischievous to true religion and to the Catholic Church. The authority of the work is further confirmed by what we learn in the title page, that "the order of the masses and vespers for every day," &c., is drawn up "by a Catholic priest, approved of for that purpose;" of course, according to the discipline of the Roman Catholic Church, that priest is "approved of for that purpose," by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, in which diocess the book is published, if not by all the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland. This shows their opinion of the book. We are also sure, that if the Roman Catholic bishops saw in a book so widely circulated by the subscriptions of clergymen, and carrying such authority and influence with it, things mischievous to the church and to religion, or absurd or superstitious in themselves, they would take the trouble to express their opinion to Mr. Battersby, being so zealous as they are to keep from the faithful everything that can be dangerous to faith and morals; and from what we know of Mr. Battersby, we are quite sure that the slightest expression of a wish on the part of the Irish bishops or clergy, would be sufficient to induce him to omit anything that they did not approve, or were not willing to recommend to the people. All this gives considerable weight to whatever is circulated in Battersby's Catholic Directory. We admit all this candidly, however it may seem to make against us.

The document we refer to, is in that part of the Catholic Directory, headed "the Roman Register, (p. 285)." It is as follows:—

"THE MIRACLE AT RIMINI.

"The following highly interesting letter appears in the Catolico, of Genoa:—'During the two days I have spent in this marvellous city, I have only been occupied with the prodigy which, at this moment, agitates all Italy. I have passed my time either in contemplating the blessed image* or in conversing with all classes of persons, in the view of collecting certain and circumstantial details. Yesterday I saw THE MADONNA (that is the picture of the Virgin), whose eyes are ordinarily turned towards heaven, bend them towards the pious multitudes, by whom SHE was surrounded. This took place during the celebration of a mass, where five parishes communicated at once. We cannot precisely say that the look descended so far as the people; only it was very evident that the eyes did move downwards, and that, ceasing to direct themselves towards the vault (ceiling) of the church, they fixed themselves perpendicularly on the wall situated opposite the altar. I remarked, moreover, and many foreign priests observed also, that the physiognomy (countenance) of the Madonna habitually grave and mournful, had taken, during this mass, an expression of joy, as if she had wished to signify that she accepted the homage of all this multitude.'"

We have a few observations to make upon this letter. First, it is written by we do not know who: no name is given to it. Any one who had an object in bringing crowds to pay an offering at this chapel might have written it. Secondly, the miracle appears of a very unsatisfactory nature. The picture, it seems, was painted with the eyes turned up, as if looking at the ceiling. Now, if the picture had looked at the people, and put some expression in its look, the miracle might have had some meaning and some object. All our Saviour's miracles had some deep spiritual meaning; none of them were worked to do honour to the Virgin; but when she wished him to work a miracle, she was desired by him not to interfere. If miracles should be worked now, would it not be for the same purposes that the miracles of Christ were worked? But what sense or meaning there could be in a painted picture that was painted to look at a ceiling, staring at a wall, we are not able to understand; nor do we think it will be easily received by those who are accustomed to consider and study the meaning of the miracles of Christ. And the notion of the picture looking more joyful during the time of mass, is just what any credulous person with an excitable imagination might fancy; and we suppose it will be admitted that there are such persons in the world, and that the anonymous writer of this letter may have been one of them.

The writer goes on to give an account of how two painters, a chemist, a professor of natural philosophy, and a doctor of medicine, (all carefully selected by the Bishop of Rimini), had examined this picture, and believed in the miracle. Now, considering the great profit in money which the priests of a chapel must derive from multitudes of people coming to it, on the faith of a miracle, we are not apt to think that the bishop or persons chosen by him are the most faithworthy persons to judge of the miraculous nature of the alleged miracle. Pious frauds are surely possible; and the most satisfactory proof would be one which plainly rendered them impossible. We are not resolved to disbelieve even such miracles; but before we believe, we do ask for such proof as will oblige a sensible man to believe that the thing is really proved. We are told, indeed, that these judges, so carefully selected by the bishop, "directed themselves to the most minute investigation;" we are told too, some of the particulars of this investigation—namely, that they put the picture in different places, and moved the lights about it into different positions; and all this was thought very satisfactory, for the picture still kept winking its eyes. But we are not told that the picture was taken out of its frame, and any one in the chapel invited to come and look at the back of the canvas and see if there was any contrivance to make the eyes move. Without such an examination as this, we should hardly have thought ourselves justified in believing that it was really miraculous. But it is not even said that the examiners took the picture out of its frame. And this is the more remarkable, as the writer of this letter himself admits that "many imagine" that it is done by a "mechanical contrivance, like a statue with springs;" he argues that there could be no means like this in a picture, and he says that the examiners certified that there was not any such contrivance; but why did they not take the picture out of its frame, and allow any one in the chapel to examine the canvas at the back? Surely no sensible man would believe it to be miraculous, if he were not allowed to do this.

There is, however, some satisfactory evidence in this letter. In page 287, the last paragraph of the letter, we read—"It is true that, up to the present time, the miraculous cures have not been so numerous as some reports have stated; that, with the exception of two or three, I do not know if there have been others verified in such a manner as to leave no doubt. The bishop very prudently considers that he ought not as yet to publish those in regard to which depositions have been collected, because he desires to unite all the proofs by which one could infer with certainty that the diseases were incurable."

Here it is admitted that numbers of reports of miraculous cures by the winking picture were circulated, and that, with the exception of "two or three," those stories were so manifestly false, that there was nothing for it but to admit that they were false. We suspect that this falsehood must have been very plain indeed, when such an admission was made. But we are somewhat at a loss to reconcile this admission with another document given in page 283—"Numberless miracles are constantly taking place among those who crowd around the venerated picture: some are suddenly healed of inveterate maladies admitted to be incurable; the blind recover their sight, the dumb their speech, and paralytics the use of their limbs." Yet the writer, in page 287, admits that all these miracles, except "two or three," were downright lies! And even of those "two or three" he tells us that the bishop "very prudently" (as he says, and in which we entirely agree) considers that he ought not to publish them until he is able to give proof that the alleged diseases were really incurable.

But we have some further information. In that same page (287) we are told that the editor of a paper, called the Armoria, wrote to the Bishop of Rimini for official information, and the bishop's answer is given—"The public testimony of persons of every condition, not only of this village and diocess, but also of several cities of the Pontifical States of Tuscany, of the Lombardo Venetian kingdom, and other places, render worthy of all belief the movement of the eyes of our holy picture of Mary, mother of mercy, a miracle which has not ceased for fifty days up to the present hour. This extraordinary event is verified by a judicial inquiry pursued in my palace, and the documents and proofs of the fact will be published in due time. You must, for the moment, be contented with the universal testimony, and invite those who refuse to admit the miracle, to come here and see it with their eyes, which has been done by many persons who have returned from the place completely convinced."

Now, it strikes us as somewhat strange that the Bishop of Rimini, professing to have in his hands a judicial proof of the fact, should tell the editors of the Armoria that they must, for the moment, be content with the universal testimony. Seeing that one of the documents just before given (p. 283), claims this "universal testimony" for "numberless miracles" worked by the image, and the other document admits that all except "two or three" are clearly false, and that even those two or three it is not safe to publish! is not this most satisfactory evidence on which to believe? But the Bishop of Rimini begs them to be content with it "for the moment." This was in 1850. We have looked with interest to the "Catholic Directory" for 1852 for the "judicial proofs" which the bishop promised should be "published in due time," and we find nothing on the subject. So far as we can find, "the moment" for believing on false reports still continues; the proofs have never yet been published.

Now, can any one believe that if these proofs were really conclusive, they would have been concealed from the public ever since? Would not the persons concerned in the miracle have been only too anxious to publish them? And if it be the fact, as we suppose, that nothing of the kind has ever been published, is it not pretty clear that the object was to get the thing believed upon that public report which is confessed to be false, and to leave it so, upon Napoleon's maxim, that a falsehood once believed is sufficient for its purpose!

Now the question we conclude with is this—Do the Roman Catholics of Ireland believe these stories upon such evidence? Do they put these miracles, and the proof of these miracles, on an equality with the miracles of our Blessed Saviour, and the proofs of those miracles? We are satisfied that our readers will say, they do not. Well, then, can they help acknowledging that these miracles are tricks and impositions? And if so, can they account for the fact, that while these accounts are circulated far and wide among the Irish people in the "Catholic Directory," on the authority of the Bishop of Rimini himself, not one of the bishops or priests of Ireland, by whose subscriptions that "Directory" is circulated (and who are so zealous in preserving the laity from all that is dangerous to their faith and morals in the enlightened and profitable education of the Queen's Colleges), should ever have raised their voices to warn Catholics from believing the delusions which are sought to be spread among them on the authority of the Bishop of Rimini and his confederates.*

Truly the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland are called upon in such a case to vindicate their common sense and judgment from the imputation of believing or submitting to such manifest impostures, &c., and we shall rejoice to hear that they do so.

THE TOUCHSTONE.

A Roman Catholic publication, called the Touchstone, has recently appeared—or, at least, recently attracted notice—to which we wish to call our readers' attention.

The Touchstone is a very important little tract, and one whose design, at least, ought to be approved by every fair-minded Protestant. It is an appeal to Scripture as the "touchstone" by which to try what doctrines are true or false. And Scripture is the one common authority which is acknowledged by both Roman Catholics and Protestants. Now, in all subjects, the only way in which a dispute between any two persons can be settled, is to appeal to some authority which is equally acknowledged by both of them. When, for instance, we are endeavouring to convert a Pagan to Christianity, we would not begin by assuming the truth of the Christian Scriptures, and appealing to them; because this would be to suppose him a Christian already; but we must first prove that there is good reason for his believing that our sacred books contain a true history, from which it will follow that Jesus Christ and his Apostles must have really been from God; and then we may proceed to point out to him what it is that they teach us to believe and to do.

So, also, in any discussion between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant, it would be absurd to begin by assuming that the decisions of the Church of Rome and her traditions and interpretations of Scripture are to be received; because, supposing this were true, it is the very thing which Protestants deny; and if they admitted it, they would be Roman Catholics already, and not Protestants. The appeal, therefore, must be made (as is done in this tract) to the Bible itself, and to that sense of each text which both Roman Catholics and Protestants can agree in acknowledging.

Now, it is usually supposed that the Church of Rome discourages the general study of Scripture, and considers it as likely to lead to dangerous error, except in the hands of learned divines, or under their guidance, and with their interpretations. But the writer of this tract evidently holds another opinion: for it is plain, that in order to make the use of it that this author designed, a man should furnish himself with a Bible, and study it attentively, and especially look to the texts referred to, and the passages in which they occur, and then judge for himself as well as he can, whether they are for or against his religion.

Every one must admit that this is a fair mode of proceeding. But in this Tract, opinions are attributed to Protestants which the generality of them, at least, do not hold; and several of the texts brought forward are understood by every Protestant in a sense very different from that which is here put upon them. It has been thought advisable, therefore, to republish this tract, with its sixty supposed expositions of Protestant doctrine (which we may call sixty mistakes), to each of which we shall furnish replies, in order to explain what it is that Protestants do really hold.

ERRONEOUS EXPOSITIONS OF THE PROTESTANT FAITH, FROM THE "TOUCHSTONE."

Objection 1.—Protestants, in order to justify their new religion, affirm that before their pretended Reformation, "laity and clergy, learned and unlearned, all ages, sects, and degrees of men, women, and children, of whole Christendom, were at once drowned in abominable idolatry, and that for 800 years and more"—Homily of peril of Idolatry approved by the 35th and 39th articles, part 3; and, consequently, they must hold, that for all that space of time, the gates of hell prevailed against the Church of Christ. Their own Bible, in plain and express terms, declares the contrary. St. Matthew, xvi. 18. Upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

Reply.—Protestants do not hold that before the Reformation there were no pure worshippers of God: "that all the laity and clergy, &c.. &c., were at once drowned in abominable idolatry." The Vaudois Church resisted that idolatry.

The meaning of the Homily is that idolatry was generally prevalent; when "children of all ages" are expressly mentioned in the Homily as exposed to this evil, it is plain it could not be meant, that infants were actually practising idolatry.

Protestants do not infer from this passage of St. Matthew, that errors and abuses would never creep into the Christian Church, but that they would not prevail to destroy it. By the "gates of hell," is here meant the power of death; for the word hell is here, and in many places of Scripture, the translation of the original word "hades," which signifies the grave, or place of the departed.

Those who have so misunderstood our Lord's prediction, may correct their mistake by referring to many things written by the Apostles. For example, when Paul was taking his final leave of the elders of Miletus and Ephesus (clergy), he warned them (Acts xx.) "that grievous wolves would, after his departure, enter in among them, not sparing the flock," and also, that "even from among their own selves (the clergy) men would arise, speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them." So that this apostle of our Lord (and it is the same in other parts of the apostolic writings), predicted that grievous error would creep into that church, against which, nevertheless, his Lord declared "the gates of hell" should "not prevail."

Objection 2.—Protestants maintain that for many hundred years before Luther, there was no church upon earth, with which a Christian might lawfully join in communion; that all were notoriously gone astray from the purity of the Gospel; and, consequently, that Christ, who is the way, the truth, and the life (St. John xiv. 6), was not with any church before the Reformation, because they were all gone astray from the way, the truth, and the life. Their own Bible assures us that this could never be. St. Matt., xxviii., 19, 20. "Go teach all nations, and lo. I am with you always, even to the end of the world."

Reply.—Protestants do not maintain this; for it is well known that there have always been faithful worshippers of Christ, who protested against the errors of the Romish Church, and preserved pure the apostolic faith—as the church of the Vaudois, a body of Christians, among the mountains of Piedmont, who never fell into the errors of the Church of Rome.

Objection 3.—Protestants teach, that the spirit of truth was not promised to the church of Christ, to be with her teachers for ever, and to guide them into all truth.

Their own Bible, in clear and plain terms, contradicts this their assertion (St. John, xiv. 16, 17), I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you FOR EVER, even the SPIRIT OF TRUTH. And, St. John, xvi. 13, When he, the spirit of truth is come, he will GUIDE YOU INTO ALL TRUTH.

Reply.—Protestants do believe that the spirit of truth is promised to be with Christ's church for ever, leading both teachers and taught into all truth, through the ordinary means of his divine grace, one of which means is the right use of Scripture; but not as conferring infallibility on any church or set of teachers since the apostles, whose teaching was accredited by the extraordinary manifestations of the Spirit—i. e., by miracles.

* It is not merely the Bishop of Rimini that is implicated in these transactions. The document which we have quoted from page 283 brings in the following persons:—"The Bishop of Pesaro; the Prolegate of the province of Pesaro and Urbino; the delegate of Forli; Vicars-general, an inquisitor (it seems there are such persons in Italy), three vicars of the Holy Office, and many other persons whom we pass in silence attest the fact. We would mention among others, the Commissary-general of the Four Legations, who came from Bologna, where he resides, to Rimini, saw the miracle, venerated most devoutly, and more than once, the august picture, and gave in honour of it a beautiful chalice, &c." All these are persons in high office in the Roman Church in Italy. It would seem as if all his Holiness' officials are working to try and get Catholics to believe these pretended miracles, of which, as far as we can see, they have not yet ventured to publish the judicial proofs.

OBJECTION 4.—Protestants assert that the church of the living God is not the pillar and ground of truth, but may, and often does, uphold damnable errors.

Their own Bible expressly declares, 1 Tim. iii. 15, that the church of the living God is the pillar and ground of the truth, and, consequently, cannot uphold damnable errors.

REPLY.—Protestants certainly do deny that this passage—whatever it means—does or can allude to the Church of Rome, since the church in which Timothy was to "know how he ought to behave himself," was that of which he was bishop—i. e., Ephesus, and not Rome. But Roman Catholics are accustomed to take it for granted that whatever is said in Scripture concerning "the church" must apply to the Church of Rome; and hence the above mistake. They should prove this assumption by Scripture.

But with respect to the passage here quoted from the Epistle to Timothy, the sense of it evidently depends on the punctuation; and some of the ablest divines are convinced that there should be a full stop at "Church of God," and then the succeeding sentence will run thus: "A pillar and ground of the truth, and without controversy great is the mystery of godliness:" which mystery the apostle proceeds to state was, God manifest in the flesh, &c., &c. And every scholar must admit that the words of the original Greek will bear that sense as well as the other.

THE REAL PRESENCE.

WE insert the following able correspondence between the Rev. R. A. Wilson, of Glasgow, and the Rev. W. Carson, of Waterford, with which we were favoured last month, but which reached us too late for insertion in our last number:—

Abercromby-street, Glasgow,
February 18, 1852.

REV. AND DEAR SIR—Mrs. F. has enclosed to me a communication received from you, containing what you consider three unanswerable difficulties to the Catholic doctrine of the real presence of Christ in the blessed Eucharist. I regret I did not receive them when in Waterford, as time and opportunity were then at my disposal. However, I shall be happy at any time to steal a few moments from the press and hurry of my daily duties, to answer or explain any difficulty which you may be pleased to propose, and trust you will dispassionately read and study my reply. I am likewise fully satisfied that you may make whatever honourable use you may please of them. I say honourable, because should you please to give them publicity at any future time, I should request that my answers should not be curtailed, even as to a sentence, inasmuch as the duties of the Glasgow mission are so incessant, that I shall never, perhaps, have a fair opportunity to say all I might wish; and, therefore, there will be nothing said which will not be to the point, whilst I must, necessarily, omit much which might be added with benefit. Your first objection is substantially as follows:—

Paschasius, in the year 831, was the first person who wrote a treatise on transubstantiation. He was opposed by Raban Maur, a Catholic Archbishop, and by Heribald and others. Although you have not drawn your conclusions from these premises, I premise I am justified in anticipating it, by saying, therefore, the doctrine of transubstantiation dates from Paschasius, in the ninth century.

Reverend sir, Paschasius did not write a treatise on "transubstantiation;" but (A.D. 818) he wrote one on the body and blood of Christ, in which he advanced no new doctrine, but merely gave the doctrine of the universal Church in the 9th century. His words are, and I beg of you to consider them attentively—"Although some err through ignorance, yet no person, as yet, has publicly called into question what the whole world believes and confesses." "Quamvis ex hoc quidam de ignorantia errent, nemo tamen est adhuc in aperto, qui hoc ita esse contradicat quod totus orbis credit et confitetur." And, again, he says—"Let him who would contravene this truth, consider what he does against his Lord, and against all the Church of Christ. It is, therefore, a most grievous crime to pray with all, and not believe what truth teaches, and what all the Christians of the universe profess." "Videat qui contra hoc venire voluerit, quid agat contra ipsum dominum et contra omnem Christi ecclesiam. Nefarium ergo scelus est, orare cum omnibus et non credere quod veritas ipsa testatur et ubique omnes universaliter verum esse fatentur." Now, it is not denied, even by Protestant writers, that Paschasius maintained, during life, a character eminent both for sanctity and learning, and I, therefore, dispassionately put the question—Is the above the language of a man broaching a new theory on a most vital point of Catholic doctrine? or should not Paschasius have been absolutely demented in asserting, in the face of the world, that the belief in the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the Eucharist, was the universal faith of Christianity at the moment he was writing, when, in reality, it was nowhere believed, but was merely his own private speculation. I have no doubt, reverend sir, but that you will acknowledge the full force of this observation, if you bestow due attention to the testimony which I have above adduced.

You say that Paschasius was opposed by Raban Maur and others. Now, reverend sir, I admit it, for the sake of giving you all the advantage you can desire, although you must be aware, that neither Catholics nor Protestants agree as to the precise doctrine of the opponents of Paschasius. The manuscript epitome of William of Malmesbury joins Amularius, Heribald, and Raban, in the same opposition to the true Catholic doctrine, but accuses them of being Stercoranists, and, therefore, implying an error as opposed to the doctrine of the Sacramentarians which you hold, as it is opposed to the doctrine held by the Catholic Church. But, suppose, as I said, for the sake of argument, that their opinions favoured your doctrine with regard to the blessed Eucharist, what follows? Therefore, persons holding communion with the Catholic Church in the ninth century were at liberty to call in question the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the blessed Eucharist. Reverend sir, this conclusion is not justified by the premises. The Church of Lyons, in the celebrated Three epistles, accused Amlarius "of poisoning the faith of Catholic France, by writings full of error and strange opinions," and declares that his writings should be burned, and in the year 838 the errors of Amularius and of his followers, Raban and Heribald, were again condemned by a synod of Bishops, held at Cressy. Therefore, reverend sir, it was not a matter of indifference in the ninth century to deny the real presence of Christ in the blessed Eucharist; but as the doctrine of Raban had but few supporters, it was allowed to die a natural death, not without having been reprobated, as I have shown, but without causing any great commotion in the church. John Scot revived the controversy in the middle of the ninth century, but he found no partizans, and again it died with him, and remained dead until the eleventh century, when it was revived by Berengarius, and as soon condemned by a synod convoked at Rome, by Leo the ninth, in the year 1050, and in the following year by the synod of Versailles, at which the work of Scotus was consigned to the flames, in execration of its heretical doctrine. Berengarius made a public retractation in another council, held at Turin, in the year 1055, and again in a synod of 113 bishops, convoked at Rome in the year 1059, from the various kingdoms of Europe. His retractation was sent by order of the synod to the various countries of Europe, for the purpose of repairing the scandal which the publicity and noise of his errors had given, and the heresy was thus, for the present, cut off in its very bud. Now, reverend sir, Paschasius announces publicly what was the universal belief of his age. The Church of Lyons, the synod of Cressy, and all the subsequent synods and councils held in Italy, France, and Germany, confirm his statement; wherefore I conclude, and I hope you will candidly say very justly, that the doctrine of the real presence was really the universal doctrine of the Christian church in the ninth and subsequent, as well as preceding centuries; and that if a few in the ninth century disputed the doctrine, they, by doing so, went against the universal faith of the Christian Church, and thereby incurred the severe animadversion and condemnation of the Catholic churches and bishops of the age in which they lived. In fine, that in proportion as the error of a few became more likely to do injury to the Catholic faith, in proportion did the church increase her energies to repress those evils, by condemning the errors themselves; causing the books containing the objectionable doctrines to be burned in abhorence of them, and multiplying synods and councils until it terminated in the œcumenical Council of Trent.

But, reverend sir, I must not pass by another point in the proposed difficulty on which you seem to lay peculiar stress. You say Paschasius first wrote a treatise on transubstantiation in the year 831. Reverend sir, I do not suppose that you mean to assert the existence of a treatise as essential to the belief in transubstantiation; you might as well argue that the sun did not give light for some thousands of years, because so long no learned treatise appeared on the nature and properties of light. You certainly do not mean this. Then, I suppose, you mean by the word first, that Paschasius was the first to teach the doctrine of transubstantiation. If so, please open St. Cyril's works, and bear in mind that this holy Bishop of Jerusalem lived 500 years before Paschasius. You will find in his Fourth Catechism for catechumens, in language written expressly for the purpose of communicating instruction to beginners, the following discourse:—"When Christ himself has said of the bread, this is my body, and of the chalice, this is my blood, who will dare to doubt? Formerly he changed water into wine, and will we consider him unworthy of being believed when he changes wine into his blood? Judge it not by the taste but by faith. What seems to be bread is not bread, and what seems to be wine is not wine, although it may seem such to the taste; but it is the blood of Christ." Reverend sir, what do you call this, if it be not the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation? Open St. Ambrose, and you will find the following (Lib. de Initiandis, cq., No. 48)—"Perhaps you will say, how can you assert that I receive the body of Christ, when I see something else? If the word of Christ was able to bring into existence what before did not exist, how much more easily is it not able to change things which are into what they are not?" Again, reverend sir, I ask, is not this transubstantiation? It would be superfluous to multiply testimonies. If, however, you require more, equally explicit, I shall be happy to supply you with them; but from what I have adduced, it is evident that, even if Paschasius were the first to write a treatise on transubstantiation, he was not certainly the first to teach and believe in the doctrine implied by it. It would likewise throw upon you, reverend sir, the extremely difficult task of explaining how it is that the eastern heretical churches separated from the communion of Rome since the beginning of the 5th century, and as opposed to her doctrines fully as much as is the Church of England since the Reformation, have become imbued with this Catholic tenet of the real presence of Christ in the blessed eucharist, which, nevertheless, Eutychians, Nestorians, and Arminians, as well as Greeks, defend and teach. Did they, too, receive it from the Latin monk?

In your second difficulty, you say, "the seventh general council held in Constantinople in the year 754, decreed that the sacrament was a commemoration, not a sacrifice." Allow me, reverend sir, to correct an historical mistake into which you have fallen. There was no general council held in Constantinople in the eighth century, and, consequently, I know not where to look for the decree to which you allude. Catholics are not wont to confound the idea of a sacrament with that of a sacrifice, nor to say that the sacrament is the sacrifice; nevertheless, making the proper allowance for your want of correct information on this point, I shall be happy to be informed of the name of the council you refer to, the number of the decree, and the year when celebrated, so that I may be able, with accuracy, to refer to this (at least to me) novel decision.

Your third difficulty states, that the doctrine of transubstantiation was not an article of Catholic faith until the decision of the Council of Trent. Reverend and dear sir, you completely mistake the power of councils with regard to Catholic faith. The Catholic Church has her faith prior to the convocation of a council; nor is it in the power of any council, general or particular, to make that which previously was not contained in the body of Catholic faith, become, by its decision, an article of faith. The entire power of the church, assembled in council, as regards faith, is merely to declare that to be really contained in the Catholic faith which was contained from the beginning—which the church believed and taught from the beginning. Disputes and doubts affecting individual persons, places, or churches, sometimes render the true faith of the church obscure in those places, and the obscurity is removed by the universal church represented in council, which is not affected by local doubts or difficulties, but which has in its decisions the promised assistance of the Holy Ghost. In the fourth century the Council of Nice declared that the Son was consubstantial with the father, and anathematized whoever would deny the doctrine; but would you, reverend sir, thence infer, that the consubstantiality of the Father and Son was not contained in the deposit of Christian faith, or was not believed by the Church of God from the very foundation of Christianity? Apply this to the Council of Trent and you will have a case precisely parallel.

I remain, reverend dear sir, with sincere respect,
Yours truly in Christ,
R. A. WILSON.

John's-Hill, Waterford,
March 11, 1852.

REV. AND DEAR SIR—I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 18th ult. I regret time did not permit me to answer it immediately.

You commence your letter by saying, "Mrs. F. has enclosed to me a communication received from you, containing, what you consider, three unanswerable difficulties to the Catholic doctrine of the real presence of Christ in the blessed Eucharist." This statement is not quite correct. The following are the facts of the case.

I had, on several occasions, conversations with Mrs. F. on the points of controversy between Roman Catholics and Protestants. I stated to her, on one of these occasions, that I was prepared to show her religion to be a novel one, and to point out certain dates about which the various errors crept into the church. She asked me to give her such a date for the doctrine of transubstantiation. I wrote at the time, and partly from memory, the few hurried lines you received. She told me she would show them on the following day to some of the Waterford priests, and demand from them an answer; but, I suppose, they were not able to give her one, and, as a dernier resort, she forwarded them to you. Nor am I surprised at this, as a few days previously she had informed me, that not one of the Roman Catholic clergymen in Waterford was able either to write or preach a sermon—controversial or otherwise; and assigned this as a reason for their not answering our sermons published in the newspapers, though repeatedly challenged to do so; and for their bringing down from Dublin, Drs. Cahill and O'Connell, to preach for them on controversy. A strange confession coming from your sister!—Doubtless she had it from you!

You have fully stated the premises of my first objection; but the conclusion is not the one intended to be drawn from them. They were not meant to prove that the doctrine of transubstantiation dates from Paschasius, or that he was the first to teach the doctrine; nor did I undertake to point out any precise period at which this error began, or name any particular person who introduced it. Paschasius, as Bellarmine confesses, was the first to systematize the doctrine of transubstantiation, and he found the materials at his hand, among the many and gross conceits which possessed the minds of men in that dark and barbarous age. The fact is that no error of the Romish system was brought in at once; but springing from the corrupt soil of the human heart, each arose insensibly and by slow degrees, as a young plant grows up from the seed, strengthening and spreading, till at length it fixes its roots deep in the earth, and sheds its noxious influence far and wide. We cannot, therefore, point out the precise period when these errors first began, no more than a man can tell the time his hair began to be gray, or his garments to be old. Only by comparing what the Church of Rome is now with what she was in the apostolic and primitive ages of the church, we perceive that many gross corruptions have been introduced. Slowly and imperceptibly, in the midnight darkness of the world and the church, they arose, and were shaped and moulded by degrees, as men's minds were prepared to look upon them, till each monster received its perfect form from the plastic hands of the Council of Trent. The gradual way in which the doctrine of transubstantiation was brought into the church, has been well described by a learned writer of the present day—"Men first, in spite of our Lord's warning, that the spirit only quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing, began to fancy that Christ's flesh, as such, had the power of giving life, then that Christ's body was present in the bread, or that the bread by some mysterious change became, to all intents and purposes of giving life all one with Christ's body; and, lastly, that it was not bread at all, but Christ's body hidden under the appearance of bread." Thus broached, as a matter of opinion, it was then brought in by power, and lastly, by authority, decreed into an article of faith.

Paschasius was the first to write an express work on the subject of transubstantiation, the title of which was, "Concerning the body and blood of Christ;" and this is of itself a plain presumption against its primitive antiquity. But, add to this, that he was at once opposed by Rabanus Maurus, Heribald, Scotus, Ratramn, and others—that no sooner was the doctrine openly and publicly advocated, but it met with the most determined opposition, that the first attempt to put it forward as a necessary part of Christian faith, received the most unqualified reprobation from men of high repute in the church, some of whom have been canonized by the Church of Rome, and all of whom have been acknowledged by Bellarmine to be acute and learned men; and is not the conclusion from these premises plain, that the doctrine was a novelty, unknown in the pure and better ages of the church, and that even in the ninth century, it was at most, only a disputable doctrine, and could not have been the universal faith of the Christian Church—a doctrine of universal belief.

You claim for this doctrine a universal consent; but how can that be, when it met with the most decided opposition? That is a strange universal consent, to a doctrine which consists in its being believed by all except those who reject it! Nor is it any answer to this to say, that the opinions of those who opposed it, were condemned; any censure upon them, does not remove their opposition, for the absence of any evil does not consist in its being censured when it arises, but in its not arising at all. The fact still remains, that men in communion with the Church of Rome, of high reputation in it for their learning and abilities, never condemned in their own age, which is the point in dispute, and never condemned by any general council antecedently to the Council of Trent, gave the most determined opposition to the first attempt to fix the doctrine on the church, and branded it as a novelty unknown in its purest and best ages. It will avail nothing to call Ratramne and the others heretics, because they opposed an almost universal opinion. The burden of proof lies upon you, to show that they were not members of the church, for if they were, then the church did not generally hold the doctrine of transubstantiation. But if it be said, that Ratramne was not a Catholic, because he opposed this doctrine, then the same must be proved with regard to Augustine and the other Fathers whom he quotes, and whose opinions he shows inconsistent with it.

You speak as if we Protestants denied the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist; now, we hold it as firmly as you; we even assert, that "the body and blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's supper;" the point in dispute between us is, whether Christ's real presence in the eucharist is spiritual or corporeal.

Before, then, I show that the passages you bring forward from the Fathers do not prove transubstantiation, and give some quotations from them against that doctrine, it would be well to lay down clearly what transubstantiation is.

As you have mentioned the recantation of Berengarius, we cannot do better than refer to the form prescribed for him, as of course it must, be esteemed a correct account of the doctrine of your church. He was required to declare at a council held in Rome, under Nicholas II., in the year 1058, "that the bread and wine, after consecration, are not only the sacrament, symbol, or figure, but also the true body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and are sensibly not only in a sacrament, but in truth, handled and broken by the hands of the priests, and crushed by the teeth of the faithful (fidelium dentibus atteri)."

The Council of Trent is yet more precise. I refer you to canons 1, 2, 3, 4, "On the most holy sacrament of the Eucharist, session 12."

Canon 1. "If any one shall deny that the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and, therefore, entire Christ, are truly, really, and substantially contained in the sacrament of the most holy Eucharist, and shall say that he is only in it as in a sign, or in a figure, or virtually, let him be accursed."

Canon 2. "If any one shall say that the substance of the bread and wine remains in the sacrament of the most holy Eucharist, together with the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and shall deny that wonderful and singular conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, the outward forms of the bread and wine still remaining, which conversion the Catholic Church most aptly calls transubstantiation, let him be accursed."

Canon 3. If any one shall deny that in the venerated sacrament of the Eucharist, entire Christ is contained in each kind, and in each several particle of either kind, when separated, let him be accursed."

Canon 4. "If any one shall say that, after consecration, the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ is only in the wonderful sacrament of the Eucharist in use whilst it is taken, and not either before or after, and that the true body of the Lord does not remain in the hosts or particles which have been consecrated, and which are reserved or remain after the communion, let him be accursed.

Again, I refer you to the Catechism of the Council of Trent, I quote from the edition printed at Venice, in the year 1582:—

"But now the pastors must here explain, that not only the true body of Christ, and whatever appertains to the true mode of existence of a body, as the bones and nerves, but also that entire Christ is contained in this Sacrament."

Again, I refer you to the Roman Missal. Amongst the rubrics we read "of the defects that may occur in the celebration of masses"—

"If the consecrated host disappears, either by some accident—as by the wind—or by a miracle, or if it be taken by any animal, and cannot be found, then let another be consecrated."

Again—"If the priest vomits the Eucharist, if the accidents appear entire, let them be reverently taken, if there be not nausea."

In those documents, it is asserted that the substance of the bread and wine, immediately after consecration, undergoes a change, and are not merely symbols or figures, but the actual, real, and identical body of Christ, which suffered upon the cross; nor is this all, not merely is it asserted that the material bread and wine are converted into the material body and blood of Christ, but that material bread and wine are converted into the immaterial soul, and not only into the immaterial soul, but into the essential divinity of Christ. The assertion is, that in the mass "There is really, and truly, and substantially present, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of Jesus Christ." And not only so, but that a whole Christ, body, soul, divinity, bones, and nerves, is present in the bread and in every particle of it, and in the wine, and in every drop of it; so that, were you to divide the bread or wafer into a thousand different crumbs, or the wine into a thousand different drops, each crumb or each drop would still contain the nerves, bones, sinews, body, soul, and divinity of Jesus Christ; or if the wafer received by the communicant, into the mouth, should break into smaller pieces, each separate fragment, however small, becomes a separate, entire Christ. Still further, that an animal, as it is expressed in the Roman missal, or a mouse, as was defined by Greg. II. (Direct inquisit: part 1, No. 15), may run away with and eat the host—i.e., the Lord Jesus, body, blood, soul, divinity, bones, and nerves; and, lastly, that a priest may vomit him. Oh, who can listen even to this simple statement without feelings of indescribable horror? This is the very creed of your church, not distorted, not exaggerated in a single point, but expressed in the very terms of your own formularies—that the consecrated wafer becomes the very body, blood, soul, divinity, bones, and nerves of Jesus Christ—becomes God—that a mouse may run away with and eat that God, the God of heaven and earth—the Redeemer, the Lord of Hosts—that mighty Being who arched the heavens—who gemmed the firmament with ten thousand stars—who controls the whole machinery of the universe—before whom angels veil their faces as they cry, "Holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, who was, and is, and is to come." "Be astonished, oh, ye heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid, yea, be very desolate, saith the Lord."

The passages you have adduced from the writings of Cyril and Ambrose, speak of the consecrated elements as the body and blood of Christ, but does this prove transubstantiation? If so, then the Church of England holds that doctrine when she asserts that "the body and blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's supper." You must show in what sense they are the body and blood of Christ, whether carnally or spiritually. How St. Cyril, of Jerusalem, the very writer you quote, understood it, is evident when he says—"With all assurance let us partake as of the body and blood of Christ, for, under the type of bread, his body is given unto thee; and under the type of wine, his blood is given unto thee; that so thou mayest partake of the body and blood of Christ, being one body and one blood with him." (Cyril, oper. Cat. xxii., mystag. iv., sec. iii., Fol. Bened., Edit. 1720.) How St. Ambrose, the other writer you quote understood it, is evident when he says, "Make this ascribed oblation reasonable and acceptable, which is the figure of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ."—(Ambros. ope. Tom ii., De Sacrament, lib. iv., cap. 5, fol. edit.. Bened., 1690.) How St. Augustine, one of the most celebrated doctors of the church, who flourished in the fourth century, understood it, is evident when he says, in his epistle to Boniface the bishop—"If the sacraments had not some resemblance to these things of which they are the sacrament, they would not be sacraments at all, but from their resemblance they often take the name of the things themselves, so then, after a certain sort, the sacrament of the body of Christ is the body of Christ, and the sacrament of the blood of Christ, is the blood of Christ." Again, St. Augustine writes—"The Lord when he gave the sign of his body, did not doubt to say, this is my body; and again, in the history of the New Testament, so great and so marvellous was the patience of our Lord, that, bearing with Judas, though not ignorant of his purpose, he admitted him to the banquet, in which he commended and delivered to his disciples the figure of his own body and blood."

You seem to lay great stress upon the words of Cyril, "Judge it not by the taste, but by faith," and yet, this is so far from proving transubstantiation, that it is in perfect accordance with the doctrine of the Church of England, when she declares that the faithful only receive the body and blood of Christ, but that all others are guilty of his body and blood. Again, you have underlined the words of St. Ambrose—"How can I receive the body of Christ, when I see something else?" but this would prove him as much a Protestant as a Romanist, for we, too, as I said before, hold, that the the body of Christ is received by the faithful in the Lord's supper.

Again, the passages which you have adduced, speak of a change having taken place in the elements after consecration; but this will not answer your purpose, unless you also show the kind of change implied; we admit that some of the Fathers speak of a mysterious change having taken place in the elements, but we altogether deny that that change was of that kind or character above described as transubstantiation. It rests with you to show that it is a corporeal or carnal change, but from other parts of their writings we can prove to demonstration that such a doctrine never entered into their minds.

The first I shall adduce is from Clement, of Alexandria, who lived in the second century, and whose name carries great weight in the Church of Rome. His words are as follows:—

"Inasmuch as Christ declared, that the bread which I give you is my flesh, inasmuch as flesh is irrigated by blood, therefore the wine is allegorically called blood. For the word is allegorically designated by many different names, such as meat, and flesh, and nourishment, and bread, and blood, and milk; for the Lord is all things for the enjoyment of us who have believed in him. Nor let any one think that we speak strangely, when we say that milk is allegorically called the blood of the Lord, for is not wine likewise allegorically called by the same appellation? The Scripture, therefore, has named wine a mystic symbol of the holy blood." And, again—"Be well assured that Christ himself also partook of wine, inasmuch as he also is a man. He, moreover, blessed the wine, saying, Take, drink; this is my blood, the blood of the vine. The consecrated liquor of exhilaration, therefore, allegorically represents the word, who poured himself out on behalf of man, for the remission of sins."

Again, Cyprian writes as follows:—

"We have found out that it was a mixed cup which our Lord offered, and that it was wine which he called his blood."

Again, St. Augustine writes—"Christ instructed his disciples and said unto them, It is the Spirit quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life; as if he had said, understand spiritually what I have spoken—You are not about to eat this identical body which you see; and you are not about to drink this identical blood, which they who crucify me will pour out; on the contrary, I have commended a certain sacrament to you which will vivify you, if spiritually understood." It would be superfluous to multiply testimonies; if, however, you require more, equally explicit, I shall be happy to supply you with them.

In the second place, you have undertaken to correct an historical mistake into which you say I have fallen. You state there was no general council held in Constantinople in the eighth century. I would advise you for the future, when you undertake to correct mistakes, to take care that you do not fall into a more grievous one yourself, for there was a general council held in Constantinople in the eighth century. "Making the proper allowance for your want of correct information on this point," I proceed to inform you, that it was called by Constantine, in 754, at Constantinople, to whom, it appears, the furious tribe of image worshippers, in derision, had given the name of Copronymus. It was composed of eastern bishops. It condemned the worship and use of images. This council, I am aware, is not acknowledged by Roman Catholics, any more than the authority of the second commandment, because it had not received the sanction of the see of Rome; nevertheless, its testimony is of great value on the subject in dispute, as showing that the Trentine doctrine of transubstantiation was not universally received or believed in the early ages of the Christian Church. It maintained that "Christ chose no other shape or type under heaven by which to represent his incarnation, but the sacrament which he delivered to his ministers for a type and effectual commemoration, commanding the substance of bread to be offered, which did not in any way resemble the form of man, that no occasion might be given for bringing in idolatry."

In regard to the third difficulty, you state that I have mistaken the power of a council which is only to declare or authoritatively set forth as true, any point of doctrine, so that what before might have been disputed or doubted without danger, becomes now necessary to be believed, and heresy to dispute or doubt.

According to your own definition, then, till it becomes an article of faith, it is a disputable doctrine which may or may not be held by those who remain in communion with the Church of Rome; and, therefore, since the doctrine of transubstantiation was not declared an article of faith till the Council of Trent, the belief of the doctrine was not essential till then, and those who denied it must not be considered as heretics. Between this and the Council of Nice there is no parallel, for almost immediately on the promulgation of Arius's opinions, the Council of Nice assembled, and those opinions were declared heretical. Arius first put forward his erroneous views in 318, and in 325 the council condemned them, an interval only of seven years; but the doctrine of transubstantiation was disputed, fiercely disputed, from the time of Paschasius in the ninth century, and not terminated as you yourself have stated till the œcumenical Council of Trent in the 16th century. Therefore, transubstantiation was not till then a doctrine of the church, or a necessary part of Christian faith. Indeed the celebrated Breerly says: "complete transubstantiation (i.e., both for form and matter), was not determined until the last Council of Trent in the year 1560."

But think not that it is through the decrees of councils, or the testimony of the Fathers, or the writings of fallible men, however pious or however learned, that we alone attack the doctrine of transubstantiation. We have a more powerful weapon than any of them, and that is the sword of the Spirit—the Word of the living God.

I know you will shrink from Scripture, for as Scotus (4 Sent. d. 11, q. 3), says—"There is no passage of Scripture so express as evidently to compel the admission of transubstantiation, without the declaration of the church;" or, as Biel says (in Can. Miss. lect. 40), "It is nowhere found in the canonical Scriptures;" or, as Cardinal Cameracensis says—"Transubstantiation cannot be proved from Holy Writ;" or, as Cardinal Cajetan says—"There does not appear out of the Gospel anything to compel us to understand these words literally, namely, 'This is my body;' and, truly, that presence in the sacrament, which the church holds, cannot be proved by these words of Christ, unaided by the declaration of the church."

You hold that when Christ, at the last supper, took the bread and cup into his hands, and said, "This is my body," "This is my blood," these words are to be taken in their most strict and literal sense, and, that, therefore, the bread did actually become changed into the Saviour's body, and the wine into his blood. But if you will abide by this literal interpretation, you must carry out the principle much further than you do. We know, from 1 Cor. xi. 25, and from St. Luke, that our Lord said, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood." Have I not, then, as good reason for asserting that the cup is transubstantiated into the New Testament as you have for saying that the bread and wine are transubstantiated into the body and blood of our Lord?

But from the words of our Lord, immediately after consecration, we learn that no transubstantiation had taken place; for he calls the consecrated element "the fruit of the vine"—"But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom."—Matt. xxvi. 29.

Moreover, it was when our Lord was celebrating the Passover with his disciples, that he instituted the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Now, it was customary among the Jews for the head of the family to pronounce over the Paschal Lamb the words "This is the Lord's Passover;" as the head of the family he, too, must have pronounced over the Paschal Lamb, the words, "This is the Lord's Passover." The disciples knew the lamb was not really the passover, but that it was a sign, emblem or memorial of it, and when, immediately after the commemorative supper he institutes the Christian sacrament, and uses the same form of phrase respecting it, which a few moments before he had used respecting the Jewish sacrament, and says of the bread and wine, "This is my body broken or given," "This is my blood shed," it is impossible his disciples could have understood him otherwise than as implying, "This is the sign, emblem, or memorial of my body broken, and of my blood shed."

And such a way of speaking is quite common, and often used by our Lord himself. He declared, "I am the door," "I am the vine," "I am the shepherd." He was not literally a door, a vine, or a shepherd, but he was figuratively what they were literally. The Apostles had often heard our Saviour speak thus before, and they would naturally understand him to be speaking so then.

Nor do they afterwards put another meaning on his words. In his first epistle to the Corinthians, St. Paul five times successively calls that bread which was consecrated, and which our Saviour calls his body.

We conclude, therefore, that the figurative is in this case that in which our Saviour's words must be understood. But to say that his words are to be taken in any other sense than that in which those who heard him would naturally understand him, is what I think none would venture to say, except those who have been carefully trained up to believe it such.

I am, dear sir, sincerely and faithfully yours,

WM. CARSON.

ST. AUGUSTINE'S PRAYER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In the last number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, p. 45, you conclude your answer to "Amicus" with the words—"This is the interpretation of St. Augustine, book the 1st, on the Sermon on the Mount, cap. ii." In both the last numbers you have quoted the Holy Fathers as entirely against the doctrine of purgatory. I trust you will not refuse me, who am a very unskilled controversialist, a privilege which you have given and kindly promised to other Catholic laymen.

Then, let me suppose that you adduce the most powerful array of quotations, from the Holy Fathers, against the Catholic doctrine of purgatory, and that I, on the other hand, do adduce only one, from one only of the ancient Fathers of the Church. What then? The inference naturally must be, that such holy Father was not orthodox. I then, sir, refer you to the confessions of St Augustine, book ix. chap 13; and, at the same time, I beg leave to quote the following, from the above, for the attentive perusal of your readers.

The following then is the sublime and elequent prayer of the great and truly orthodox St. Augustine for the repose of his mother's soul:—"And, now, my heart being cured of that wound, [sorrow for his mother] I pour out to thee, my God, in behalf of her, thy servant, a very different kind of tears, issuing from a heart awed by the contemplation of the dangers of every soul that dies in Adam. For, although she, being revived in Christ, even before being freed from the flesh, and having lived so as that thy name is much praised in her faith, and virtues, yet I dare not say that no word came out of her mouth contrary to thy command, from the time thou didst regenerate her by baptism. I then, putting aside her good deeds, for which I give thanks with joy, entreat thee at present, for the sins of my mother, forgive them, O Lord; forgive them, I beseech thee, enter not into judgment with her," &c., &c.

With your permission, sir, I will use the right of "private judgment" and that of "reason" as to the above passage.

I need not now inquire, nor is it necessary, whether Monica died a saint or not. From the above passage, at least, it would seem that her son, St. Augustine, who knew her many virtues, was somewhat uneasy as to the repose of her soul in the other world. In your first article on purgatory, page 39, of the last CATHOLIC LAYMAN, you say "Christ, in fact, does not do his work of atonement by halves—remitting the guilt, and yet leaving the punishment! Where the guilt is removed the punishment is so likewise, temporal as well as eternal. Tertullian. Chrysostom, Augustine, all say this." Now, sir, why did St. Augustine entreat the mereiful Saviour, who "does not do his work of atonement by halves," for St. Monica's sins? When her spirit quitted its remnant of clay, it was judged, and found either sinless or sinful—if the former, heaven, if the latter, hell was her reward. In either case, praying for her, or remembering her at the "altar," according to her own request, previous to her death, would be an idle and silly performance. Yet, it strikes me, that St. Augustine held a different doctrine; therefore, he continued to pray for her, and to remember her at the altar, hoping that the holy and all-saving sacrifice would atone for her human weakness and defects during life; for who can be sure that, during life, they have sufficiently satisfied the Divine justice?

Like St. Augustine, I shall, sir, until better instructed, continue to pray for the faithful departed.

And have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

A CATHOLIC.

Loughrea, April 24, 1852.

We find some things in our correspondent's letter that we must agree with, and something which we must ask him to consider again.

We agree with him, that if we "adduce the most powerful array of quotations from the Holy Fathers against the Catholic doctrine of purgatory, and that he, on the other hand, do adduce only one, from one only, of the Ancient Fathers of the church—what then? The inference naturally must be, that such Holy Father was not orthodox." If our correspondent had said—"Was not orthodox in this point," we would have thought his argument generally correct. Yet, even so (seeing that he has quoted only one Father), a regard for truth would prevent our urging this argument too far against him. There may be cases, and there are, in which it would be easy to bring more Fathers in favour of an error than against it. Let Roman Catholics only show that the doctrine of purgatory is taught in Scripture, and we will accept the opinion of one Father in its favour, although ten should be against it.

We must ask our correspondent to consider again the following passage of his letter:—"WHEN her spirit quitted its tenement of clay, it was judged, and found either sinless or sinful; if the former, heaven; if the latter, hell was the reward. In either case, praying for her, or remembering her at the 'altar,' according to her own request, previous to her death, would be an idle and silly performanee. Yet it strikes me that St. Augustine held a different doctrine."

Now, it strikes us so too; though, perhaps, not exactly in the same way; and it may strike our correspondent, as it does us, when he considers it again. He seems to think that St. Monica received her final judgment, either for heaven or hell, as soon as she departed from this life; and before St. Augustine prayed for her. For he goes on to say that, notwithstanding this judgment, St. Augustine continued to pray for her. We cannot see what room our correspondent leaves here for purgatory. If Monica must needs go either to heaven or to hell, as soon as she left this life, and before St. Augustine had time to pray for her, what time was there for her to go to purgatory at all? Did St. Augustine pray for her after she was in hell? We notice this, as showing how hard it is for Roman Catholics to write on this subject at all, without making admissions that overthrow purgatory altogether.

But we regard truth alone, and not victory; and we will help our correspondent out of this difficulty. In the Nicene creed, which he and we believe alike, it is said of Christ, "He shall come again with glory to judge both the quick and the dead." The judgment of all who have died since Christ first came, shall take place when Christ comes again into this world as judge. Therefore, St. Monica is not yet judged; she is still waiting for the judgment of Christ when he shall come, at the great day.

This gives a very different meaning to St. Augustine's prayer; but to show what that meaning is, we must give the prayer more fully than our correspondent, "A Catholic," has given it. We do not at all suppose, that he meant to give it wrongly; we are sure that he found it in some book just as he has given it, and that he thought it stood just as St. Augustine wrote it. But the book misled him; and we shall therefore give, as St. Augustine wrote it, marking with brackets, the parts omitted in "A Catholic's" letter.

"But now, with a heart cured of that wound . . . I pour out unto thee, our God, in behalf of that thy servant, a far different kind of tears, flowing from a spirit moved by the thoughts of the danger of every soul that dies in Adam. And although she, having been made alive in Christ, even while not yet released from the flesh, so lived that thy name should be praised in her life and conversation, yet, I dare not say that, from the time that thou didst regenerate her by baptism, no word came out of her mouth contrary to thy command. [And it was said by thy Son, The Truth, 'Whosoever shall say to his brother, thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.' And woe be even to the commendable life of men, if, laying aside mercy, thou shouldst examine it. But because thou art not extreme in seeking out what is done amiss, we faithfully hope to find some place of pardon with thee. But whoever reckons up his real merits to thee, what does he reckon to thee except thy gifts? Oh, that men would know themselves, and that he that glorieth would glory in the Lord.] I therefore, [Oh, my praise and my life, God of my heart,] laying aside for a while her good deeds, for which I give thanks to thee with joy, do now beseech thee, for the sins of my mother, [hearken unto me, I entreat thee by the medicine of our wounds, who hung upon the tree, and now sitting at thy right hand maketh intercession to thee for us. I know that she dealt mercifully, and from her heart forgave her debtors their debts; do thou also forgive her debts, whatever she may have contracted in so many years, since the water of salvation.] Forgive, O Lord, forgive, I beseech thee; enter not into judgment with her. [Let thy mercy exalt itself over judgment, since thy words are true, and thou hast promised mercy unto the merciful; which thou gavest unto them to be, thou who wilt have mercy upon whom thou wilt have mercy, and wilt have compassion on whom thou wilt have compassion. And I believe thou hast already done what I ask, but accept, O Lord, the freewill offerings of my mouth."]

We have thus filled up the gaps in our "Catholic" correspondent's quotation. We cannot give the whole (for it is too long), but we give one sentence more, which plainly shows the nature of the prayer—"Let none sever her from thy protection: let neither the lion nor the dragon interpose himself by force or fraud, for she will not answer that she owes nothing, lest she be convicted and seized by the crafty accuser; but she will answer that her sins are forgiven her by him, to whom none can repay that price, which he who owed nothing, paid for us."

Before we proceed to examine this prayer, let us remind our correspondent that the article in our last number, upon which he writes, was upon purgatory, not upon prayers for the dead. Any prayer for the dead which has nothing to do with purgatory, cannot be brought against that article.

Now, mark first the nature of the sins respecting which St. Augustine prayed. They are offences of the tongue, of which Christ has said, that they who commit them shall be in danger of hell fire (see the first passage in brackets). St. Augustine, therefore, was not praying for his mother's delivery from the pains of purgatory, but that she might not be condemned to hell. Remember that Monica is not yet judged. St. Augustine prays that, when judged, she shall not be condemned to hell. It is evident that he had no thought at all of praying that she might be released from what she was suffering at that time—there is no hint of such a thing in his prayer. Yet this is what any one who believed in purgatory would certainly have prayed for. Our correspondent, indeed, says that St. Augustine "was somewhat uneasy as to the repose of her soul in the other world." But he is plainly mistaken in this; St. Augustine says no such thing, but in the words which our correspondent did not quote (we are sure because he did not know of them), St. Augustine says the very contrary—"I believe thou hast ALREADY done what I ask." If St. Augustine believed that God had already granted everything he thought it necessary to pray for, for his mother, how could he possibly be uneasy about the repose of his mother's soul? No, but looking forward to the future judgment, St. Augustine well knew that if God should try every word of hers by his strict and holy law he would find enough to condemn her, and he therefore prays that God would have mercy in that day. And what was the ground of his hope that God would hear this prayer? It was this, that before Monica died she was entitled to this forgiveness, though not by her own merits, yet by the PROMISE of Christ. "I know (he says) that she dealt mercifully, and from her heart forgave her debtors their debts." And again, "THOU HAST PROMISED mercy unto the merciful." And he marks that it was God (and not herself) who had worked in her this spirit of mercy and of love, this title to receive mercy from him. And God who worked mercy in her, had promised to give her mercy in the day of judgment, and on this ground, and on this ground only, he prays God to perform that promise, and to give her the mercy which he had promised. Do we any longer wonder that he should say? "I believe thou hast already done what I ask;" well might St. Augustine believe it, since he knew that everything which he had asked, God had bound himself by promise to do. Let us confine ourselves to the same rule, let us pray only for what God has promised, and we may believe that it is done already. But what has such a prayer to do with purgatory? Some one must show a promise from God about purgatory before we can thus pray about it.

Let us suppose such a prayer as this—"Thou, O Lord, hast promised, that so surely as Jesus died and rose again, so surely shall he bring with him, when he comes again in glory to this world, the souls of all that now are asleep in him. Perform this promise, O Lord, perform it; hasten that glorious day; bring these souls with thee, and do to them all that thou hast said." Here is a prayer for the dead, which few Protestants will condemn as sinful. And why? because it is simply calling upon God to fulfil his promise, and to do what he has said, and what he surely will do. If any Protestant hesitate about the lawfulness of such a prayer, it is simply because prayers for the dead are so abused by those who pray contrary to God's promises and Word. Let "Catholics" only lay aside all prayers for what God has given no promise (for this is the great principle, that no prayer can be the prayer of faith, no prayer can be acceptable to him, unless it has his promise to rest on). Let Catholics lay aside all prayers for the dead that go beyond or contrary to the promises of God. Let them lay aside all prayers that deny the mercy of Christ, all prayers that dishonour the full efficacy of the blood of Christ; let them do all this, and confine themselves to prayers that rest on his express word and promise; prayers for what he will accomplish whether they pray or not; prayers to which they can add in faith, as St. Augustine did—"I believe that thou hast already done what I ask"—and there will soon be little difference among Christians about prayers for the dead.

Our correspondent concludes his letter with a solemn question—"Who can be sure that, during life, they have sufficiently satisfied the Divine justice?" We have no difficulty in answering, that none can be sure of; all should be sure of the contrary. But St. Augustine, in his prayer, points out a remedy, of which we may be sure also—"She will not answer that she owes nothing . . . but she will answer that her sins are forgiven her by him to whom none can repay that price which he who owed nothing paid for us." St. Augustine thought the Divine justice, which we cannot satisfy, was satisfied by that ransom.

FARM OPERATIONS FOR MAY.

Barley.—From the protracted drought, we are well aware that much of the barley land has remained unsown, in the expectation of timely rain to enable the teams to turn up and pulverize the land to the necessary degree of fineness, to insure an even braird. Some partial showers have already fallen, which we trust have been taken advantage of; and would earnestly urge those who have not yet sown this grain, not to lose a moment in doing so. The land should be rendered as loose and friable as possible, and the seed sown quickly on the fresh-turned earth, so as to retain as much of the natural moisture of the land as possible. Steeping the seed, to hasten the period of germination, will be of much service; but it will require careful watching, as, in warm, close weather, it may germinate in a couple of days; but, in cool weather, with harsh, north or north-eastern winds, it will take much longer. As soon as symptoms of germination are apparent, the seed should be committed to the earth without delay.

Mangel wurzel.—Last month we gave the general details necessary in the preparation of the land for this crop, as well for the generality of green crops, to which we refer our readers; if not sown already, no time should now be lost in getting in the several varieties of this crop, the most valuable of which are the long red, globe red, and orange globe, and for the manufacture of sugar, the Silesian or sugar beet. The seeds should be steeped in soft or manure water for 48 hours, and afterwards mixed with fine sand, and kept in a dark place, frequently turned and moistened, to promote germination, and sown upon the first appearance of vegetating.

During the past year the cultivation of sugar beet has been strongly urged, by various parties, as a highly remunerative crop. We have always expressed our doubts on this subject; and we find that the results of our past experience, in the growing of this particular variety of the beet tribe, have been fully borne out by the elaborate experiments made by Mr. Kelly, of Portrane, detailed in his communication to "the Committee of the Agricultural Museum, Royal Dublin Society," which appeared in the FARMERS' GAZETTE of November 8, 1851. From this important document we find that the difference in the money value, per acre (Irish), between sugar beet and yellow globe mangel amounted to the sums of £12 4s. 2½d. in favour of the latter, and that red globe mangel exceeded the sugar beet in value, per acre, by £14 1s. 4½d. With these results before us we cannot recommend the cultivation of the sugar beet as a remunerative crop. We have also this serious objection against its cultivation for the purpose of being converted into sugar—namely, that if such was carried into effect, we would have the manure producing crops—that is, the green crops—carried off the farm, while it is very doubtful whether they would be replaced by an equal supply of manure; and thus the effects of the potato system of cultivation would be again introduced amongst us.

Further, much complaint has been made by parties, who have grown the article last season, some of them extensively, at the company not being ready to receive the roots till a late period of the season, thus entailing much loss and dissappointment to the grower; and we find from a recent advertisement for tenders, that the period of delivery is to be at the option of the company, from the begining of October till the end of March, thus throwing the entire loss arising from evaporation, decaying roots, and expense of storing, &c., on the farmer, besides being confined to one market, and having his money locked up at a time when he should have it to meet his numerous demands. Again, according to Professor Sullivan's recent pamphlet, the largest roots do not contain saccharine matter in proportion to the smaller ones by so great a difference as nine per cent. This is a point to which we formerly adverted. Last season in reply to, and to neutralize our arguments, as to the heavy cost entailed on the producer in delivery, it was asserted that there were drying stations to be established to cure the root, to save the great cost of long and heavy carriage to the farmer, the loss of storage, and enable the company to manufacture the sugar throughout the year; but we have heard nothing of it since. These matters will tend very much, we fear, to the detriment of the company, who will, if persisted in, be obliged to become producers. We think it right to make the above observations, which we imagine are correct; if in any point we have erred we are open to conviction: at the same time we must say that we are informed, by good authority, that a most excellent article is produced at Mountmellick, and trust it may be found cheap and remunerative to all parties, as well as good.

Swede turnips, like the mangels, should be sown as early as possible in the month, and for which the same preparations are necessary and suitable, except that they do not require so heavy a dressing of manure; steep the seed in soft or manure water for 48 hours, set them to drain, and dry them with wood or other ashes. Sow a liberal quantity of seed to allow for the ravages of the fly; if not attacked they are easily hoed out, which to insure a full crop will be much better and cheaper than sowing again; to insure a full and even braird clean and very fine tillage is necessary; rolling and dusting at night with fine quick-lime before they come up and till well established in rough leaf, are the best preventives of the fly.

White Globe or Norfolk Turnips, when required for early sheep feeding, a breadth of white turnips may be sown by the middle of the month, which will come in by September, and be of great service.

Dale's Hybrid and Aberdeen Turnips may be sown from the middle to the end of the month.

Carrots and Parsnips will now require much careful attention, in hoeing and weeding; if sown early, and their progress strong, they will require thinning by the end of the month.

Chicory may still be sown till the 10th of the month. For details, see operations for last and preceding months.

Spring Vetches.—Breadths suitable to the consumption of the above valuable soiling crop should be sown once a fortnight. Mix the vetches with about one-fourth of oats, and about 4lb. of rape; it adds considerably to the bulk of the provender, and serves to keep the vetches off the ground.

Rye and Winter Vetches.—The former will be coming into use early in the month; the latter, at later periods. As fast as they are consumed the land should be turned up and prepared for turnips.

Cabbages—The early-sown spring cabbages may now be drawn from the seedbeds, and transplanted in the fields, the land having been previously well prepared and liberally manured. A good method is to prepare the land in drills, just as if for turnips, and plant in the crown of the drills. Cabbages, planted out this month, will be fit for consumption in September and October.

Kohl Rabi, sown in beds, the last or preceding month, will be fit for transplanting out in the same way as the cabbages mentioned above, some time this or early next month. When this crop is not planted out but sown at once in the drills like turnips, no time should be lost now in doing so.

Flax should now be carefully weeded; the weeders (women and children are best) should proceed on their hands and knees facing the wind. Flax should be weeded when from 3 to 6 inches high, not more.

Buckwheat.—The land for this crop should be thoroughly pulverized and clean, and should not be sown till all danger from frost is over, which may be about the middle of the month. It is cultivated for the seed, for soiling, and for ploughing in as green manure. For the first, two bushels of seed to the Irish acre should be sown; and for the two latter from three to four bushels may be sown. It is a good crop to lay down land to pasture or meadow with.

Hemp.—Sow early in the month, in rows about two and a half feet apart. About three bushels of sound heavy seed will sow the Irish acre.

Wheat, if too luxuriant, should now be eaten down with sheep, or mown, harrowed, and rolled; but these operations should be performed before the culm or seed stem begins to shoot up, after which it would be injurious to do so. Wheat and other autumn-sown crops should now be thoroughly weeded, and if sown in drills the horse and hand hoes, with drill grubbers, should be passed between them.

Beans will now require horse and hand hoeing.

Potatoes, if planted in time, will now require hoeing, cleaning, and moulding, if in drills; if in ridges or lazy-beds, clean, and add a little fresh earth from the furrows, except those intended for very early use. These latter should be cleaned but not earthed, as that operation, although adding to the bulk of the crop, retards their coming to maturity.

Paring and burning should be proceeded with upon all favourable opportunities; there is no better preparation for turnips, rape, and late potatoes; and more will be done in cleansing foul land in one season, by this mode, than in three or four of the usual modes of cropping.

Grass Lands.—New pastures should be eaten close, to keep the plants from shooting up seed stems, which weaken them, and, to promote tillering, covering the surface quickly, and produce a close sward.—Sheep pastures should be eaten close and bare, but lands designed for heavy horned stock, should be allowed to produce a good bite before they are stocked. It will be advisable to mow rich or rank spots, which the animals refuse to eat; they will greedily devour the young growth, though, if unmown, they may refuse it all the season.

Ewes and Lambs should have a short, sweet bite. Dag and trim the ewes of all foul wool on the tail, legs, udders, &c. Guard against the attacks of the fly, by removing the maggots as soon as possible, and strewing a little finely-powdered white lead on the spot, which will soon heal the excoriated skin; never remove any of the wool, which makes the flock look ragged. Wash the entire flock by the end of the month, in a clean, running stream, and when thoroughly dry, but not before, have them shorn; they should be accommodated with a thoroughly clean pasture, after being washed, till shorn, free from clayey naked banks, which would dirty the wool.

Wedders.—Fatting and store stock will now require extra care. Examine their feet and remove all loose or overgrown portions of the hoof, loose skin, &c., to prevent lameness; and, if necessary, anoint with butyr of antimony. The transition from winter keep to the young succulent grass frequently causes a laxative state of the bowels, in which case bleed and give Epsom salts, from one to two ounces, according to size and strength; and if the disease continues obstinate, give a tablespoonful, morning and night, and oftener, if necessary, of the following mixture:—One ounce prepared chalk, half an ounce of catechu, and half an ounce of powdered opium, mixed with half a pint of peppermint water.

The Dairy will be in full and profitable operation some time this month. Let the cows have sufficient nourishing, succulent food. Be careful that they are not turned to grass before they have a full and sufficient bite, and let them not undergo sudden changes of weather to chill and throw them into ill health, and consequent loss of milk. Pay attention to the dairy, and insist on the most scrupulous cleanliness, both in person and the utensils, and everything connected with the dairy.

Calves.—Early ones may now be turned out to grass in warm, well sheltered paddocks, where they may be fed. Linseed meal or porridge may be gradually substituted for part or the whole of the milk, which is sometimes an object after the calf is three weeks or a month old.

Pigs.—Fat pigs should be disposed of before the month commences, and all others kept in store condition. Green clover, vetches, &c., may be given them in their yard, or if a clover field can be exclusively devoted to this stock, they will be maintained in health, strength, and good growing condition, till the end of the season, when food more adapted for fattening comes in plentifully.

Naked fallows should get a turning this month, previous to which they should be well harrowed and hand-picked.

Corn Crops and Meadows.—This is a good time to top-dress the corn crops and meadows with guano, fermented bones, soot, lime and salt, or other artificial manures.

Soiling.—Rye, vetches, Italian rye-grass, clovers, Lucerne, saintfoin, &c., will now be rapidly coming into use for house-feeding the stock. Cut close that none be wasted. Keep under-cover for six hours after cutting before using, that the more watery particles be evaporated, and avoid heaping too much together to prevent fermentation. Top-dress the lucernes, clovers, rye-grass, &c., immediately after cutting, with rich compost or liquid manure.

Poultry.—Pay attention to the young chickens; let them have a warm, sunshiny, sheltered place to walk in, with free access to green and insectiferous food. Set more clutches of those most desirous of increasing. Feed young turkeys on boiled nettles, chopped fine, mixed with well-boiled potatoes, or, in lieu of those, with some good oatmeal. Keep them carefully from damp. Attend to the young goslings, they require soft feeding; and allow both them and young ducks free access to water in fine weather, but keep them away from it in damp, wet weather, or many may be lost from cramp.

Odds and ends.—Keep the drainers at work where necessary; cut and draw home turf for fuel; keep down weeds; turn and pulverize compost heaps, and collect manures, this month.

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,

BOOKSELLERS TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE LORD LIEUTENANT,

HAVE respectfully to invite the attention of the Clergy and others to new Editions of the following Important WORKS, now in course of preparation, and to suggest the desirableness of their taking advantage of the proposed plan of publication.

THE RULE OF FAITH.

"What must I do that I may be saved?"* This is the great question which it behoves every one, to whom the sound of the everlasting Gospel has come, to ask himself, and to which every creed professes to supply an answer. To examine which of these answers is most in accordance with the revealed will of God, is the bounden duty and the inalienable privilege of every man. It is true that all Christian Churches, the Roman Catholic as well as the Reformed, agree in accepting, in a general way, the answer given by the Apostles, Paul and Silas to the above question—viz., "Believe in the Lord Jesus and thou shalt be saved and thy house." But when it is further inquired, in what does this belief consist? What are the doctrines which form essential and indispensable parts of the religion of Jesus? Where are these doctrines to be found? What, in short, is the rule by which our belief or faith is to be guided? No sooner are these additional questions proposed, than a wide diversity of opinion at once becomes apparent, and the characteristic difference between the Church of Rome and the Reformed Churches, especially the Church of these kingdoms, comes into view. The grand fundamental distinction between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant religion consists in this very point, that whilst Protestants maintain that a full and perfect rule of faith is contained in the Scriptures, and that, consequently, these furnish, in and by themselves, a sufficient basis for all doctrines necessary to salvation, the Church of Rome holds that the Holy Scriptures are insufficient by themselves, and that we must admit, in addition to them, a second source, from which some essential articles of faith are derived—viz., Tradition; and that this second source is of equal authority with the first, and independent of it. The following are the authoritative statements of the Church of England and the Church of Rome, respectively, on this subject. The Church of England declares, in her sixth Article, that "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation: so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of the faith, or be thought requisite as necessary to salvation." The Council of Trent, on the other hand, in the Decree concerning the canonical Scriptures, passed in its fourth session, "receives and venerates with equal sentiments of piety and reverence all the books, as well of the Old as of the New Testament, and also the traditions pertaining both to faith and morals, inasmuch as they [the traditions] either came from the mouth of Christ himself, or were dictated by the Holy Spirit, and have been preserved by unbroken succession in the Catholic Church."† Accordingly, Cardinal Bellarmine, who reduces the controversy between [Roman] Catholics and Protestants [whom he calls heretics] to two points, is quite correct when he says: "The first is, we assert that all necessary doctrine, concerning faith and morals, is not expressly contained in the Scriptures: and, therefore, we maintain that, beside the written word of God, there is, moreover, needed the unwritten word—that is to say, divine and apostolical traditions." But they [Protestants] teach that all things necessary for faith and morals are contained in Scripture, and, therefore, that there is no need of the unwritten word."†

Now, before proceeding any further, it is necessary, in order to avoid misapprehension, to understand clearly what is meant by the word tradition, in the sense in which alone it is rejected by the united Church of England and Ireland. Tradition, then, as here employed, denotes a divine revelation concerning matters of faith or morals, not contained in the written word of God;‡ but equally certain, equally divine, equally to-be-reverenced, and consequently, equally obligatory with Scripture itself. In other words, Scripture and Tradition are co-ordinate, independent, and equally venerable sources of doctrine: either of which without the other is not sufficient for salvation. It is in this sense—as an authority upon matters of faith equal to and independent of Scripture—that the Church of these realms rejects tradition. There are other senses of the word, as we shall see hereafter, in which that Church receives with due respect the authority of ancient tradition. It must also be carefully observed, that the reason why Protestants reject traditions relating to matters of faith, is not merely because such doctrines are not contained in Scripture, but because there neither is nor can be certain evidence that they proceeded from our Lord or his inspired messengers. We know perfectly well that a doctrine is, in itself, neither more nor less the word of God for being written or unwritten. We are fully aware that the doctrines now contained in Scripture were, for some time, unwritten traditions.§ We are, consequently, quite prepared to receive, as authoritative and obligatory, any unwritten tradition, provided it can be shown by unquestionable proof to be derived from an inspired origin. We unhesitatingly repeat, that if any doctrine, not contained in Scripture, be offered to us by the Church of Rome, and be, at the same time, authenticated as incontestibly as Scripture is, we will not refuse to accept it as part of our creed. But until it be shown that there are divine and apostolical traditional doctrines, not expressly or implicitly contained in Scripture; that, in accordance with the famous rule of Vincentius of Lerins, a clear, unbroken, universal belief of such doctrines has prevailed in the Church, during all ages, from the first; until this be shown, we dare not expose ourselves to the fearful anathema pronounced by the Apostle St. John, in closing the canon of the Bible, against those who presume to make unauthorized additions to the word of God—"I testify to every one that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book; if any man shall add to these things, God shall add to him the plagues written in this book."—Apoc. xxii. 18.*

Having thus explained the nature of the controversy between Protestants and Roman Catholics respecting the rule of faith, we may now proceed to examine, as much in detail as our limits will permit, the arguments adduced on both sides, with a view to ascertain on which side reason and Scripture are to be found. The question at issue is one of the highest moment, involving as it does the very basis of our faith; so that its discussion may well bespeak the serious and patient attention of every one who is alive to the importance of being able, before men and before the Searcher of hearts, to give a reason of the hope that is in him. We propose, then, to devote the remainder of the present article to a brief statement of some of the arguments on which Protestants rely in support of the position that Scripture alone, without Tradition, is sufficient for all the essentials of salvation. These arguments may be classed under the four following heads:—Firstly, The nature and the design of Scripture. Secondly, The testimony of Scripture to its own sufficiency. Thirdly, The inadequacy of oral tradition, as a vehicle for the transmission of doctrinal truths. Fourthly, The testimony of the Fathers and Doctors of the Church.

I. Scripture is the word of God, and was written by his authority. The Council of Trent "receives all the books as well of the New as of the Old Testament, because that one God is the author of both."—Sess. iv. The New Testament Scripture was written, then, not casually, or by the momentary impulse of the Evangelists and Apostles, but in accordance with the deliberate will and design of God. Some Roman Catholic divines,† indeed, in order to deduce an argument from the occasional origin of the books of Scripture against its being designed as a complete standard of faith, insist much on the fact that we nowhere read in Scripture of our Lord's commanding the Evangelists or Apostles to write the truths which they were commissioned to preach. But, without dwelling on the obvious tendency of this assertion to undermine the great truth of the inspiration of the New Testament, it is sufficient to observe that it contradicts not only the spirit [See Luke i. 3, 4; 2 Pet. i. 15; Is. xxx. 8.], but the letter [See Apoc. i. 11] of Scripture: and that it is at variance with the declaration of the Council of Trent, just quoted, and with the express statements of several of the ancient Fathers.‡ Now, for what imaginable purpose could the New Testament have been written by the will and direction of God, except for preserving to all future ages an authentic record of his revealed word? Roman Catholics deny that Scripture was intended to be a judge in controversy or to teach the Gospel.§ They show abundantly that many have made an evil use of Scripture, and have attempted to support their errors by its words.‖ The question, then, returns with still greater force—Why did God command the Scripture to be written? No other reason can be assigned than that just stated—viz., to preserve an authentic record of His revelation. But if this be so, it will be very difficult to account for only a part of this revelation having been thus perpetuated;

* Acts xvi. 30, Douay Bible, from which all our Scripture quotations are made.

* This distinction between divine and apostolical traditions is founded on the decree of the Council of Trent above quoted—divine traditions denoting those proceeding from Christ himself; apostolical, those proceeding from the Apostles, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. The latter, however, as coming from an inspired source, may also be termed divine, and are so designated by some Roman Catholic divines—e.g., Perrone, Loc. Theolog. Para. ii., sec. 2.

† Bellarm. de verbo Dei., Lib. IV., cap. 3. This famous writer informs us further, that when his Church speaks of the unwritten word, or Tradition, in contradistinction to the written word, or Scripture, it is not meant that traditional doctrines are nowhere written, but only that they were not written by their first authors (l. c cap 2). The early Fathers of the Church are supposed to have committed these traditions to writing, from which mode of conveyance they have been designated, in the Decree concerning Purgatory, passed in the 25th Session of the Council of Trent, "the ancient tradition of the Fathers" (antiqua Patrum traditio). A catalogue of the Fathers, whose writings are looked upon as the principal depositaries of the unwritten word, is given by Cardinal Baronius in his Ann. Eccles., tom. I., p. 412—418. This limitation, however, of dogmatic tradition to doctrines recorded by the earlier Fathers, having been found to be an embarrassing restriction, has been abandoned by the more modern Roman Catholic theologians.

‡ Protestants do not, of course, reject traditions so far as they agree with Scripture. But, on the other hand, we deny that such inherent traditions, as they have been termed, are necessary to those who admit the authority of Scripture. If Scripture be once allowed to be inspired, its testimony is amply sufficient without them. It is quite true that the general consent of the early Christians, as to the truth of any doctrine, that of the atonement, for instance, is a strong collateral proof of the matter of fact that the inspired preachers of the Gospel taught that doctrine, and that our Scriptures, which contain it, are genuine. But this consent does not make the doctrine true: its truth depends solely on its being revealed by God.

§ Dr. Milner, indeed, following Bellarmine, appears to have thought that Scripture was, by far, the less important of the two, or rather not at all essential. "The Christian doctrine and discipline," he says, "might have been propagated and preserved by the unwritten word, or tradition, joined with the authority of the Church, though the Scriptures had not been composed, however profitable these most certainly are." &c.—End of Controv. Let. 2. The passage of Irenæus, which Dr. Milner quotes in connection with this remark, we shall notice hereafter.

* This is one of the great arguments of Roman Catholic theologians in favour of Tradition; and they taunt Protestants with inconsistency, in receiving one set of oral traditions whilst they reject another. The answer, however, is obvious. We receive the traditions recorded in the Bible, because they were recorded by persons divinely commissioned and inspired to do so. We reject all other doctrinal traditions, because, if they existed whilst the Bible was being written, they must have been designedly omitted by the inspired penmen as unnecessary.

† Bellarmine, de Verb. Dei, iv. 3. Milner, End of Controv., Let. viii. Trevern, Disc. Amic. i. 180.

‡ Thus, for instance, Irenæus says (Cont. Hær. lib. iii. c. 1.), "Which [Gospel] they [the Apostles] then indeed preached; but afterwards, by the will of God handed down to us in the Scriptures, to be the pillar and ground of our faith"—(quod [evangelium] tunc quidem præconiaverunt [Apostoli], postea vero per Dei voluntatem in Scripturis nobis tradiderunt, fundamentum et columnam fidei nostræ futurum). St. Augustine also says (de Cons. Evang. lib. i., c. 35), "Whatsoever he [our blessed Lord] wished us to read of his actions and words, this he commanded to be written by them [his Apostles] as if by his own hands"—(quicquid ille de suis factis et dictis nos legere voluit, hoc scribendum illis tanquam suis manibus imperavit).

§ Tourneley, Prel. Theol de Eccl. Christi, i. 291, sq.; Bailly Tract. de Eccl. Chr. i. 291, sq.

especially as most Roman Catholics admit that the Old Testament Scriptures contain the whole of the extant revelations made by God during the elder dispensation.* That some truths should be committed to writing, whilst others equally necessary (according to the Roman Catholic view) were left with totally unequal evidence,† is such an interruption of the general harmony of the divine proceedings, and of the special analogy just noticed with respect to the Old Testament, that we cannot admit its probability without positive and clear evidence that it was God's design to transmit His revelation by these different channels. Vague assertions about the possibility of doctrines equally necessary being intended to be conveyed by totally different and unequal vehicles will not suffice. In the utter absence, then, of anything like positive proof of so startling a proposition, we must conclude the sufficiency of Scripture from its existence. And when we further call to mind that Scripture does make very particular mention of many things which are admitted to be not essential to salvation, such as several rites and temporary regulations, the improbability of the omission of any necessary articles of faith is rendered still more apparent.

II. We come next to the evidence which Scripture itself bears to its own sufficiency. Between Roman Catholics and Protestants there is no dispute as to the authority of the parts of the Bible from which this evidence is taken; so that the testimony of Scripture on its own behalf is here admissible. But, on the other hand, both sides have appealed to the evidence of Scripture on the subject before us—Roman Catholics maintaining that it bears witness to its own insufficiency, whilst Protestants assert the very reverse. We shall quote at present a few of the many passages adduced by the latter, reserving for subsequent consideration those referred to by Roman Catholics.

Deut. iv. 2—"You shall not add to the word that I speak‡ to you, neither shall you take away from it."

Josh. i. 8—"Let not the book of this law depart from thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate on it day and night, that thou mayest observe and do all things that are written in it: then shalt thou direct thy way, and understand it."

Ps. xviii. 8 (xix. 7 in Prot. vers.)—"The law of the Lord is unspotted [Hebrew, perfect], converting souls."

John v. 39—"Search the Scriptures,§ for you think in them to have life everlasting; and the same are they that give testimony of me."

Rom. xv. 4—"For what things soever were written, were written for our learning, that through patience and the comfort of the Scriptures we might have hope."

2 Tim. iii. 15-17—"And because from thy infancy thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which can instruct thee to salvation, by the faith which is in Christ Jesus. All Scripture, inspired of God, is profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice. That the man of God may be perfect, furnished to every good work."

The above and similar passages undoubtedly assert or imply the necessity, perfection, and sufficiency of the written word of God, without the aid of Tradition either as a supplement or an interpreter. It may, indeed, be said, as it has been, that some of them relate only to the Pentateuch, and all of them to the Old Testament; and that, consequently, if they establish the sufficiency of Scripture, they prove the Old Testament, and even the five books of Moses, to be sufficient without the New Testament, and, therefore, prove too much. We answer, that the inference which we deduce from such passages as the above is not that the partial and gradual revelations which it pleased God to make, from time to time, before the advent of the Messiah, are perfect and sufficient in the sense of superseding the necessity of a fuller and more complete manifestation of the Divine will: this would be a contradiction in terms: but our inference is that, in the case of every partial revelation, including the entire of the Old Testament, the written word is declared to be, alone and exclusively, necessary and sufficient for all the purposes which God designed such partial revelations to fulfil; and we conclude, by analogy, that the same is true of the final and complete revelation made under the Christian dispensation. The utter silence of Scripture, in the above and kindred passages, respecting unwritten revelation, is the strongest evidence that no such thing was recognised by Moses, Joshua, David, our Blessed Lord, or St. Paul. This conclusion is fortified when we recollect that Scripture, and it alone, is appealed to in the Bible as the criterion of truth. Thus, in the Old Testament the appeal was "To the law and to the testimony. And if they speak not according to his word, they shall not have the morning light."—Is. viii. 20. And in the new, we read that the Bereans "were more noble than those in Thessalonica, who received the word with all eagerness, daily searching the Scriptures whether these things were so."—Acts xvii. 11. But we may state the case still more strongly. The Scripture is more than silent upon this subject. Tradition is occasionally mentioned, but almost always with disapprobation.* Thus our Lord says to the Pharisees (Mark vii. 8, 9)—"For leaving the commandment of God, you hold the tradition of men. Well do you make void the commandment of God, that you may keep your own tradition." It is not a sufficient answer to say, that the traditions here condemned are either repugnant to God's law or frivolous, and, therefore, have nothing in common with the divine traditions committed to the custody of the Catholic Church. For although it is quite true that the Pharisaical traditions here condemned were either repugnant to God's word or frivolous; still it is equally true that the Pharisees maintained their divine origin, asserting that they were the unwritten word of God, handed down from the time of Ezra, through the Doctors of the law and the members of the Great Synagogue; and so represented them as a supplement to the written word. Yet our Blessed Lord reprobated them in the most unqualified terms, and that, too, on the broad ground that they were traditions of men, as contradistinguished to the commandments of God. Had it been his intention to leave a portion of His own revelation to the safe keeping of oral tradition He would surely have taken occasion here to obviate an almost unavoidable prejudice against such a mode of transmission, arising from His own words, by making that distinction between true and false traditions which Roman Catholics are here compelled to call to their aid. There are, lastly, a number of texts which plainly intimate that the object of committing the word of God to writing was that men should not be left to the vagueness and uncertainty of oral tradition. Thus St. Luke tells Theophilus—"It seemed good to me also, having diligently attained to all things from the beginning to write to thee in order, most excellent Theophilus, that thou mayest know the verity of those words in which thou hast been instructed"—Luke i. 3, 4. St. John also says—"But these are written, that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing you may have life in his name."—John xx. 31. Again, when St. Peter knew that he was near his end, he wrote his second Epistle, in order, as he himself expresses it, "That after my decease also you may often have whereby you may keep a memory of these things."—2 Pet. i. 15.‡ (See also Is. xxx. 8, and the other passages referred to below.)

III. But what is the reason why Scripture discountenances oral traditions, or, at least, omits all allusion to them as co-ordinate authority with the written word? This brings us to our third argument, in support of the Protestant principle of recognising the sufficiency of Scripture alone—namely, the inadequacy of oral tradition as a means for safely transmitting doctrines.§

That oral tradition is, generally speaking, a most precarious vehicle for the accurate transmission even of facts, which are capable of being most fully known, every one readily admits. Much more is this the case with respect of opinions or doctrines which, almost inevitably, receive some colouring in passing through the minds of those who report them. It is notorious that the most honest and trustworthy hearers of the self-same words will often vary materially from each other in the report which they give of them, even under the solemn sanction of an oath, almost immediately after they have been uttered. How vastly this inherent uncertainty is increased by the numerous sources of error arising from lapse of time, distance of place, prejudice, interest, and soforth, it is needless to dwell on. Some of these evils, connected with oral transmission, no amount of care can guard against or remedy. It may, accordingly, be safely asserted, that it would require a continued miracle to preserve, for any length of time, traditional doctrines from even undesigned corruption. Is it, then, conceivable that God would permit important truths, affecting the eternal welfare of His creatures, to be exposed to the inevitable dangers attending such a mode of conveyance as this:‖ especially as there exists a comparatively safe and unexceptionable* vehicle, of which His inspired messengers were expressly directed to avail themselves in the case of other essential verities?

But, it may be said,† God did permit the primitive religion, for many centuries, to be handed down solely by tradition (the art of writing being unknown till the age of Moses); why, then, may not the same be the case, to some extent, under the Christian dispensation? Now, we might reply to this, that there is no certain evidence of the art of writing being totally unknown until the time of Moses, and, consequently, of oral tradition being the sole vehicle by which the primitive revelations were transmitted. But, even admitting the assumed fact, we answer, that, without presuming to inquire into all the reasons why God saw fit to intrust His early revelations to the keeping of oral tradition, there were circumstances connected with the patriarchal times which conferred upon them peculiar advantages for the safe transmission of unwritten truths, and such as never could be shared by subsequent ages. The truths themselves were few and elementary; and the long lives‡ of the patriarchs served as a check on the dangers arising from successive oral communication, by furnishing a kind of permanent standard, by which it was possible, at all times, to adjust these truths. And yet, under a combination of favourable circumstances which never again can recur, tradition then proved an utterly inadequate means for the unimpaired transmission of divine revelation. Notwithstanding, that God kept up the memory of Himself, by repeated revelation—to Enoch and Noah—we find that so universally was religion corrupted in the age of Abraham (only a few centuries after the Flood), that it was necessary to make a new revelation to him.§ This again was repeated to his immediate descendants, Isaac and Jacob; and yet, in the interval between the death of Joseph and the mission of Moses (only a few generations), the faith again appears to have been corrupted, if not lost.‖ Here, then, was a trial of oral Tradition under the most favourable circumstances that can be conceived, and a complete proof of its inadequacy to preserve inviolate the sacred deposit of divine truth Just as the earlier revelations were themselves partial, and, compared with the subsequent ones imperfect, so was the mode of transmitting them also permitted to be imperfect. This is quite in accordance with the principle of gradual progression, which we can trace in all God's dealings with us. St. Paul tells us that the law of Moses was "our pedagogue in Christ" (i.e., our schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ); and, in the same way, we may conclude, God designed that the imperfections of oral tradition should be fully proved, and that on this account, it was permitted to be preliminary and introductory to the safer and more perfect mode which He himself substituted for it, when He imparted a new and fuller revelation to Moses. With His own finger he wrote the ten commandments, brief and simple as they were, on tables of stone, in order that they might remain imperishably recorded.¶ Having thus solemnly initiated the future vehicle of divine truth, He commanded Moses to commit to writing all the other precepts which He vouchsafed to communicate. The Book of the Law, thus written, was deposited in the most sacred part of the sanctuary (Deut. xxxi. 26), and most carefully guarded as a treasure of inestimable value. Thus, then, by God's own ordinance, Scripture was substituted for Tradition, although, as it has been well observed, there were many circumstances connected with the Mosaic law which gave it peculiar facilities for being orally handed down. In a similar manner, during the prophetical period, the prophets were repeatedly directed to commit to writing the messages with which they were charged. Thus we read (Is. xxx. 8)††—"Now, therefore, go in and note it diligently in a book, and it shall be in

* From the allusions which occur in various passages of the New Testament to Jewish traditions, not contained in the Old Testament, it has been inferred by some Roman Catholic controversialists (e.g. Perrone Loc Theol., Para. II., sec. ii., c. 1), that under the old dispensation, no less than the new, tradition was a co-ordinate authority with Scripture. This inference, however, is rather insinuated than broadly stated.

† Roman Catholics cannot fairly deny that the combined evidence of Scripture and tradition is stronger than that of tradition alone If the latter were sufficient by itself, we can hardly suppose that Scripture, which is exposed to such grave inconveniences as they allege, would have been employed at all.

‡ The correct translation of the word here rendered speak is command, as the Protestant version has it, and also the Douay itself at Deut. vi. 6. The reason why the Douay translators here adopted the former term may be collected from Bellarmine, who, on the assumption that the original word means speak, argues that this passage applies only to the unwritten word!

§ See the remarks on this text in our second number, page 14.

‖ For a full discussion of these and kindred passages, see Whitaker, Disputation on Scripture, Quest. vi. chaps. xiv. xv.

* The instances of a contrary kind shall be noticed hereafter.

† See the Note in the Douay Bible on Matt. xv. 9.

‡ The common objection urged by Roman Catholics against the use of these texts in the tradition-controversy—viz., that they prove too much—does not lie against the inference which we have drawn above.

§ It will be observed that, in what follows, the word tradition is employed in a different sense from that in which we have hitherto used it. Heretofore it was taken to denote the doctrine handed down (doctrina tradita); here it means the mode of its transmission (traddendi modus).

‖ It may be asked, How do we know that God does not guarantee their safe transmission by the performance of a perpetual miracle? This is, in fact, the Roman Catholic solution of the difficulty. It is sufficient, at present, to answer, that such an exhibition of miraculous power, for the attainment of an end which might be compassed by the employment of ordinary means, is directly opposed to an admitted law of the Divine administration, viz. Economy in the use of miraculous agency.

* Roman Catholic objections to Scripture, derived from the various abuses of it, are not legitimate grounds of exception.

† This is a favourite argument with Roman Catholic divines—e.g., Bellarmine, Milner, and Delahogue.

‡ Two persons—Methuselah and Shem—might have conveyed the primæval revelation from Adam to Abraham.

§ We learn, from Josh. xxiv. 2, that Abraham's fathers were idolators. We know, from Gen. xxxi. 19, 30, that his nephew, Laban, was one.

‖ The exact religious state of the Israelites, at the time of Moses' mission, it would be difficult to ascertain. From the intimation, however, given in Exod. iii. 13, we may safely conclude that their knowledge of God was, at least, very much dimmed and obliterated.

¶ Some learned men have thought that alphabetic writing was entirely unknown down to this period; and that it was now miraculously communicated for the very purpose of furnishing a safe and permanent medium for the transmission of God's word.

 It is sufficient to notice first, the circumstances of terrific grandeur which accompanied the promulgation of the law on Mount Sinai, and which from their very nature, were calculated to produce a powerful and lasting impression. Secondly. The various rites and anniversary festivals instituted in commemoration of the giving of the laws, or illustrative of its various provisions. Thirdly. The fixing the chief seat of the religion in a single locality. Fourthly. The establishment of a divinely instituted priesthood, whose sole business it was to provide for the due observance and perfect conservation of the religion. Fifthly. The continuance of visible characters of God's miraculous presence—especially the Shechinah, or cloud of glory over the mercy-seat and the oracular responses given by the Urim and Thummim.—See Bp. Burnett on the 6th Art.

†† See also Is. viii. 1; Jer. xxxvi. 2 28, 32; Hab. ii. 2.

the latter days for a testimony for ever;" where it is to be observed, the reason of the injunction is also given—namely, that the words which the prophet delivered might be preserved for future generations. Accordingly, we know nothing—and the fact is a remarkable one, considering the partiality of the later Jews for oral tradition—of the teaching of any of the prophets, save only what is handed down to us by written tradition—viz., the Scriptures of the Old Testament.

If, then, it pleased God to permit a trial to be made, under the most favourable possible circumstances, of the adequacy of oral tradition as a means of securely handing down His revelations; if, upon the total failure of this experiment, He himself introduced, and expressly commanded the continuance of a new and more perfect mode of conveyance; is it reasonable to suppose that in the last, the most perfect, and the only universal revelation of His will, designed for all times and all nations, He would sanction even a partial return to the defective and precarious mode of transmission, which, by His own express injunctions, had been for many centuries discontinued? The bare statement of such a supposition is sufficient to show its utter improbability.

But we are here met by the assertion* that the objections to Tradition, based upon the inherent uncertainty of oral communication, and the unavoidable disturbing influences to which it is exposed, do not apply to the tradition for which Roman Catholics contend. They hold, it is said, that the unwritten word was committed not to any particular fallible individuals, but to the bishops and the whole body of the Catholic Church, to which Christ himself imparted the character of infallibility and indefectibility. In other words, the channel through which the divine and apostolical traditions are transmitted, is secured by the great Head of the Church from every possible danger. The statements of the 20th Article of the Church of England, respecting the authority and office of the Church, are also sometimes brought against Protestants to prove that they virtually admit the Catholic Church to possess the power here claimed for her.

Our limits preclude us at present from doing more than noticing the above so-called unassailable bulwark of Tradition; but we hope, in our next number, to return to the subject, and to complete our proof that the Church of England is justified in asserting, that "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation: so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an Article of Faith, or be thought requisite as necessary to salvation."

IS THE CHURCH OF ROME JUSTIFIED IN WITHHOLDING THE EUCHARISTIC CUP FROM THE LAITY?

This is a grave question, and one in which laymen, for whom we write, have a deep interest. If receiving the holy Eucharist be the most solemn duty of the Christian religion, enjoined upon all his faithful disciples by the Saviour himself, the receiving it aright must be a matter of the utmost moment; and an avoidable error in it can be little short of sacrilege. In expressing this opinion we are doing no more than eminent popes have themselves done, and are almost using their very language.

Pope Gelasius I., who did not die till A.D. 496, expressly says, that to minister the communion in one kind is open sacrilege—"We have found that some, having received only the portion wherein is the holy body, abstain from the cup of the sacred blood; who, without doubt (forasmuch as I know not with what superstition they are taught), should receive the whole sacrament, or be kept from the whole; because the division of one and the same mystery cannot come without great sacrilege."†

And Pope Leo the Great (to whom we have already referred on another important subject) in treating of the Manicheans, writes thus:—"They withdraw themselves from the sacrament of our salvation. With unworthy mouth they receive Christ's body; but they altogether refuse to drink the blood of our redemption, which things we would advertise you of, that both such men may be manifested by these tokens unto you, and also that they, being brought to light, may be thrust out of the church by sacerdotal authority."‡

This denunciation of two eminent popes will, no doubt, startle many of our readers, who are, doubtless, under the conviction that the practice of reserving the sacramental cup for the clergy alone is as ancient as the earliest traditions of the Church, and based upon the divine authority of either our Blessed Lord himself, or, at least, of his immediate Apostles. Is it not asserted by the Church of Rome that all the doctrines and usages of the church are derived either from the written Word of God, or traditions derived from the earliest age of Christianity? Do not most Roman Catholic laymen believe that they are so? Whether they are, in this instance, so derived and so supported, is the question we wish to inquire into, and get at the real truth about. We believe we may, without fear of contradiction, commence by stating, that all parties agree that our Blessed Lord instituted the Eucharist under two kinds. St. Matt. xxvi. 26—"And whilst they were at supper, Jesus took bread, and blessed and brake, and gave to his disciples, and said: take ye and eat; this is my body. And taking the chalice he gave thanks, and gave to them, saying: "Drink ye all of this. For this is my blood of the New Testament, which shall be shed for many unto the remission of sins." It would appear that our Lord laid greater emphasis on the participation of the cup, by enjoining them all to drink of it, than on that of the bread, which he distributed, not with a general injunction, such as "take ye all and eat," but with this simple precept, "take, eat; and as St. Matthew reports him to have said, "drink ye ALL of this," so St. Mark (xiv. 23) relates that "they all drank of it," which shows the strict observance of the command, and the importance attached to it in the minds of the holy Apostles, who, it must be recollected, were indisputably under the unerring guidance of the Holy Spirit himself; who, if errors or abuses were to arise in his Church in after ages, doubtless, in his infinite wisdom, foresaw them, and was thus particular, with a view to their prevention. We venture to assert, that there is not a single passage in the Holy Scriptures which affords any safe ground for a contrary practice, for we consider it by no means clear that the breaking of bread, spoken of in such passages as Luke xxiv. 30, Acts ii. 42, Acts xx. 7, at all refers to the Eucharist, any more than Mark vi. 41, Matt. xiv. 19, Mark viii. 6, when our Lord blessed and brake the loaves and gave them to his disciples long before the institution of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. To break bread was a phrase familiar to the Jews, and implied a distribution of it, meaning no more than sitting at meat with them; and such passages, therefore, afford no argument for withholding the sacramental cup from all but the clergy.

We are nearly as confident that there is nothing in the early Fathers to countenance what Pope Leo and Pope Gelasius so expressly and strongly condemned; but, on the contrary, we mean to show, that in the primitive ages of Christianity, the laity were in the habit of complying with our Lord's injunction, by receiving the Eucharist in both kinds.

St. Jerome tells of the "body of our Lord being carried in a basket, and the blood in a glass vessel, to relieve the poor."* St. Basil says, "that it is good and profitable to partake every day of the blessed body and blood of Christ."† And where he treats of the peculiar virtues of Christians, he asks—"What is proper to him who eats the bread, and drinks the cup of Christ?"

St. Chrysostom draws no distinction between the priest and the laity; but compares all Christians in general with the Israelites—"As thou eatest the body of Christ, so did they manna: as thou drinkest the blood of Christ, so did they water out of the rock."‡ Again—"It is not now as under the Jewish law, when the priest partook of several things from the altar which the people did not: there is no difference between the priest and the people when we come to receive the holy mysteries, for one body and one cup is offered to all."§

It would be easy to multiply testimony on this point from the Fathers, but it appears to be needless, and we prefer proceeding at once to show the true origin of the modern practice of the Church of Rome, and the date of its final ratification, which did not take place till the Council of Constance, A.D. 1414. The doctrine of communion in one kind had, about two centuries before, begun to be agitated by the clergy; and towards the middle of the 13th century, St. Thomas Aquinas, so distinguished for scholastic subtleties, reduced it to a tangible shape, and first proposed the question, as a subject of disputation—viz., whether it was allowable to take the body of Christ without the blood, as it was customary with many churches to do so—at the same time admitting that, according to the custom of the ancient church, all persons, as they partook of the body, so they also partook of the blood."‖

Cardinal Bona admits that, from the origin of the Church to the 12th age, Christians, at all times and in every place, communicated under the species of bread and wine.¶ And Cardinal Bellarmine (De Euch. lib. iv., c. 4) virtually admits the same thing, when alleging the excuse for the change—viz., "that the inconvenience became more and more apparent as the multitude of communicants increased, and so the custom under both species gradually ceased."

The nature of the inconveniences, and also the justification pleaded by the Church of Rome for sanctioning, at the Councils of Constance and Trent, what Pope Leo the Great and Pope Gelasius considered sacrilege, and deserving of excommunication, are both deserving of observation. The former we think futile in the extreme, indeed so trifling, that nothing but a dark and superstitious age could have considered them grave enough to justify a departure from primitive usage, based upon the express commands of our Lord himself. Will our readers believe that, among the inconveniences referred to, as justifying the change, were the following? To avoid the risk of spilling the wine, and the indecency which arose of communicants dipping their beards into it; lest the wine kept for the sick should turn sour; or some persons should not be able to bear its smell and taste, and the like!

We might well smile at such trifling excuses for departing from the established usage of many centuries, did we not think, with Pope Gelasius, that to depart from an express command of our Divine Master, touching the most solemn ordinance of his holy religion, and to establish a new practice at variance with it, is too like open rebellion against Christ to be treated lightly, even though the Council of Constance, A.D. 1414, ventured to oppose its authority to that of the Divine Founder of the institution. Did the Council of Constance deny that our Lord so instituted it? So far from it, the decree of that council sets out with acknowledging "that Christ instituted and administered this blessed sacrament to his disciples in both kinds, of bread and wine . . . . and admitting, that in the primitive Church the faithful received it in both kinds;" and yet goes on to sanction by its authority the very reverse. To show that we are not misrepresenting the decree of the Council of Constance, we think it right to subjoin, in a note, an accurate copy of it in the original Latin, of which the following is a translation:—

"Whereas in some parts of the world there are some who presume rashly to assert that Christian people ought to take the sacrament of the Eucharist under both species of bread and wine, and that the laity should communicate not only under the species of bread, but also under the species of wine; also that they should receive it after supper, or at least not fasting, &c., &c.: hence it is, that this present sacred general council, lawfully congregated, in the Holy Spirit, at Constance, taking care to provide for the safety of the faithful against this error, after mature deliberation of those learned in both divine and human law, declares, decrees, and defines that, although Christ did institute this venerable sacrament after supper, and administered it to his disciples under each species of bread and wine, nevertheless, notwithstanding this (hoc non obstante) the laudable authority of the sacred canons, and the approved custom of the Church, has held, and does hold, that this sacrament should not be consecrated after supper, nor received by the faithful except fasting, unless in case of infirmity, or other necessity, by law or the Church conceded and admitted. And as this custom was reasonably introduced to avoid some dangers and scandals, although, in the primitive Church, this sacrament was received by the faithful under each species, henceforth let it be received by those consecrating it under each species, but by the laity only under the species of bread, &c. Whence, since a custom of this sort was reasonably introduced by the Church and holy Fathers, and has been very long observed, let it be taken for law, which it is not lawful to disapprove, or to change at pleasure without the authority of the Church. Wherefore to say that to observe this custom or law is sacrilegious, or unlawful, ought to be deemed erroneous, and those pertinaciously asserting the contrary of the foregoing, ought to be repelled as heretics, and severely punished by the diocesans of the place, or their officials, or the inquisitors of heretical depravity, in the kingdoms or provinces in which anything shall happen to be attempted or presumed against this decree, according to the canonical and lawful sanctions wholesomely framed in favour of the Catholic faith, and against heretics and their adherents."

We may have, hereafter, to notice the wars in Bohemia and elsewhere, which followed upon this memorable decree; by which the Church, by his own authority, ventured to abrogate and make void an express command of our Blessed Lord and the acknowledged practice of the primitive Church, on no stronger grounds than a custom introduced by reason, to avoid some dangers and scandals which they did not venture to define, though its framers clearly foresaw the opposition which would be made to such a decree, even in that dark age, and by men who did not deny transubstantiation; and, therefore, invoked the whole powers of the Church and Inquisition to punish as heresy any attempt to disobey it. We shall also show how vain were their daring and tyrannical attempts (even when subsequently ratified by the anathemas of the Council of Trent) to compel the whole of Christendom to substitute a custom of the Church in place of a command of its Heavenly Founder, given nearly 1,500 years before—depriving the laity of a sacred right, in order to increase the dignity of the priesthood. Probably, as there is no one point in which the Church of Rome has acted more visibly contrary to the Gospel than in this, so, we think, there is not any one thing which has raised a greater opposition to her, or made more men forsake her communion than this memorable and daring decree. The subject is one of deep interest to every follower of Christ, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, and more especially to laymen, for whom we write, and whose privileges are deeply involved in the controversy. At present, until some graver reasons can be shown for varying from an express command of our Divine Master and the acknowledged practice of the primitive Church, than those above referred to, we shall only ask, whether it was those who disobeyed the Council of Constance, or the Council of Constance itself, who were really guilty of sacrilege, according to the solemnly-expressed judgments of Popes Gelasius and Leo the Great, to which we have already referred our readers?

TO WHOM SHOULD WE PRAY.

THERE is nothing so wonderful but that we cease to be astonished at it, if it is a thing which we do, or see done, every day. When first the electric telegraph or the daguerreotype was talked of, it sounded like a jest to hear of messages being sent hundreds of miles in a few seconds, or of pictures being painted by the sun; and yet, now thousands employ these wonderful inventions as a matter of course, and no doubt in a few years it will almost cease to be a subject of occasional remark how wonderful these inventions are. The very cattle who pasture by a line of railway, and who, at first, are frightened to distraction at the noise of the passing trains, gradually become so accustomed to it that they scarcely lift their heads from grazing when a train rushes by.

Now, of all the wonderful things which we daily see taking place, without wondering at them, there is, perhaps, none which, when we think of it, contains more to astonish us than prayer. When a man is suffering under any distress which neither he nor other men are able to relieve, nothing is more natural or more common than to offer up a prayer to Almighty God for the removal of the affliction. The same man, perhaps, would be too shy to ask a small favour of another man of rank a little higher than his own, or, if he required a favour from one very much his superior, could not venture to speak until he had obtained an introduction from some one likely to have influence with him. And yet, a moment's thought must show how infinitely above him is He whom he addresses so naturally, and often so thoughtlessly. Each of us is but one among millions of inhabitants of the earth; this earth itself but one among millions of worlds, each probably as densely peopled as our own; is it not wonderful, then, that creatures so insignificant as we are should have boldness to address the maker and governor of all things? But the wonder is increased when we remember that we are sinful creatures, and that we who are so ready to ask God for favours, have no right to expect anything at his hands save the penalties due to his offended justice. If, notwithstanding all this, our nature tells us that God has made prayer our instinct and our necessity, we must ask, has he not provided some means to calm that awe and dread which would deter us from approaching him? has he not, perhaps, appointed some being to mediate between us and him, some being not too highly exalted above our nature, but one who we may be confident can sympathize in our sufferings and our frailties?

Now, the Church of England and the Church of Rome are agreed on this, that God has provided such a mediator as we are speaking of; and that in the person of his own Son. He is both God and man, and is thereby peculiarly suited to be the object of our devotions. As God, he has infinite power to assist all his suppliants; as man, he has given proofs of love to us and of readiness to sympathize with us, sufficient to give us confidence in his willingness to help us. And his willingness to help us is not matter of conjecture or of inference; he has promised that the petitions shall be granted which are presented to the Father in his name.

But though, on this point of doctrine, the two churches are agreed, there is a great difference as to the manner in which it is practically received by the members of both communions. We have, in our previous numbers, spoken of the importance that each Christian who is able should study for himself the written Word of God. Any who neglects to do this, even though he may be rightly informed as to the doctrines contained in Scripture, runs the risk of not having them impressed on his mind in the same relative importance which they hold in the Bible. For example, we believe that the doctrine that our Blessed Lord was perfect man, although a doctrine which no Christian will formally deny, is one which forms no part of the practical creed of those Roman Catholics who are not familiar with the Bible. It is as God that such a one almost exclusively regards our Saviour; as the future judge of mankind, who shall hereafter appear, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on those who know not God. It is no wonder, then, that, from dwelling exclusively on this awful side of our Lord's character, they should well nigh cease to look on him as the mediator through whom we are to draw nigh to the Father, and that they should seek for other mediators, through whom we may approach to him. Another circumstance which contributes to produce the same effect is the fact, that the ordinary pictorial representations of our Lord relate, for the most part, only to the two extreme points of his sojourn on earth. He is commonly pictured either as an infant in his mother's arms, or as in the agonies of death on the cross; and as neither of these representations bring him before the mind as one ready to hear and answer the requests of his people, those who have not some other means of studying his character are in danger of losing sight of some of the most important practical lessons taught us by our Saviour's incarnation.

But very different is the case of those whose knowledge of our Lord's nature is derived from the Gospel narratives, and who, consequently, have read not merely of the beginning and the end, but of all his life; who know that he is represented by the evangelists as perfect man, taking part in all in which man may without sin engage; censured by the self-righteous of his day for the readiness with which he would enter any scene of innocent festivity; yet still more ready to enter as a comforter and help into the house of sickness or of mourning; and as he called himself, the friend of his disciples, their teacher, their counsellor, their intercessor. It is perfectly impossible for any one who has thus studied the character of Jesus Christ when he was on earth, and who believe that he is the same now, to suppose that he will consider the distresses of his suppliants beneath his attention, or to imagine that they can find other intercessors more compassionate, or more patient, or more forgiving. It is remarkable that it is recorded on several occasions, in the Gospels, that our Lord heard the petitions which those about him would have had him spurn, and dealt mercifully with the sins which his disciples would have had him punish. For example:—Luke xviii. 35—43. Mark x. 13—14. Luke ix. 51—56. Matt. xv. 21—28, which we give verbatim from the Douay Bible.

"Luke xviii. 35 to 43.

"Now it came to pass, when he drew nigh to Jericho, that a certain blind man sat by the wayside begging:

"And when he heard the multitude passing by, he asked what this meant.

"And they told him, that Jesus of Nazareth was passing by.

"And he cried out, saying: Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me.

"And they that went before rebuked him, that he should hold his peace: but he cried out much more: Son of David, have mercy on me.

"And Jesus standing, commanded him to be brought unto him; and when he was come near, he asked him,

"Saying: What wilt thou that I do to thee? But he said: Lord, that I may see.

"And Jesus said to him: Receive thy sight; thy faith hath made thee whole.

"And immediately he saw, and followed him, glorifying God. And all the people, when they saw it, gave praise to God."

"Mark x. 13, 14.

"And they brought to him young children, that he might touch them. And the disciples rebuked them that brought them.

"Whom when Jesus saw, he was much displeased, and saith to them: Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God."

"Luke ix. 51 to 56.

"And it came to pass, when the days of his assumption were accomplishing, that he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem,

"And he sent messengers before his face; and going, they entered into a city of the Samaritans, to prepare for him.

"And they received him not; because his face was of one going to Jerusalem.

"And when his disciples, James and John, had seen this, they said: Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come done from heaven and consume them?

"And turning, he rebuked them, saying: You know not of what spirit you are.

"The Son of Man came not to destroy souls, but to save. And they went into another town."

"Matt. xv. 21 to 28.

"And Jesus went from thence, and retired into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon.

"And, behold, a woman of Canaan, who came out of those coasts, crying out, said to him: Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David: my daughter is grievously troubled by a devil.

"Who answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying: Send her away, for she crieth after us;

"And he answering, said: I was not sent but to the sheep that are lost of the house of Israel.

"But she came and adored him, saying: Lord, help me.

"Who answering, said: It is not good to take the bread of the children and cast it to the dogs.

"But she said: Yea, Lord; for the whelps also eat of the crumbs that fall from the table of their masters.

"Then Jesus answering, said to her: O woman, great is thy faith; be it done to thee as thou wilt; and her daughter was cured from that hour."

We have added the last passage because it is the only one in the Gospels where the disciples appear to have been more ready to do a work of mercy than their Lord; and yet, when we examine the history, we find that the disciples' intercession proceeded, not from compassion but from selfish impatience, to get rid of the woman's importunities, while our Lord's first refusal proceeded not from want of compassion, but from a desire to draw her forth to fuller exercises of faith, which he was about richly to reward.

The case, then, stands thus:—It is true that, weak and sinful as we are, we might naturally find it difficult to come with any confidence to present requests to our justly offended God; but it is also true that God has, in his mercy, anticipated the difficulties which it was natural for us to experience, and has presented to us the human nature of Christ as a tangible object for our affections to take hold of, and through which we might be brought near to God. It is certain that God has made him known to us as our intercessor, as perfectly able to hear every request made to him, able also to grant it, and full of love and willingness to help all who seek his aid, as having also promised to grant requests made in his name. Now, if all this be true, can anything be more perverse than, notwithstanding all, to fly to other mediators, to whose intercession no promise has been given, with regard to whom we have no certainty (nothing beyond doubtful conjecture) whether they can know that we are addressing them at all, and no certainty that, if they do hear, they are able to procure the fulfilment of our requests; and who, we may also be sure, are infinitely inferior in love and compassion towards us to him who gave his life for our sakes? And it must be remembered, that recourse to such other mediators is admitted on all hands not to be divinely appointed. The Church of Rome herself only asserts that it is permitted us (not commanded) to seek the intercession of the saints; and the Roman Catholic who shall resolve from this day forth to offer prayers to none but God, would violate no precept of his church. It would surely, then, seem to be the safest way to direct all our prayers to him to whom we are commanded to pray, and who has promised to hear our prayers; rather than to those to whom we have no command to pray, and with regard to whom it is doubtful whether they can hear our prayers or not.

We have thus given some reasons for thinking that it is needless for any one who believes the doctrine of our Lord's incarnation to seek for any other intercessor. We hope in our next number to show that the directing our prayers to others is worse than merely useless, that it is productive of mischievous practical consequences.

THE CURÉ AND THE BISHOP.

(Abridged from the French.)

IN a retired village in France there lived, not long ago, a good curé, in the midst of two or three hundred parishioners. One Sunday, when returning from saying the mass, he was reflecting upon the little benefit his people could have derived from it, he came upon a dozen of them, who were chatting together before the door of the church. It occurred to him that a familiar conversation with these simple country people might be more useful to them than chaunting vespers to them in Latin; so he stopped in the midst of them, seated himself on a stone, and leaning his two hands on the top of his walking-stick, he said, in a good-humoured tone—

"Tell me, John, are you a Christian?"

tanquam hæretici arcendi sunt, et graviter puniendi per diœcesanos locorum, seu officiales eorum, aut inquisitores hæreticæ pravitatis in regnis seu provinciis, in quibus contra hoc decretum, aliquid fuerit forsan attentatum aut præsumptum, juxta canonicas et legitimas sanctiones, in favorem Catholicæ fidei, contra hæreticos et eorum fautores, salubriter ad-inventas.—Labb. et Coss., vol. xii., p. 99, &c., Par. 1672.

"Why, yes, Mr. Curé," replied John, quite astonished.

"And how did you become a Christian?"

"How! Why, because you baptized me, when I was quite little, and so I am a Christian."

"Well, but my good fellow, do you think that that thief whom the police arrested, last month, on the highway, and who was condemned yesterday to ten years at the galleys, for having stolen 8,000 frs. from our notary—do you think that robber was a Christian?"

"Certainly not."

"Yet, like yourself, he had received baptism when he was a child. You see, therefore, it is not merely baptism that makes a Christian. And you, George, are you a Christian?"

"Yes, I am."

"And why?"

"Because I've made my first communion."

"Well, you have heard speak of Cartouche?"

"Yes; sometimes."

"Was he a Christian?"

"No; he was a robber, like Maudrin."

"Yet, my friend, both Cartouche and Mandrin had received their first communion. You see, therefore, that the communion does not constitute a Christian."

Our worthy peasants looked at each other, as if they did not know what their good curé was at.

He continued—"Mr. Schoolmaster, you can better inform me, I dare say, what renders you a Christian?"

The schoolmaster, persuaded the curé had selected him to decide the difficulty to the satisfaction of all, was, for a moment, greatly flattered to hear himself thus appealed to; so, after having coughed and cleared his throat, he replied—"I am a Christian:

"1st. Because I go every Sunday to mass.

"2ndly. Because I go to confession every month.

"3rdly. Because I observe the penances imposed; I recite my Pater Nosters; I keep the fasts, Lent, and all the rest."

"Your answer is longer than the others (the pedagogue looked well pleased with this commencement), but it is worth no more (the schoolmaster made a grimace); for you know," continued the curé, "that all hypocrites, who trade in religion, all go to mass, fast, recite their Paters, observe their penances; yet these hypocrites are not Christians."

The auditors were all taken by surprise; every one feared to be questioned. A child, about ten years of age, who was present, alone remained unconcerned. It was to this child the curé now addressed himself, "Tell me, little Joseph, what must one do to be a Christian?"

"Sir, we must love God and be very good."

"Blessed art thou, Heavenly Father," exclaimed the pastor, "because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes.—Matt., c. 11. Yes, my friends, that which constitutes the Christian are the feelings of his heart. He who has faith in Jesus Christ, as having obtained for him forgiveness of his sins, and who, being thus pardoned loves God with all his heart, and loves his neighbour as himself, he is a Christian. In two words, religion does not consist in ceremonies performed by our feet, our hands, or our months; it consists in the faith and love of our hearts to Jesus Christ."

Here the curé ended the conversation, and withdrew. His words, which had so completely astonished our good peasants, will not so much surprise the reader, when he is told that the curé had for some time past devoted himself to reading a large book which he had inherited from an uncle, and that this study, in which he was seen to be engaged morning and evening, preceded and followed by prayer, had more than once caused the good man to forget his Breviary, and had modified his religious opinions. He thought he saw in his church more than one thing which was not good, but not being yet quite clear about it, he continued at the same time to read his book and to say the mass. But this time he had wounded the self-esteem of the schoolmaster, who, to revenge himself, reported the aforesaid conversation to the vicar; he, wishing to have the curé's post, wrote to the bishop, and the Thursday following the curé received from his superior, who was at the same time his uncle and his friend, the following letter—

"My dear Nephew, and Brother in Jesus Christ, I have been told that, last Sunday, you held in your church a conversation, the consequence of which will be to bring into contempt all the holy practices of our church, and to place the salvation of man beyond the influence of the priest. You must feel how dangerous such doctrines would be: I wish, therefore, to believe that your words were ill-understood or misrepresented, and that, without doubt, you meant to say that all these practices ought to be accompanied by the sentiments of the heart, but that practices and sentiments are equally necessary; that if faith and repentance be necessary on the part of the believer, the intervention of the priest is not less necessary to receive that faith, to accept that repentance, and to render of avail the sacraments of Baptism, of Confirmation, of Extreme Unction, &c., without which there can be no salvation. I hope that you will be able to answer me in this sense; and also to explain yourself thus in your next exhortation at Mass. —I salute you," &c.

The curé read and re-read this letter; he found in it something which hurt both his heart and his understanding—yet he did not quite know how he would reply to it—he did not reply; he waited, and during this time it was perceived that he shut himself up oftener in his study to pray and read his great book, as might be perceived from that part of his garden towards which his window looked. At length, after some weeks of study, he sent an earnest and respectful reply, which, however, was so far from satisfying the bishop that, three days after, he sent one to take our curé's place, and invited the curé to come and spend some weeks with him. The bishop was a respectable old man, sincere and of good faith. No doubts had ever arisen in his mind against the authority of his Holy Mother Church; therefore, as a respectful and submissive son, he had subjected his body to its most minute observances; his health had even suffered thereby: ever seeking an internal peace which he could not find, experiencing the want of assurance of his salvation, he added pilgrimages to fasts: to pilgrimages hair-cloth next his skin, all which had greatly fatigued his body, without tranquillizing his soul. He was always asking himself, whether he had done sufficient to gain heaven, and he trembled at the thought that he was still, perhaps, some steps off, perhaps, at the threshold—yet still liable to fall into hell! Then fresh abstinences, fresh fears, and thus life flowed away; divided between the sufferings of his body and the anguish of his mind. The reader can understand from this the end he had in view, when he summoned the poor curé; he hoped to bring him back to opinions more conformable to his church, from which he saw he was rapidly wandering. The curé obeyed the invitation of his bishop, who said nothing to him at first, but received him with kindness. The next day, to be free from interruptions, the bishop set off with him into the country, where there were no witnesses, except three or four children, who were minding a flock at a little distance. During a walk in the park, he entered at length on the subject. "Tell me, my dear nephew, where did you pick up these new doctrines, so opposed to those of the church? Must not Satan have suggested them to you?" "No, my lord, it was the Bible." "That is then the reason, that you have distributed in your parish a hundred copies of this book, as I am told." "My lord, I did not think I could do wrong in placing before the eyes of the faithful the word which God has addressed to all." "But do you not perceive that the common people cannot understand this book, which ought only to be read and explained by the priest?" "No, I do not see that, I find, on the contrary, that God has judged that all can comprehend it, since he has enjoined the reading of it to all; for Jesus said to the Jews—'Search the Scriptures,' and the Psalmist has said—'The law of the Lord is perfect, restoring the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple.'—Psalm xix. Moses desires the king to read the law every day of his life. He says to all the people—'Put my word in your hearts, bind it on your hands, inscribe it on your houses.' St. Luke commends the inhabitants of Berea, because they compared the preaching of St. Paul with the word of God. St. Paul, when writing his epistles to the different churches, does not address himself solely to the priests, but he says—'To you, who are at Rome;' 'To all those who are in Achaia.' If all the Israelites in the time of Moses, all the Jews in the time of Jesus Christ, all the inhabitants of Rome and of Achaia might read the Bible, I do not see why all the Christians of our day should not read it also."

"But do you not know," replied the bishop, "that the Bible is obscure, and cannot be understood by all."

"You shall judge," said the curé, smiling. He made a sign to the children who were tending the flock to approach, and when these children, of from ten to twelve years old, had ranged themselves in a semicircle before the bishop, the curé said to the youngest—"My child, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy mind!' Do you understand me?"

"Oh! yes, Mr. Curé, we must love the blessed God."

"And you, my child, listen—'There is none righteous: there is none that doeth good.' Do you understand?" The child cast down his eyes; he had so well understood the words that his conscience had at once applied them to himself, and as he had just been striking one of his companions in a quarrel, he replied—

"It was he who began; he gave me a kick also."

"It was your fault," said the other.

"No," said a little girl, "it was both of them."

"Well, my little friend," said the curé, "listen—'Christ has died for our sins; there is no more condemnation for those who are in Christ; believe in the Lord Jesus and thou shalt be saved.' What does that mean, my child?"

"It means that God will pardon our sins if we look to Jesus Christ."

"Now, you," said the curé to the fourth, "listen—'If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally.' 'Pray without ceasing.' What do these words mean?"

"Stay; that means that we must pray to God to make us good."

"Quite right, my children; fight no more, love Jesus Christ, who died to obtain the pardon of your sins; ask God to make you good, and you will go to heaven." The children went off quite delighted.

"Well," said the curé to his bishop, "it appears these children understood my words."

"That is not surprising," said the latter, "they were so simple."

"Yet, these words, so simple, are precisely those of the Bible; and if these children can understand them, it is to be supposed their fathers and mothers would understand them also."

"Yes; but all the pages of the Bible are not as clear as those you have quoted."

"I grant it; but even if the simple believer had only understood these four passages out of the whole Bible, would it not be enough to make it worth his while to read it? Besides, experience and good sense unite to prove, that after the Bible has been read with prayer for some time, the most simple reader will soon find an easy passage help him to understand another less clear; that which he has mastered will help him to understand what still remains to be learned, and thus difficulties are gradually cleared away. When a friend addresses a letter to us, of which some words are indistinct or blotted, we do not on that account reject the sheet of paper; we read it a second and a third time, until what precedes and what follows enable us to understand the illegible words."

"But," answered the bishop, rather embarrassed how to get rid of these reasonings, "is it not better to submit the Bible to the interpretation of councils, whose decisions are directed by the Holy Spirit, according to the promise of Jesus Christ?"

"But," returned the curé, without hesitation, "why should the Holy Spirit, who can direct the decisions of councils, not direct also the mind of the simple believer, who implores it with humility? For this promise of Jesus Christ was not made to Councils only, but to all whom the Lord shall call."

"But, then, if each one may pretend to read the Bible, you will have as many creeds as individuals; while, in submitting the Bible to the interpretation of councils, we should have one uniform faith."

"I do not believe it; for how will uniformity be better attained by reading the decrees of councils than by reading the Bible? Will it be more easy to understand the Latin of the Council of Trent than the Latin of the Vulgate? No; but the priest is there to interpret to the simple believer the decrees of the council. But even so, will it be more easy for the believer to understand the French of his curé from the pulpit, than the French of De Sacey, in the translation of the Bible? Be it Latin for Latin, or French for French, I would rather read the text than the commentary. The Bible is worth more than the explanations, unless we pretend, that when God speaks, men know better what he means to say than he does himself, and that men have more capacity to make themselves understood."

"Finally," said the bishop, with some impatience, "what do you mean to conclude from all this?"

"I conclude that, since the Bible is the Word of God, every man is bound to go and draw from that Word the rule of his faith and conduct, without any one having the right to impose any other upon him; and that, if the simple believer ought to listen to his pastor, it is only so far as the pastor speaks conformably to the Bible. Then, the faith of the Christian will be an enlightened faith, and so much the more firm, as it shall be more intelligent. Then the Christian will be able to say in his conscience, that he obeys God rather than man, since he draws from the book which all Christian communions (the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman Church also) are obliged to recognise as the source of all religion, as the Word of God. Is it not at the source that the water of a rivulet is most limpid and clear? Does not every step it flows through the clay and mud of this earth contribute to pollute it? Well, in the same way, will not religion be most pure at its source, in the mouth of God, and will not every step made in passing from mouth to mouth tend to corrupt it? Give, therefore, the Bible to the people, and they will then understand that it is not mere vain ceremonies that can save the sinner, but the blood of Christ alone, and the renewal of the heart by the Holy Ghost." The curé spoke with so much warmth, that the bishop saw he should never succeed in making him abandon this new course by mere persuasion. He brought into play, therefore, turn by turn, the fear of hindering his advancement in the church, the menaces of the condemnation of Rome, &c. But all was useless; the curé always returned this answer—"Show me by the Bible that I am mistaken, and then I shall be ready to submit."

And he bore with resignation all the petty persecution raised against him. A few months later, the bishop fell seriously ill: he grew worse day by day: the fear or rather the certainty of an approaching death, doubled his terrors, as to the uncertainty of his salvation. He tried to re-assure himself, and wondered he was not able. In vain did he repeat to himself that few saints had submitted to austerities so severe and so numerous as he; his conscience still reminded him of sin, and made him fear that he had not yet performed penances enough to expiate his faults before him "who is of purer eyes than to behold evil." In this state of trouble, he recalled to mind the peace, the calm which the curé seemed to enjoy while he was with him; and the thought that that peace of mind was, perhaps, the fruit of his new religious convictions, gained strength in his mind. In the prospect of death, people care little for the opinion of the world, which they care so much for in the time of health: the bishop, therefore, sent for his nephew, and told him that he desired to converse with him on serious subjects. The curé came to the dying man. When the bishop saw him enter, he said—"You are welcome; take a seat, and let them leave us alone for a few minutes." When all had withdrawn, the curé, after closing the door, sat down by the bed of his uncle, who said in a sad and solemn voice—"My dear friend, I have no time to lose, and, therefore, without any disguise, I come to the point at once. You know my life, you know that I have acquitted myself, and scrupulously, in the duties of my religion, and yet, I confess, in the prospect of appearing before God, even after having received the holy sacrament for the last time, I tremble at the thought of presenting myself at the tribunal of my Judge! Some overpowering voice within me tells me that I am not ready to appear, and I feel I do not enjoy, in my dying hour, that Christian calmness which can see death approach without fear, and even welcome it with joy. I have observed in you, my dear brother, this precious peace, and even when harassing you for your doctrines, I was internally struck by the composure which they produced in your soul. Oh! tell me quickly, I entreat of you—how did you obtain it?"

"I can tell you," replied the curé, "for I have been myself in the state of mind in which I now find you. In examining my life, I discovered each day new imperfections; the more I tried to live holily, the more I felt sin weigh on my conscience. If I performed a good action in the eyes of the world, I felt that it was bad in the sight of God, because vanity or pride had always some share in it. If I forced myself to make a resolution in the sight of God, at the moment when I was deciding to do good, I found some interested motive also, urging me to it, and thus polluting it. Finally, I came to hate myself. I held life in horror, and what increased my terrors was, that I found, in reading my Bible, such declarations as these: 'The wages of sin is death!' 'Cursed is every one who continueth not in all things written in the book of the law to do them!' 'Whosoever shall have kept the whole law, and yet have offended in one point, is guilty of the whole.' One day I thought I should lose my senses, and, in despair, I cast myself on my knees, striking my breast, and exclaiming, O my God! take pity on me, I am a great sinner; what must I do, what must I do to be saved? I rose, and opening my Bible, I cast my eyes on it, and there I found the very words I had just uttered, 'What must I do to be saved?' Struck by this coincidence, I hastened to read the words which followed. It was precisely the reply to my question, thus—'BELIEVE IN THE LORD JESUS CHRIST AND THOU SHALT BE SAVED.' Believe, and thou shalt be saved, said I. What! it is sufficient to believe! I thought I must have misunderstood. I re-read these words, and I found again and again, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved.' In order to throw light on this thought, I looked at other passages in my Bible, which treated of the same subject, and which were indicated by references. I found a great number of which the sense always was, 'Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, thy sins shall be pardoned, and thou shalt receive eternal life.' I confess, however, that this faith which was required of me, this salvation so freely offered me, all this was at first in my head, without reaching my heart, when one day the words of the Gospel, 'BY GRACE ARE YE SAVED,' fell like light into the depth of my soul. Grace! oh! now I understand, cried I; I was condemned to hell, like a felon to the scaffold, and when ready to perish, my King sends me a pardon. I understand—I owed my Master a heavy debt of sins, and my God has cancelled them. I owe it to his grace. Now, I understand this word. How sweet it is, how powerful to chase from my heart all fear! Now, whether I die or live, I am saved! What love my God has shown for me; and now that I am saved by his grace, what love I must have for him. How delightful to do his will! How willingly will I sacrifice myself to his service and to the good of my brethren, who know not yet what this grace is—the pardon, the love of God! Grace! this word encompassed all my soul, and since then an ever-increasing peace has spread itself through my heart. I experienced the reality of that promise of Jesus, 'My peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.'—John xiv. Since then I have known no greater happiness than labouring to do the will of my God. Without doubt, I still fall into sin frequently, but I never rise without trembling; and without gaining, even from those falls, new strength by which to stand firm for the future. Since that time, I have been full of an ardent desire to make known this good news to my brethren; and I am happy, indescribably happy, when I see my words fall on a heart well prepared, and another soul escape hell by turning to the Saviour."

"But, my dear brother," interrupted the bishop, moved by these words of fire—"Who guarantees you that that assurance of your salvation which you believe you experience is truly a reality, ratified in heaven by God himself, and that it is not purely the fruit of your imagination?"

"I have, as a guarantee, the witness of the Holy Spirit, which I bear in my heart, and which made St. Paul say—'That the Spirit of God witnesseth with his spirit that he was adopted of God.' I know that the world may tell me that this is also the fruits of my imagination. But what matters it what the world says and thinks? It is sufficient for me, to feel it is otherwise. I say to all, ask God for his Spirit to enlighten you, and you will obtain it to sanctify you. If people put my counsel in practice, they soon find the truth of it, and I thank God for it. If they believe me not and mock me, I am not the less assured of my salvation. I pray for the unbeliever, and I always hope for him: I know that God can convert him, even at the last hour. Yes, my dear uncle, it is not in yourself that you must look for your salvation—your works, always imperfect, can never give you security. You need a Saviour, powerful, perfect, holy; you need Jesus Christ the Son of God, God manifest in the flesh. It is only with such a support that you will no longer fear to fall, and such an advocate with God, that you will be assured from condemnation." During the following days, the two friends had several other conversations. The bishop grew weaker and weaker, but at the same time his soul seemed to gain new strength; he listened much more than he spoke. He made his nephew read to him different parts of the New Testament, amongst others, the Epistle to the Romans, and that to the Galatians. At length, one Sunday evening, as his nephew, kneeling at the foot of his bed, concluded a prayer in these words:—"My God, we look not to ourselves, nor to our works, but solely to Jesus Christ to save us"—The bishop raised his eyes to heaven, and pronouncing these words—"Amen, Lord, amen," he breathed forth his last sigh.

THE BLESSING OF LITERATURE.

Many who have not the advantage of wealth or high standing in society, are apt to repine at their situation—to regret that they are debarred from much refined and intellectual intercourse; but this deprivation is in a great measure ideal; there is an intercourse far more intelligent than that of any living society whatever—the great commonwealth of letters—which knows no distinction of persons, admits of no adventitious superiority, where everything is rated at its real value, and reduced to its legitimate standard. Whatever may have been the rank of authors, the wealth or consequence attaching to their living persons, they exact no further homage; they are entertained without expense, dismissed without ceremony; they are at once our preceptors, masters, servants; they come or go at our bidding; they speak or are dumb at our pleasure. We open the book, its eloquence streams upon us; we close the leaves, it is instantly sealed in silence. We have the best thoughts of the best men in the best possible form; we benefit by a close communion with great and shining characters, without being annoyed by the foibles and eccentricities, which appear to be more particularly inherent in genius. Had we lived in the same time, and possessed the intimacy of Dr. Johnson, we should have been shocked to find that, with all his intelligence and strength of mind, he was contracted in principle, insolent and overbearing in argument. We should have blushed for the tarnished honour of our common nature, to think that so great a mind as Addison's could have been meanly jealous of contemporary worth. And as we all know, poor Goldsmith amidst innumerable follies and foibles, was so great a glutton of praise that he considered the applause bestowed upon a rope-dancer unjustly diverted from himself; and, in the presence of Dr. Johnson and several others, actually broke his shins in a clumsy attempt to prove he could surpass him. In books are treasured up the matured fruits of the greatest and most cultivated minds; they contain the pure and condensed intelligence of the human mind, without any proportionate alloy of its passions and weaknesses. Thus the noblest conceptions of our nature are preserved in the odours of language, as formerly the bodies of the great and noble were embalmed in perfumes. In reading history, for instance, we participate in the actions of the illustrious dead, and exchange with pleasure the dull monotony of our own existence for the glorious achievements and enthusiasm of theirs. Under the pen of the historian, the events of time undergo a refining and condensing process; it retains all that is worth preserving—the kernel, without the husks or shell. We thus engage in war without the peril of a wound, and accompany the voyager without encountering the dangers of the seas.—Professor Calvert's Lecture on Reading, delivered in the Mechanics' Institution, Liverpool.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We beg to acknowledge the communication of "Catholicus," bearing the post mark of Kingstown. We have only been prevented by press of matter from already redeeming our pledge respecting the reply to His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin's essay, entitled "The Search after Infallibility," which appeared in our first and second numbers. The subject is one of the greatest importance; and "Catholicus" will not find that we shall shrink from the fullest discussion of both sides of the question.

We have received a letter in reply to the Rev. W. Carson, of Waterford, from the Rev. R. A. Wilson, of Glasgow, the great length of which rendered it impossible to insert it in our present number; also several other communications which we are obliged to omit for want of space. We would earnestly request all our valued contributors, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, to limit the length of their communications, so as not only to prevent disappointment to themselves, but increase the facility of insertion in a periodical so limited in space as the CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith.

Subscriptions are earnestly solicited, which our friends will observe are payable in advance. The amount may be forwarded either in postage stamps or a post-office order, payable to Mr. William Curry, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JUNE, 1852.

ON THE USE OF THE FATHERS.

THE number of letters which have already been written to this journal by Roman Catholics is a fact not only gratifying to ourselves, but important, as showing that educated and intelligent Roman Catholic laymen are sensible of the necessity of discussion, and that they are disposed to enter upon it with those who come forward to discuss in a fair and candid manner. We conceive it to be our duty to endeavour, calmly and reasonably, to lead this discussion into the most useful and practical direction, by appealing to men's reason and sober judgment.

It has struck us rather forcibly, that while our Roman Catholic correspondents do generally profess to be men of humble station and without learning, they show a much greater readiness to appeal to "the Fathers" than to the words of Christ, and the teaching of his Apostles. We, therefore, think it right to call attention to "the use of the Fathers," and we entreat our Roman Catholic readers to give a candid consideration to what we have to say. We must be brief; but we will endeavour to give a brief illustration, which may throw some light on the subject.

We are sure that none of our readers will say that the Fathers knew the truth better than Christ or the inspired Apostles. All Roman Catholics admit that every one of the Fathers was liable to fall into error, while the Apostles were divinely secured from all error. Is it safer or better to appeal to those who may err, or to those who cannot err?

The utmost that can be said is, that we may understand the Fathers better than the Scripture, and learn more easily from them. And this we will examine.

We have a vast collection of books, written by bishops, clergy, and Catholic laymen, of the first twelve centuries. All these commonly go under the name of "the Fathers." A man of great learning, and who could give his whole time to it, might manage to read these books through in his lifetime. But it may be fairly said, that a priest in charge of a parish could not do so (even if he could get the books, which not one in a thousand can), much less can a layman, who has the business of this life to attend to.

The Bible is one small book, translated into English, which the poorest man can have. "The Fathers" are a thousand ponderous folio books, in Latin and in Greek, of which not one man in a thousand can see even the outside. Which may we more easily hope "to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest?"

Again—in these thousand books there is a vast deal which goes under the name of "the Fathers," which is rank forgery: Other people wrote them in later times, and fathered them upon the Fathers. For instance, we have more than fifty Decretal Epistles, or letters, which profess to be written by the thirty-eight earliest Popes or Bishops of Rome. If these letters had really been written by those Popes, they would have been truly important. But they are, every one, FORGERIES! No Roman Catholic writer of credit can now be found who would venture to say that any one of those Popes ever wrote one word of them. This is now so universally confessed that it is needless to stop to prove it; but if ever the proof be wanting, we have it ready.

Yet it is certain that, for many hundreds of years, those Catholics who professed to learn from the Fathers, rather than from the Bible, did all believe that those letters were really written by the Popes whose names they bear, and did mainly rely upon them for learning the Catholic religion. And to such an extent did this delusion go, that Gratian's Decretum (a book written in the twelfth century, and which is still a main part of the Canon Law of the Church of Rome) relies chiefly on these forged letters to prove the authority of the Pope over the Catholic Church. Was not this an awful delusion for Catholics to fall into? Can any man in his senses believe that those Catholics who took these "forged letters" for their guide, had a better chance of finding truth than if they had searched for it in the words of Christ, and in the teaching of his Apostles?

In the last three hundred years, learned men (most of them Roman Catholics) have done much in detecting some forgeries; and up to the present day, writings which have not hitherto been questioned, are, from time to time, proved to be forgeries; affording ground for believing that much of what still passes for genuine may yet appear to be forged; and this in the decrees of Councils, as well as in the writings of Fathers. For instance, the decrees of the earliest Council that conferred general powers on the Bishop of Rome—viz., the Council of Sardica, A.D. 347—have never yet, that we know of, been challenged as forgeries, and yet we are persuaded that any fair jury of twelve men, hearing and considering the evidence that could be brought forward, would pronounce those decrees palpable forgeries. We invite learned Roman Catholics to consider and discuss this question.

Again—besides all this, there is, in what are commonly called the works of the Fathers, a vast proportion that never was written by the Father whose name it bears. After printing was invented, search was made in libraries, and monasteries, for all the works of St. Augustine, for instance. Everything which was then supposed to be written by him was published together as a collection of his works. In later times, the labours of learned men (and in this the Benedictine monks have been distinguished) have proved that a vast number of these works were never written by the Fathers to whom they were at first attributed. An instance of this has already appeared in our third number, in which the book "De Sacramentis," is quoted by "A Catholic Layman," as giving the judgment of St. Ambrose, but which we have shown, from the testimony of Du Pin and the Benedictine monks, was never written by St. Ambrose. These writings are not forgeries, because there is no reason to suppose that the persons who wrote them intended to pass them as the works of the Fathers whose names they now bear. We call these works "spurious, and of no authority:" they were commonly written by obscure persons: we know not who; and in much later times. All these spurious works are still generally published among the works of the Fathers whose names they bear, but generally with notes by the editors, stating whether they consider them genuine or spurious. But, notwithstanding all that has yet been done in distinguishing them, there is still among the printed works of almost every Father of chief importance, a considerable proportion of which the editors cannot say, with any certainty, whether the Father wrote those works or not. And how are we to know what the real opinions of that Father really were, upon the whole, until we know whether he did or did not write these books?

Again—to have anything like certain knowledge of their opinions on many subjects, we must not only read the works of all the Fathers, but we must read all the different editions of their works. This increases the labour, three or four fold; and yet it is often necessary. For instance, if we read the works of St. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, A.D. 250, in the edition published by Manutius, a learned Roman Catholic, printed at Rome in the year 1563, we shall find, in the Treatise on Unity, sec. 3, the words here marked in italics:—"Primacy is given to Peter, that the Church of Christ may be set forth as one;" and again—"He who deserts the See of Peter, on whom the Church is founded, is he assured that he is in the Church?" But if we read the edition published by Morellus, at Paris, A.D. 1564, these words are not in that treatise at all; and if we look a little farther, we shall find that Baluzius, another learned Roman Catholic, in the edition which he prepared, declared that these words were put in by somebody else in later times, because no such words are found in the ancient manuscripts of St. Cyprian's works.*

There are, at least, ten or a dozen different editions of St. Cyprian's works, most of which (published by Roman Catholics) have not these words. Now, if we do not know certainly whether St. Cyprian wrote these words or not, how can we be certain what St. Cyprian's opinion was about the primacy of St. Peter? This is but a specimen of the difficulties which we meet with in the works of the Fathers.

But suppose we had got all these books, and read them all, and ascertained what was really written by the Fathers; and compared all the editions of each (all of which no man can hope to do), should we then have a certain rule? No; we should have a great amount of Catholic truth, a great heap of errors, and a great mass of contradiction all heaped up together, out of which we should still have to choose what was true; and we should want some other rule besides the writing of the Fathers, to select what was Catholic, and reject what was erroneous. Can any one deny this? Can any one give us the name of any one Father of whom we may take all that he has written as certainly true? Certainly no Roman Catholic will answer for the truth of all that any one Father has written. Will any Roman Catholic subscribe to all that St. Cyprian wrote about baptism, or St. Augustine about predestination, or St. Chrysostom about Purgatory, or Origen about hell? Will they answer for all that St. Jerome wrote, or Tertullian or Optatus, or, in fact, for any one Father?

Hear the description given by St. Vincent, of Lerins (A.D. 434), of Origen—"In whom were very many gifts—so rare, so singular, so wonderful, that any one would easily judge at the beginning that faith was to be given to all his assertions. For if life gives authority, in him were great industry, great modesty, patience, endurance. If birth, or learning, what more noble than him who was born at first in a house illustrious for martyrdom, and afterwards deprived not only of his father, but his property too, for the sake of Christ? He so far progressed in the straits of holy poverty, that he was often afflicted for the name of the confession of the Lord. . . Such was the force of his capacity—so profound, so acute, so elegant—that he far excelled all. Such a force of doctrine and splendour of all learning, that there were few things in divine learning, and almost nothing in human, which he had not perfectly attained. Who among Christians did not venerate him almost as a prophet, and as the chief of the philosophers?" And even the heathens were struck with his great character, for St. Vincent goes on—"And even that impious Porphyry says, that he himself, when a boy, attracted by the fame of that man, had travelled to Alexandria, and there had seen the old man, truly such and so great as one who had builded for himself a citadel of universal learning."—Commonitorum, sec. 17.

All this was true of Origen. And would we desire any greater character of one whom we should take for a guide? Yet St. Vincent gives us this character of Origen, only to warn us the more strikingly against taking any Father for our guide. For Origen fell into the heresy of teaching that unbelievers and infidels, and those who die impenitent in the most heinous sins, after burning in hell for a time, shall then be saved with Christ for ever. And, strange to say, it is no uncommon thing now-a-days to hear those self-called "Catholics," who leave the Scriptures to take the Fathers for their guide, quoting this acknowledged heresy of Origen as a proof that purgatory is a "Catholic doctrine!"

"And as Origen among the Greeks (says St. Vincent), so Tertullian is judged the chief of all we have among the Latins; . . . and he also was a great temptation in the Church;" and the following passage has been quoted from Tertullian in support of purgatory, by the great Cardinal Bellarmine himself, the chief of Roman controversialists—"Why should you not think that the soul is both punished and cherished in Hades in the meantime, while it is expecting either* judgment, through a certain practising or whitening of it?"—Liber i., c. 7 & 10. Very clear in favour of purgatory certainly, and written, too, at the beginning of the third century, only (what the Cardinal does not tell) it is the judgment of a heretic, not of a Catholic; for when Tertullian wrote that passage (De Anima, c. 58, Rigalt, ed. Paris, 1675, p. 306) he was a believer in a wretched fanatic, called Montanus, who professed to be the Holy Ghost, the Comforter that was to come! And in this very chapter, Tertullian thus proves his doctrine—"For the Paraclete (the title by which his followers spoke of the fanatic Montanus) most frequently set forth this." Is not this a fine proof of Catholic doctrine? the ravings which Tertullian had heard from a wretched fanatic who called himself the Holy Ghost! Such is the proof which Bellarmine himself produced for the doctrine of purgatory: such is, indeed, its origin; for this is the earliest mention of that doctrine which could be found in "the Fathers." Now, how are plain and unlearned men to weed out all such errors from the works of the Fathers? Is it by the help of Cardinal Bellarmine, the greatest controversialist which the Roman Church has produced, that they can hope to do it?

* Baluzius did not live to publish this. It was published by the Benedictine monks who restored these words into the text, but kept in the note of Baluzius, stating that it was an interpolation.

* Of the just or of the unjust.

Again, it is admitted by Roman Catholics that all private speculations and opinions of the Fathers are of no weight. It is only where they deliver the actual faith of the Church in their days, that they speak with any authority. How much of what is commonly quoted from the Fathers belongs to their own individual speculations and fancies, every one who has examined carefully such quotations, well knows; but how are unlearned men to make this distinction?

But it will be said that the Church of Rome appeals only to the "unanimous consent" of the Fathers—that is, that she relies upon them only when they all agree, and disregards them when they differ. Now, we are not going to speak with disrespect of the unanimous consent of the Fathers. Far from it; we know that all the Fathers, and the whole church from the beginning, have all consented unanimously in all the articles of faith contained in the ancient Catholic creeds: in the Apostles' Creed, in the Nicene Creed, and in the Athanasian Creed. We join in that same consent; and we glory and rejoice in doing so, and in this consent we hope to live and die; and while we do this, we trust that we hold the Catholic faith. But any unanimous consent among the Fathers, in any article of faith not contained in these creeds, we have never found. It is nothing new or strange to say this. It was felt and confessed by the Fathers themselves: "which ancient consent of Holy Fathers is not so carefully and diligently to be both sought for and followed, in every small question of the Divine law, but only, or at least especially, in the Rule of Faith" (i.e., the Catholic Creed.)—St. Vincent Com., ch. 28. It is senseless to dispute about the authority which should belong to any such consent, until we know whether there be any such consent. This ought to be brought to the test. We here solemnly call upon the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland, and upon the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland, upon all and each of them, to bring forward any other article of faith, in which they can show any such unanimous consent of the Fathers. Let them take any one of the twelve articles which Pope Pius the Fourth added to the creed of the Roman Church fifteen hundred and sixty-four years after Christ; let them tell us any one of those twelve new articles of which they will undertake to show that it is supported as an article of faith by "the unanimous consent of the Fathers." If they will undertake to answer this challenge, we undertake that the subject shall be fairly and candidly considered in our pages. If such a unanimous consent can be shown for any one of those twelve new articles of faith, it will be a fair question then to consider what degree of authority should be allowed to such a consent. But if no Roman Catholic priest or bishop will venture to answer this challenge, or to point out any one of those articles, for which they can undertake to produce such a "unanimous consent of the Fathers," we may fairly conclude that the thing is impossible; that no consent of the Fathers can be found in any articles of faith, except those contained in the ancient Catholic creeds.

Why should not the Roman Catholic bishops and priests do this that we propose? They boast of having converted many Protestants of learning, and candour, and sincerity. If it was by fair argument, and discussion, and proof, that they have converted them, why should they not hope to convert the conductors of this journal to all the same opinions, by the same means? But there is a still more urgent reason for the Roman Catholic priests and bishops doing what we now call upon them to do. Discussion is now going on among the Roman Catholic laity, and their priests and bishops cannot safely disregard it. We warn them that what we now write will be read by THOUSANDS of Irish Roman Catholics. If no answer to our challenge be given, those thousands of Roman Catholics will easily understand that no answer can be given. Will the bishops and priests allow so many thousands to be led astray, if it be in their power to set them right? How can they justify such negligence before God or man?

Our readers will remember that we have not shrunk from any discussion upon "the Fathers" that has been proposed to us; nor do we now shrink from it. But a regard for truth leads us to state clearly what authority we attribute to "the Fathers." We do not consider ourselves bound (no Roman Catholic does) to believe everything that has been said by any "Father:" we do not take any Father, or any number of Fathers, as the rule of our faith, or as an infallible authority; because we know that "the Fathers" were men of like passions and infirmities as ourselves; and we know that there have been errors in the Church in the days of the Apostles themselves and in all succeeding times, and that the greatest and best of the Fathers have left us a warning (as Christ himself did) to call no man master on earth; they have left us this warning in their writings, and also in their example, having each of them fallen into errors himself. But we do join in consent with the Fathers, so far as their consent has been shown to the world; because we bring that consent to the Word of God, and examine, confirm, and establish it by that Word.

We do not reject the use of the Fathers. They are not our rule of faith; but they are most valuable witnesses of the faith in their own day: valuable to confirm us in the faith they held; and above all value in enabling us to convict of novelty all errors which have arisen in the Church since their times. We shall give an example in our next number of the "use of the Fathers" in this latter respect; and meantime we entreat our Roman Catholic readers to examine what we have now said, and to consider for themselves whether they can more reasonably hope to learn the true Catholic faith, by comparing the ancient Catholic creeds with the Word of God, or by searching each for himself the thousand volumes of "the Fathers," with all their errors, all their speculations, all their forgeries, all their editions, and with all the appeals that have been made to their most flagrant errors by Cardinal Bellarmine himself.

THE TOUCHSTONE.

OBJECTION 5.—Protestants maintain, that God has not made any promise to his Church, that his Spirit should never depart from her; and that his words, which he at first put in her mouth (that is, the faith and doctrine at first delivered to the saints) should never depart from her mouth through all generations.

Their own Bible, in plain terms, delivers this promise (Isaiah, lix. 20, 21)—The Redeemer shall come to Zion, &c. This is my covenant with them, saith the Lord; my Spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever.

REPLY.—Protestants do not maintain this. They do not deny "that God has made a promise to his Church that his Spirit should never depart from her;" but they differ from Roman Catholics on the point what that Church is. They deny, as has been shown before, that by the Church is ever meant the Church of Rome. And if Roman Catholics abandon that point, and assume, that though Rome was not at first the Church of Scripture—that she took her rise along with other—but that she is not the one Church recognised by God, and that her future development being foreseen, to her the promises were given, we reply, that this is mere assumption, and an assumption which might equally well be made, and has been made, by others; for it is well known that, besides many other communities of Christians reckoning themselves churches, there is the Church of Constantinople, or Greek Church—a community of very large extent. The members of the Greek Church are computed at about fifty millions; comprising, besides the Greeks, nearly all the subjects of the vast Russian Empire, and most of the Christian subjects of the Turkish Empire. They deny that they were ever subject to the Romish Church, and condemn it for claiming authority over them as strongly as the Church of England does.

Now, Protestants indeed deny the claim, both of the Greek and Romish Churches, to universal supremacy. But if any Protestant alters his opinion on this point, and is convinced that there must be some one community on earth whose laws and rules are entitled to the obedience of all Christians, his next question must be, what and where is that Church which he is to obey? Which of these rival claimants—the Greek or the Roman? And this question cannot, it is plain, be decided by the bare assertion of either of the claimants themselves; the appeal must be either to the actual possession of miraculous gifts proving those claims, or to the plain words of Scripture.

Now, the gifts we see they have not; the more intelligent among them would not rest upon them as evidence; and Scripture, as we have seen, says nothing at all about either Church. And we might fairly expect that on this point the declarations of Scripture should be particularly plain, so that no man of common sense need be in the least doubt on the matter; for if, as Roman Catholics allege, the supremacy and infallible authority of their church was appointed on purpose to settle all disputes, we may be sure that our Lord, had such been his design, would not have left them in any doubt as to the authority they now refer to. He would never have left it a disputable point where men were to go to settle all disputes.

OBJECTION 6.—Protestants, to justify Luther (who, when he first began to set up the Protestant religion, stood alone against all the bishops and clergy upon earth), deny that there is any command in Scripture to hear the Church or submit to her decisions; or that such as, like Luther, stand out against the established doctrine of the whole church, are thereby condemnable before God.

Their own Bible, in plain words, teaches them another lesson (St. Matt. xviii. 17)—If he neglect to hear the Church, let him be to thee as a heathen and a publican.

REPLY.—The case here spoken of—Matt. xviii.—is one of offences of private persons against each other, not of any questions of doctrine. The individual supposed by our Lord to have committed the trespass against his brother, was, first, to try private remonstrance, and then lay the case before the public assembly. Whether a Jewish or a Christian assembly be here meant, it is a case of private and personal injuries, in which no one thinks a Church an infallible tribunal.

But the Church in the text probably meant the particular synagogue with which the man might be connected. If he who had committed the trespass refused to hear the decision of his own church or synagogue, then he was to be—to the person he had injured and to all the members of that Church—as "a heathen man or a publican"—cut off, that is, from their communion; but the Jews, in our Lord's time, claimed no authority to punish any one for being a heathen or publican. To excommunicate—that is, to exclude from her communion—is all the right which the Church of Rome, or any other religious community, can have over its unruly members: Scripture acknowledges no other.

OBJECTION 7.—Protestants will not allow that there is any necessity of adhering to the pastors and teachers of the Church, in order to be maintained in unity and truth; and preserved from being carried about with every wind of doctrine by the slight of heretics.

The Bible expressly declares (Ephes. iv. 11, 12, &c.), that Christ has not only given apostles and prophets, and evangelists, but also pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, under a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine by the slight of men; but, speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ. And St. Luke x. 16.—He that heareth you (the pastors of the Church) heareth me: and he that despiseth you, despiseth me; and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me. And Hebrews xiii. 7, &c.—Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God, whose faith follow—Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines. Ver. 17.—Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves. If Luther and Calvin had hearkened to these Divine lessons, the Protestant religion would never have had a being.

REPLY.—Protestants do acknowledge the use of pastors and teachers in preserving unity of ordinances, and in assisting to maintain true doctrine in their respective churches. But they hold these pastors and teachers to be fallible men, whose doctrine must itself be tried by Scripture, and tried thus by the members of their own flocks, according to their several ability. Such were, in the Jewish Church, the "Scribes," who, as our Lord said, "sat in Moses' seat," but who were, of course, not to be listened to when they (as He declared) "made the Word of God of no effect through their traditions."

Our Lord's words (Luke x. 16) were addressed to the hearers of his own inspired followers, and do not apply to ordinary teachers.

In Heb. xiii. 7, the Apostle expressly gives Christians a test by which to try the doctrines even of their teachers. "Jesus Christ"—as preached by his inspired messengers—"the same yesterday, and to day, and for ever."

Now, we know no authentic record of that teaching except the Scriptures. The apostolic teaching as recorded for us in the Bible is, therefore, our test; and if Calvin and Luther had not made use of that, to try by it the doctrines of "those who bore rule over them," we confess that the Protestant Reformation "would never have had a being," though our religion would have still been taught in the Bible, whether men attended to it or not. But general commands to obey our pastors no more imply that we are to obey them in everything, without using our own judgments, than general commands to obey magistrates or parents imply that we should comply with their will when they require us to do wrong. We should obey both pastors and magistrates so far as we can without disobeying God.

OBJECTION 8.—Protestants deny that God has promised that the children of the Church should, in all ages, fear the Lord, and flourish in righteousness and abundance of peace, as long as the sun and moon shall endure. Because they will have it, that the whole Christian Church, before their Reformation, was fallen from her allegiance to God.

Their own Bible, in plain terms, contradicts this their assertion (Ps. lxxii. 5, 7)—They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations. In his days (that is, after the coming of Christ) shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace, so long as the moon endureth.

REPLY.—Protestants do not deny, but affirm that there always have been, and always will be, faithful worshippers, children of Christ's Church, who have feared the Lord, and shall do so "as long as the sun and moon endureth." And no one but a very ignorant Roman Catholic would pretend that his own church had always flourished in righteousness and peace; since everyone acquainted with history is aware that, for many ages, it was distracted by divisions, had even rival Popes, and was overrun by a general corruption of morals.

Correspondence.

SIR,—I want to come to the point about the doctrine of purgatory. I want to know, once for all, if it was or was not, the doctrine of the Church of Christ in the first ages? Let us take the first three centuries to begin with. I call upon some learned Catholic layman, or Catholic priest, to publish the opinions of the Fathers, who lived in those three centuries, in favour of purgatory. And I call on you, sir, to publish anything of this kind that may be sent to you. I hope our priests will see that it is essential that this should be done, in order to counteract the effect of your articles; and I hope that you will see that the fair play which you profess requires that you should publish it.

I hope that some Catholic more learned than me will have the charity to come forward and do this, for I have not been able to do it myself.

I remain, your obedient,

A CATHOLIC.

P.S.—I hope you will insert this letter in every number of your paper, until a satisfactory answer appears.

We insert this letter willingly; and consider ourselves bound to insert any answer, which gives references, according to our rule. It is not usual to publish letters more than once; but the question which this letter puts is so important, that we will publish it in three numbers of the LAYMAN, to see if an answer can be got. But we could not undertake to publish it until a satisfactory answer (which we suppose means an answer giving passages from those Fathers in favour of purgatory) appears: for we are inclined to believe that we should, in that case, have to go on publishing it for ever. We believe that not a single sentence can be quoted from the Fathers of the three first centuries in favour of purgatory. But we think our correspondent's letter may provoke some one to send to us what the Fathers of those centuries have said against purgatory, in which there will not be the same difficulty.

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES.

WE have much pleasure in inserting the following letter from Mr. Aylmer. We are anxious to show our respected correspondent that we are willing to consider fairly all he has to say; and, therefore, as his letter is rather discursive, and embraces a great variety of topics, we have numbered the paragraphs, and, at some sacrifice of space, propose to give a separate answer to each, prefixing some general remarks, which we think necessary to place our views in a true light.

SIR,—The April number of your journal contains, at pages 44 and 45, a rather lengthened notice of my letter to you in the month of March last, together with some allusions to my pamphlet on reading the Holy Scriptures.

Your present May number, at pages 51 and 52, resumes the latter subject, especially in reference to my view of the 39th verse of the 5th chap. of John.

You have so very fairly transcribed the whole of my argument, almost in juxta-position with your own remarks, that, I assure you, sir, I am quite satisfied to leave the controversy between us on its own merits, and to abide by the decision of a discerning public.

(1) I perceive, however, you wish me to say whether our Lord, in the particular text (St. John v. 39), "meant to speak of this Bible reading of the Jews with approbation or disapprobation."

I am clearly of opinion, from the context, that our Saviour neither intended to commend or condemn the Jews on this head; but simply referred to it as one, it was to be supposed, most satisfactory to them, for the testimony or proof of his Divine mission, which it abundantly contained.

(2) In passing from the Jewish to the Christian dispensation, it is to be observed, that it was not a written law which was divinely prescribed for our guidance; but the teaching of the Apostles and their successors. The unwritten word was the first rule of Christianity.

(3) St. Irenæus, one of the most distinguished of the early Fathers of the Church, and a disciple of the great St. Polycarp, in his third book against heresies,* chap. iv., thus expresses himself as to the error of pretending that the reading of the Scriptures is absolutely necessary to know what we ought to believe and practise, in order to work out our salvation:—"If the Apostles had not left us the Holy Scriptures, should we not be equally bound to follow and be guided by the traditions which they had intrusted to those to whom they had committed the charge of the Churches which they had founded? Many barbarous nations, who have received the faith in Jesus Christ, have been guided by this rule; preserving, without paper and ink, the truths of salvation written in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, keeping traditions with the utmost care, and believing, through Jesus Christ the Son of God, in one God, creator of heaven and earth, and all that which exists therein. Those men, who have thus embraced the faith without witnesses, perhaps, may be esteemed barbarous without literature; but with regard to doctrine, religious practices, morals, and faith, they are wise, perfect, and acceptable to God: living in justice, wisdom, and chastity."

From this extract of the writings of so learned a doctor of the Church, one sees that there were multitudes of Christians, in the early ages, who had attained a complete knowledge of the articles of our faith, and a high degree of spirituality—"Made rich in Jesus Christ in all utterance and in all knowledge" (1 Cor. i. 5), though they had never read a syllable of the Sacred Volume.

(4) I must here dissent from your proposition, that the reading of the Scriptures is unquestionably of a "moral nature." I am sure, for the sake of your fair readers, you will not require me to cite book, chapter, and verses in the Old Testament to negative your assertions. But, perhaps, you may be of those who think that such and such narratives, because they are to be found in Scripture, are not of an immoral nature; to say so, in my humble opinion, is to aver that a wild beast springing from a thicket into a hermitage becomes harmless and tame.

(5) The "locking up" (as you express it), under peculiar circumstances, "of the treasure of heavenly wisdom," I consider anything but "a daring usurpation," it is, in fact, but an obedience to the command of Christ himself, who forbade his Apostles to "cast pearls before swine" (St. Matt. vii. 6)—"that is to say" (observe some of the most eminent commentators of the Churches of England and Rome), "expose not the sacred truths and mysteries of the Gospel to the raillery of profane libertines and hardened Atheists—apply not the promises to the profane." The transcendent excellency of Christ and his grace, made known and offered in the Gospel, is compared to a pearl of great price.—Matt. xiii. 46. (6) At all events, "usurpation" or otherwise, I am quite certain you will agree with me, that it is by no means so great an exercise of authority as that binding and loosing, that discretionary power of forgiving and retaining sins, which, as Christ's legates, the priesthood unquestionably, according to God's Word, possess.—St. Matt. xviii. 18, St. John xx. 23, 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, 20.

(7) I now join issue with you, and affirm, on Scriptural grounds, that the priests are to be regarded as the judges appointed by God to expound the law, and their expositions to be considered binding.—Ezekiel xliv. 24, Mal. ii. 7, St. John xv. 27, Acts viii. 26, and subsequent verses. (8) It is manifest that, since the dead letter cannot speak for itself, the Christian law, without a living interpreter, can be no rule of faith. No legislature ever made laws without providing judges and magistrates to explain and enforce them; for if we were to be exercising private judgment, where would be the end of litigation and dispute? (9) The word of God consists not in the letter of Scripture, but in the spirit and meaning, of which, according to St. Paul, the priests are the "fit ministers."—2 Cor. iii. 6.

Insist not, therefore, on the written Word of God alone. (10) Our Blessed Lord, as I before intimated, never wrote, or commanded his Apostles to write anything. (11) "In these days (God) hath spoken, 'not written,' to us by his own Son."—Heb. i. 2. Christ did not say to his first missionaries, Go, write and distribute Bibles to all nations; but, Go, teach all nations (St. Matt. xxviii. 19. (12) He did not say, He that readeth or heareth the Scripture heareth me; but he that heareth you heareth me.—St. Luke x. 16. He did not say, He that will not read the Scripture; but, He that will not hear the Church, is to be considered as a heathen and a publican.—St. Matt. xviii. 17.

For these reasons, I contend for a two-fold rule of faith consisting of Scripture and tradition, and most certainly an interpreting authority in the Church. (13) You cannot, observes St. Jerome, make your way into the Scriptures, without having a guide before you to show you the road; and what better selection could be made than from amongst those to whom "it hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost (Acts xv. 28) to decide?" (14) St. Paul, in his second Epistle to the Thessalonians, exhorts them to "stand fast, and hold the traditions which they have learned" (2 Thess. ii. xiv.); and, moreover, in the next chapter, charges them to withdraw themselves from every brother walking disorderly, and not according to the tradition which they have received.—2 Thess. iii. 6. The same Apostle praises the Romans (chap. vi. 17), because they kept "that form of doctrine" into which they had been delivered. Confirmatory of this, he writes to Timothy (2 Tim. i. 13) "to hold the form of sound words which he had heard of him in faith."

I cannot regard Holy Scripture as the be-all, end-all, and sine qua non of religion, inasmuch as all necessary points of Christian Doctrine were taught and believed for many years before any part of the New Testament was written. Besides, where do you leave the fact that, for nearly fifteen centuries, until the invention of printing, the whole Scripture was little better than a sealed book to the great Christian community? (15) To tell me, therefore, that the Bible is the sole rule of faith, is to advance a monstrous absurdity, and to state we were without any rule of faith for several hundred years! To preach to a man that he must take his faith from a book he is unable to read, is as preposterous as to advise a cripple to run for his life! Is it to controvert this you assert, at top of page 52, that "the Scriptures were addressed to all and were to be read by all," because St. Paul (1 Thess. v. 27) charges the Thessalonians, that his first short five-chapter epistle to them should be read, not by, but to all the holy brethren? (16) From these observations, or, indeed, from anything I may write on the subject, I most sincerely hope you will not conclude that I either distrust or depreciate the Holy Scriptures. I hold my Bible in the highest estimation; I profess it to be the pure oracles of God, and that we are rather bound to lose our lives than to concur any way to its profanation. My intention is to give evident proof that tradition, and the instruction of pastors, are as sufficient to make good Christians now as in the first ages of Christianity. (17) St. Augustine, in the fifth century, thought precisely as St. Irenæus in the second; and although the immediate cause of his own conversion was the incidental reading of a passage in St. Paul's Epistles, yet he says "that a man, animated with faith, hope, and charity, and guided by the decision of his pastors, is in no need of Scripture, unless he had the charge of teaching others. I would not believe the Gospel if the authority of the Church did not move me thereto."

I have already stated, in a former communication, that I am decidedly for Scriptural education, but administered in a proper and convenient form. I now say what indeed may be as clearly inferred from my pamphlet, that the reading of the Holy Scriptures, when attended with the spirit of humility, steady faith, without which it is impossible to please God (Heb. xi. 6), and unreserved deference and docility to the decisions or interpretations of the Church, cannot be too much recommended. Further than this I cannot cede one iota. The Sacred Volume should never be made an ordinary school-book, nor the key of heaven to an unlettered craftsman.

(18) You have inquired where the true sense of the Holy Scriptures is to be found, which the Roman Church professes to enjoy; but which you assert she has never published.

* Vid. Opera S. Irenæi Dom. Massuet's edition. 1710. Likewise "Hist. Litteraire de la Ville de Lyon."

To which I reply, that the sense in which the Catholic Church has held, and does hold the Holy Scriptures, can be best ascertained—in fact, is embodied—in the decrees of her general conncils, which were convened from the beginning, not (as stated untraly) to make new creeds, but to condemn new heresies; and, in doing so, have given, and set forth in detail, the Church's sense and interpretations of such portions of Scripture as, from time to time, were heretically relied upon, and advanced against Catholic doctrine. (19) There never was a heresy but what was alleged, by its authors and promulgators, to be grounded on Scripture; and by its condemnation the Church has publicly given her sense of Scripture. Here I should observe, that there are debatable texts of Scripture, as well as debatable questions in theology, which as they do not interfere with, or bear upon any particular article of faith, have no ways been left open by the Church for the disputations of schoolmen, and the varied researches and interpretations of the learned. This is the theory and practice of the Church of Rome on the subject, containing within itself, like the British Constitution, a beautiful combination of freedom and of salutary restraints. (20) It were well had Protestantism generally adopted a similar rule; it would have preserved unto you, not alone uniformity of worship, but, alas! what are by no means your distinguishing characteristics—ONE BODY and ONE SPIRIT, ONE FAITH, ONE BAPTISM.—Ephesians iv. 45.

(21) Most true is your proposition, that the BIBLE is the religion of the Protestant; but are all Protestants alike in their religion? Have we not Protestants of the Church of England and Ireland, Protestants of the Church of Scotland, Armenian and Calvinistic Protestants? To profess yourself a Protestant is to speak quite indefinitely without explaining the particular kind to which you belong. When I hear of a Danish or Swedish Protestant, I know, of course, that he is a person whose religion is the BIBLE; but the Bible as explained in the confession of Augsburg. When I am presented to a Protestant of the Church of Holland, I am satisfied that the BIBLE is his religion; but as expounded by the Synod of Dort. In like manner, a Protestant of the United Church of England and Ireland has his religion of the BIBLE, in conjunction with the Litargy, and Thirty-nine Articles; while the Non-Episcopalian Protestants of the Church of Scotland have their "Bible, kirk, and plaid belief." Thus, the plague of schism is upon all your convocations; and, it is quite obvious, the BIBLE does not enable "you all to speak the same thing: or to be perfect in the same mind, and in the same judgment."—I Cor. i. 10.

(22) This brings me now to speak of "the private judgment advocated by Protestants," which you are rather displeased at my supposing "to be the same as unaided, uninstructed judgment."—April number, page 45. You have, therefore, repudiated this notion in connection with Holy Writ, which I am really very glad of, as St. Peter, in his second epistle, pointedly tells us to understand, that no "prophecy of Scripture is made by private interpretation."—1 Cap. 20, 21. But, sir, unless you strangely confound the exercise of individual rights, how can you explain a private opinion to be one formed and entertained by another? If I convert you to my way of thinking, we hold the same judgment in common; it is not the result of any act of privacy or independence on your part, no more than a blind man trusts to his own eyes when he follows a guide. If we obey the injunction of the Apostle, and "subject our understandings in obedience to faith" (2 Cor. x. 5), do we not sacrifice private judgment?

(23) You say, "Protestants appeal to reason; Roman Catholics to authority."—Middle of page 45, April number. Which is the safer and more Scriptural course to adopt? You further add, that "an appeal to reason assumes the right use of reason;" that is mere assumption, coming with a very bad grace from one who—near the bottom of the preceding page 44—avows that reason is very often abused and perverted by men, to their own and other persons' grievous injury! But did our Saviour approve of, and recommend this Protestant appeal to reason? In the sixteenth chapter and eighth verse of St. Matthew's Gospel, I read as follows:—"And Jesus said, why reason ye within yourselves, O ye of little faith!" "Why reason ye these things in your hearts."—St. Mark xi. 8. Again, in the 8th chapter, 17th verse—"Why do you reason? have ye your hearts yet hardened?" "And the Scribes and Pharisees began to reason, saying: Who is this who speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God alone?"—St. Luke v. 21. Thus much for Protestant reason: now for Roman Catholic authority. "And it came to pass, when Jesus had fully ended these words, the people were in admiration at his doctrine: for he was teaching them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes and Pharisees."—St. Matt. 28, 29. "Then calling together the twelve Apostles he gave them power and authority," &c., &c.—St. Luke ix. 1, 2, and subsequent verses. "Exhort and rebuke with all authority."—Titus ii. 15. "For if also I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us unto edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed."—2 Cor. x. 1. I really deem it quite unnecessary to multiply Scripture proofs of the power and authority which Christ gave to his Church—"the pillar and ground of truth."—1 Tim. iii. 15. That the first Christians did appeal to, and acknowledge their belief of such authority, will appear by the Acts of the Apostles, chapter 15, verse 2:—"They determined that Paul, and Barnabas, and certain others of the other side, should go up to the Apostles and priests unto Jerusalem." After much disputing, they (Apostles and priests), as a teaching body, determined the point, declaring that their decision was the decision of the Holy Ghost:—"It seemeth good to the Holy Ghost and to us," &c., &c.—Verse 28. And this decision was obeyed as a decree of heaven.

I suppose it is upon the plea of the Bible only, to the exclusion of Church authority, that our streets and highways are filled with placards and handbills, offering different sums of money as a reward for the discovery and production of any passage of Scripture requiring us to believe such and such doctrines, or to comply with such and such observances.

(24) In the spirit of kindliness, will you permit me, through your columns, to ask the gentlemen of the Irish Church Missions why it is that, contrary to the clear and express command of God in Scripture, they keep the Sunday holy instead of Saturday, which is the Sabbath of Holy Writ? There are the Old and New Testaments for you, and give me the text from either of them authorizing the change. By what dispensing power do you take an oath on that book wherein it is positively commanded by Christ to "Swear not at all?"—St. Matt. v. 34. How do you reconcile your law of divorce with the New Testament, and "Marry her that is put away?"—St. Matt. v. 32; St. Mark x. 9, 10, 11, 12.

(25) There are Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, duly set forth in the Book of Common Prayer. The wealth of all the Rothschilds would be vainly offered for a direct Scripture proof of some of these—that is to say, to prove them from Scripture alone. In this Book of Common Prayer look at the fourteenth Psalm: now, open your own version of the Bible, and read that fourteenth Psalm; you will find seven verses in the "Bible only," while in the Book of Common Prayer—same Psalm—you have eleven! If there be not a discrepancy between your Bible and your Prayer-book—an "adding to the Word of God"—I leave those who run to decide.

(26) Where in Scripture is to be found the Table of all the Fasts and Feasts that are to be observed in the Church of England throughout the year, many of them holidays for saints and angels? You speak of the word "transubstantiation" not to be found in Holy Writ. Show me in your sole rule of faith the words "trinity" and "consubstantial," yet these I find in your creed and liturgy as well as my own. Now, neither you, sir, nor the Irish Church Missions' Society can give a satisfactory answer to all this without retracting what you have said against the Church's authority, and pulling down the proud idol of private judgment. It is on the very principles you ridicule and condemn when Popery is in question you must convict the Jew and Dissenter when they come in your way.

I remain, Sir,
Your obedient, very humble servant,
M. V. AYLMER.

72, Lower Baggot-street, June, 1852.

There are few controversies which might not be much shortened if the disputants would always take pains to ascertain what are the exact doctrines held by their opponents. In the present case we find, in Mr. Aylmer's letter, much that is irrelevant, and which we are persuaded he would have left out, had he been more exactly informed as to the nature of the points in dispute between us. This one advantage at least, we hope, will follow from the institution of this journal, that intelligent Roman Catholics will have an opportunity of learning what are the doctrines held by the members of the Church of England; and, on the other hand, should we inadvertently misrepresent the views of Roman Catholics, we shall cheerfully lend our columns to the correction of our mistakes.

As to the rule of faith, then, Protestants and Roman Catholics agree, that what must govern our belief is the teaching of our Lord and his Apostles. They agree, moreover, that it is the duty of the Church to preserve the truths communicated by our Lord, and to make them known to her members; and for this purpose both the Church of England and the Church of Rome employ nearly the same means. Not to speak now of the use of creeds, and such like formularies, the principal of these means is the setting apart a fixed order of men, whose duty it is to instruct the people in God's truth. As to the advantages of oral instruction, there is no dispute between us. There is, at least, as much of sermons and catechizing in the Church of England as in the Church of Rome. And we believe that a layman may learn all that is necessary for his salvation from his priest, without going further, if that priest rightly fulfil his duty, and if he teach the doctrines of our Lord, without any mixture of human error. So far we are agreed. But the point of difference arises, if a layman asks his priest, how am I to know that such and such a doctrine, which you teach me, was taught by our Lord? Where is the teaching of the Lord and his apostles recorded? To this question a priest of the Church of England is taught to answer (see 6th Article)—"Every doctrine which it is necessary to your salvation to believe is contained in the Holy Scriptures. You are at liberty to examine them for yourself, and to satisfy yourself that the doctrines which I have taught you are to be found there." The priest of the Church of Rome will reply—"It is true that some of the teaching of our Lord is recorded in the Bible, but not all. The Church possesses, besides, the unwritten Word of God; and you are not at liberty to examine what I teach you in her name. If you presume to test the accuracy of her doctrines by comparing them with Scripture, you will commit a grievous sin, and be, besides, in imminent danger of being led into error."

It must be explained (see Bellarmine de Verbo Dei Lib. 4, cap. 2), that when the Church of Rome speaks of the unwritten Word of God, it is not to be understood that that word is nowhere written, but only that it is not written in the Scriptures. For instance, we do not suppose that Mr. Aylmer maintains that there is any doctrine which it is necessary to his salvation to believe, which now rests on oral tradition alone, and which is not to be found written in some book or other. We suppose he must acknowledge that, if the Christian doctrines had been left to be handed down to us from the time of the Apostles, by word of mouth alone, they would have been in great danger of being corrupted; but he will tell us that the belief of Christians has been, from time to time, recorded by learned doctors and fathers of the Church. To their writings, and to the decrees of councils, he will refer us, if it be asked where are we to find the unwritten Word of God. We see, then, that, strictly speaking, the question between Protestants and Roman Catholics is not "the written word versus oral tradition;" but the difference is, Protestants say, all doctrines necessary to salvation, have been, through the providence of God, committed to writing, by divinely inspired Apostles and Evangelists: Roman Catholics say, that some of these doctrines have been written down by Apostles and Evangelists, and others by fallible men.

In discussing this question, it is plainly irrelevant to declaim about the advantages of oral instruction, and the possibility of man's learning all the truth by word of mouth alone; for the point at issue is not whether oral instruction be a good thing, but how its correctness shall, in the last resort, be tested.

There was in a certain city a town clock of considerable antiquity, said to have been constructed by a first-rate maker. There were, however, in the town several who asserted that this clock had, in the course of years, got more than an hour astray, and who demanded that the clock should be compared with the sun-dial, and corrected accordingly. But the corporation asserted that their clock was infallible, and, moreover, that it did accurately agree with the sun-dial. And, in order to silence all objectors (whose eyes, they said, must have been dazzled, when they fancied there was any difference between the dial and the clock), they locked up the garden in which the sun-dial was, and only allowed a few to enter, and that only on condition that they should promise beforehand to maintain that the clock and the dial did accurately agree. And when the objectors requested to be indulged with a sight of the dial, that they might satisfy themselves that the clock was right, the corporation replied—"How absurd it is of you to maintain that the sun is what regulates the true time. According to you no one can know the hour at night, or on a cloudy day. We hold that a blind man may know the hour very correctly by hearing our clock strike, but you must maintain that if he cannot see the dial, he can never know the hour at all." But, of course, the others replied—"All this talk is quite beside the question. We think a good clock a most useful thing, if it be kept to the right time. And we all carry watches ourselves. But we are very sure that the only way to keep a watch or clock right, is to have it constantly regulated by the sun; and we suspect that, if you knew your clock to agree with the dial, you would not have such an objection to our making the comparison."

Having made these general observations on the subject of Mr. Aylmer's letter, we now proceed to examine it in detail.

(1) He commences with some remarks on the text (John v. 39)—"Search (or ye do search) the Scriptures." On the question which way this text ought to be rendered, we would call Mr. Aylmer's attention to the fact, that the Roman Church has never ventured to translate it into English otherwise than as a command—SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES. This is the more remarkable, because the note in the present Douay Bible shows an earnest wish that the people should not understand it as a command! Yet, among the thousands of alterations which have been made, from time to time, in the Douay translation, the Roman Catholic bishops have not ventured to alter this text. They still retain the command, Search the Scriptures.

The note to which we allude has been but lately put into the Douay Bible. The earliest edition in which we have found it is that of the New Testament, corrected by Dr. M'Mahon, and authorized by Dr. Troy, in 1803. In the old edition (Rheims, 1582) the note ran thus—"Our Master referreth them not to the reading only, or learning them without book * * * * but to the deep search of the meaning and mysteries of the Scripture." Now, it may be asked, when the Romish bishops became dissatisfied with this note, and altered it into an entreaty that no one would understand the text as a command, how did it come to pass that they did not alter their translation, and that when they did not scruple to correct the translation of so many other passages? The reason was, because they knew that the first translators had rendered the passage in accordance with the opinion of the best Greek Fathers, who spoke the language of the New Testament from their childhood, and must be admitted to be competent judges of the meaning of a Greek word. We give a quotation from St. Chrysostom, the greatest of all the Greek Fathers, and on comparing it with the note in the edition of 1582, to which we have referred, the reader can have no doubt that these translators were guided by his authority in adopting the version, "Search the Scriptures." He says (see 41st Homily on St. John's Gospel)—"Wherefore Christ, when he referred the Jews to the Scriptures, sent them not to a mere reading, but a careful and considerate search; for he said not 'read the Scriptures,' but 'search the Scriptures;' * * * * He bids them now dig down with care, that they might be able to discover what luy in the depth below."

On this text, however, Mr. Aylmer exercises his private judgment, in a manner which many Protestants would not have courage to imitate; and, notwithstanding the authority of the Greek Fathers and the Irish Roman Catholic bishops, prefers the rendering, "Ye search the Scriptures." In our last number we consented to waive the question whether Mr. Aylmer is right in this opinion. It is sufficient for our argument if the Jews were right in searching the Scriptures. We ask him accordingly—"Did our Saviour approve or disapprove of the conduct of the Jews in searching the Scriptures?" To this question we have not got a satisfactory reply. Mr. Aylmer tells us that our Lord's words—"Ye search the Scriptures"—do not express either approbation or condemnation of the Jews' conduct in so doing. It is true, perhaps, that these words do not express that our Lord approved of the conduct of the Jews in searching the Scriptures; but we think that the context implies it plainly. At all events we call upon Mr. Aylmer to tell us plainly, does he think the Jews were wrong in searching their Old Testament Scriptures? We cannot think that he will venture to say they were. But if he admits that the Jews were not wrong in this search, our argument proceeded thus.

We asked for some proof that Christians are not to read the Scriptures which are given them, as freely as the Jews were permitted and taught to read theirs. The early Christians had been Jews. As such they were used to daily reading of their Scriptures. When Christians, they would, naturally, read what the Apostles wrote, unless they were forbidden. We therefore said—"It is impossible to believe that such a change would have been introduced, without being formally and distinctly notified. We shall anxiously look for Mr. Aylmer's views on this subject; but think we may safely challenge the Priests of the Church of Rome to produce any such notification" And as Mr. Aylmer has, certainly, produced no such notification, we now refer him to the fact, that St. Paul wrote his epistles to all the believers in the Churches he addressed. He directs his letters, not to the bishops or to the clergy exclusively, but to the faithful brethren. Now, can it be supposed that the persons to whom he directed his letters were not allowed to read them? Must they not (in the absence of all directions to the contrary) have thought themselves as well entitled to read these letters—ay, and as much bound to read and learn them—as they had been to read the Old Testament while Jews?

(2) Mr. Aylmer seems to think that there was a striking difference, in this respect, between the Jewish and Christian revelations, in that the latter was an unwritten revelation for some years, while the former was given in writing from the first. With the exception of the ten commandments, this is an error. Moses did, indeed, write what was said to him at Sinai (Ex. xxiv., v. 4), and he read it to the people, but did not give the book either to them or the priests. While he lived (for 40 years) it was, "Hear, O Israel;" but when he came to die, he wrote all that he had said, and gave the book in charge to them.—Deut. xxxi., v. 9 and 26. So while the inspired Apostles lived, they declared with authority what Christ had said to them; and, after their death, their writings were looked upon as the great depository of their revelation.

Mr. Aylmer says, that "it was not a written law which was divinely prescribed for our guidance, but the teaching of the Apostles." These two things ought not to be contrasted; for the question is, how the teaching of the Apostles is made known to us; and we hold that the teaching of the Apostles is altogether contained in the written word, and that it is by means of that word alone that we can learn with certainty that any particular doctrine was taught by the Apostles. Mr. Aylmer's argument is, in fact, "They who heard the Apostles with their own ears could tell with certainty what were the doctrines taught by them, without any appeal to Scripture; therefore, we, 1800 years after, can also tell with certainty, what the Apostles taught, without any use of their writings." Need we point out the fallacy of this argument? We shall presently show from whom Mr. Aylmer borrowed it.

(3) He then quotes a passage from Irenæus. We hope, in a future number, to lay before our readers the views of St. Irenæus as to the sufficiency of Scripture; but we shall not here lengthen remarks already too long. The passage quoted by Mr. Aylmer presents no difficulty to any one who has read our preliminary remarks. We do not deny that any one may attain by oral instruction alone (if his teacher instruct him rightly) a complete* knowledge of the doctrines of the Christian faith.

We believe that we are bound to use every means in our power to arrive at a correct knowledge of the truths which Christ has given us. If the Holy Scriptures had not been left us, we might have learned, through uninspired channels, a few of the leading facts of our religion; but does this prove that now, that God has given us the Scriptures, we should be justified in neglecting to obtain, by their means, a more perfect knowledge of the truth? If God had given us no eyes, we might have been able to grope our way about; but this is no reason why we should refuse to use our eyes, now that he has given us them.

We have just said that any one may obtain a knowledge of the truth by oral instruction, if his teacher instruct him rightly. The limitation is necessary, because the very book of Irenæus, to which Mr. Aylmer refers, is directed against a set of heretics who did give oral instruction to their followers, but who, unfortunately, taught them wrong. Irenæus himself explains to us the reason why he was forced to have recourse to arguments from tradition. These heretics, it seems (Adv. Hær. Lib. iii. 2), "when reproved from the Scriptures immediately began to accuse the Scriptures themselves, as if they were not correct, nor of authority, and as if they were ambiguous; and as if the truth could not be discovered from them by those who were ignorant of tradition; FOR THAT THE TRUTH WAS NOT DELIVERED IN WRITING BUT ORALLY." Does Mr. Aylmer recognise this argument?

(4) Mr. Aylmer "dissents from our proposition, that the reading of the Scripture is unquestionably of a moral nature." He mistakes our meaning. We meant that "reading" is a moral, not a ceremonial duty: that it was not one of those ceremonies and observances which ceased with the Jewish ritual, but that reading and searching God's written revelation to man is a duty springing from man's relation to God.

Mr. Aylmer supposes us to have said, that the things contained in Scripture are moral, and not immoral. We did not say so; because we never questioned this ourselves, nor supposed that any other Christian did. Here we leave our reason, and believe that God knows better what is good for man than we know. And it is with grief and astonishment that we find Mr. Aylmer, understanding our proposition as he did, taking the opposite side, and prepared to say, or to insinuate, that the Bible is "immoral!" and that a regard to morality should prevent females reading it. Will he force us to turn to the books in which Roman Catholic priests are educated for the confessing of females?

We believe that adultery is an immoral act; but we believe that God's command—"thou shalt not commit adultery"—is moral; and, on the same principle, we maintain the morality of all Scripture. Mr. Aylmer himself maintains (and here we thank him for it) that it was exclusively of the Old Testament that Christ said—"Search the Scriptures." Yet it is the Old Testament he considers too immoral to be read. And, perhaps, Mr. Aylmer would say that it was of the Old Testament, too, that St. Paul said this—"ALL Scripture, inspired of God, is profitable to learn, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice."—2 Tim. iii. 16. We heartily regret this part of Mr. Aylmer's letter; but we fear that those who would restrain the Scripture, do often lose their reverence for it more than they suspect themselves.

(5) Mr. Aylmer justifies that which he says we call the "locking up" of Scripture, by the express command of Christ himself—"Neither cast ye your pearls before swine."—Matt. vii. 6. We adopt the text and the principle. Christ's ministers and faithful people are not to persist in speaking of Gospel mysteries, to those who hear only to mock and scoff. But we do not see how the command is fulfilled by the Church forbidding such men to read. Will they refrain from reading, because she forbids them?

In claiming a more general reading for Irish Roman Catholics, our question with those who oppose us may be rather of detail than principle. What are the facts? Is the Bible read, or possessed, by one in twenty of Irish Roman Catholics? Are the nineteen in every twenty "swine?" Are they "profane libertines" and "hardened Atheists?" If they be such, we would not give them "pearls," save in the hope that their present guidance only had made them such. But we deny the fact. The priesthood boasts of the faith and morals of the Irish Roman Catholics: and we believe that they have a zeal for God, though not according to knowledge. If those nineteen in twenty who are at present without the Bible, be not such as are unfit to receive the "pearl of great price," then we call on Mr. Aylmer to aid us in stimulating them to acquire it.

(6) Mr. Aylmer speaks of "the discretionary power of forgiving and retaining sins." We take this to be one of the worst popular errors prevailing among Roman Catholics. But we deny that such a doctrine is taught by the best divines of the Roman Catholic Church. They say that the power is NOT discretionary; that the priest can forgive only whom God intends to forgive, and bind only those whom God intends to bind. Mr. Aylmer must have heard of the "Clave errante;" that the priest's act, if contrary to what God intends, is of no effect whatever; and if the priest cannot bind whom God intends to loose, or loose whom God intends to bind, still less can he withhold the Scriptures from those whom God intends should read—since we read of no power at all being given to him to withhold the Scriptures.

[Our reply to the remaining paragraphs of Mr. Aylmer's letter is in type; but we are compelled, from want of space, to postpone it till our next number.]

* It should be noticed, however, that the only doctrines communicated by tradition, of which Irenæus speaks, are such as are contained in the Apostles' Creed, and on which Protestants and Roman Catholics do not differ.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR JUNE.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

Turnips.—Finish the sowing of Swedes as early as possible; after the 10th, it will be getting late for them, when Dale's hybrid or the Aberdeen varieties should be substituted, the sowing of which should be vigorously prosecuted during the month, and finished, if possible, by the end of it—beginning with the fallows, and finishing with those lands which have borne crops of vetches and rye, as they get cleared. The order in which the different varieties should be sown is as follows:—1st, Swedes; 2nd, hybrids; 3rd, Aberdeens; 4th, white turnips, which kind may be extended into the middle of July.

Hoeing Turnips.—The earlier-sown turnips will have come into rough leaf some time during the month, after which they must be horse-hoed, hand-hoed, and singled out. These operations should follow each other closely, the great error in turnip culture being not thinning in time, when the plants are drawn up weakly, and otherwise injured. The distances apart to which the plants should be thinned out, under different circumstances, require much judgment and practical experience. In deep, naturally-rich loams, and sheltered aspects, Swedes will require a distance of from fifteen to eighteen inches, plant from plant; under less favourable circumstances, twelve to fifteen inches apart. As it is not desirable to grow the softer kinds large, as by so doing they do not grow firm and compact at the heart, twelve to fourteen inches apart will suffice for hybrids and Aberdeens; but the large white kinds must be grown within nine or ten to twelve inches apart, to insure a compact, nutritious root. After the plants are thinned out to their proper distances, the hoes and grubbers should be kept constantly going, to destroy weeds and pulverize the soil, till the crops are so much advanced as to be injurious to trespass amongst them.

Mangels and Sugar Beet will also be ready for thinning. The same rules that we laid down for Swede turnips are perfectly applicable to mangels. Should there be any blanks or misses in the Swede or mangel crops, they may be readily made up, at the time of thinning, by carefully transplanting some of the strongest plants. To insure success, refresh the spots to be transplanted, by turning over the soil, a few inches deep, with the spade or small three-pronged fork. Cut off the largest of the leaves, preserving the short and partly-developed ones at the heart; dip the roots in an adhesive puddle, composed of fine, rich earth and cow or sheep droppings, and dibble them in, taking care that the roots are not doubled up, but that they go down perpendicularly. The plants should not be inserted deeper than they originally stood, or they will not bulb well, but grow to tops. Moist, dropping weather is the best for this work, and the plants will require a little water till they are well established. A little guano, forked in before planting, or watering with liquid manure afterwards, will assist them greatly.

Carrots and Parsnips should be hand-hoed and singled out early in the month; thin them from nine to ten inches apart, plant from plant, in the rows, and in a few days put the horse-hoe and grubbers through them, which continue at intervals, to eradicate weeds, and keep the land loose and friable, till the crops shut them out.

Beans in drills, if early sown, will be in flower and well advanced; notwithstanding, if it has not been done before, the crop should get its final horse-hoeing, and the double mould-board plough run between, which may be used without injury, by attaching a whipple to the nozzle of the plough, &c., so as to elevate the swings, and prevent their switching the bean-stalks.

ONE GUIDE OR TWO?

We shall commence with a story, which our readers may believe or not as they please. Last summer, on a walking tour in Switzerland, we met, on one of the mountain passes, an English friend, escorted by two guides. As the pass was neither difficult nor dangerous, we had the curiosity to ask why he had provided himself with a second guide. "Why," said he, "I started with this honest Swiss, who has the character of being thoroughly acquainted with every path in this district; but on the way I picked up this Frenchman, who has a great deal more to say for himself; tells me a great many stories, of which the Swiss knows nothing; and who assures me, besides, that he knows the whole country so well that I may implicitly trust to his guidance." "Well, then," said we, "if you like your new guide so much the best, why did you not send back the first?" "I was going to do so," said he, "but the Frenchman advised me not, telling me that the Swiss really deserved his character, and that no one can be better acquainted with the entire country." "Then," said we, "we suppose your two guides always agree." "I don't know what to say to that," replied he. "There have been several times that I imagined the Swiss wanted to lead me a different way from that which the Frenchman was taking me. However, the latter assured me that I was mistaken, and that it was merely that I did not understand the Swiss guide's patois, but that, in reality, they were both perfectly agreed." "Then," said we, "if you are quite sure you can trust the Frenchman, you had better get rid of the other; for if the two agree, he is of no use to you; and, by seeming to disagree with the other, he only makes your mind uncomfortable, and renders you uncertain whether the Frenchman is leading you right."

Without pledging ourselves that all this literally happened, we may ask our readers to receive the moral which we want to draw from our story—namely, that when we have to employ the services of a guide at all, we are not better off with two than with one good one. If our two guides agree, it is the same thing as if we had but one; and if they disagree, it is plain that we can only follow one of them.

What we have said has been intended to prepare the way for the consideration of one of the principal controversies between the Church of England and the Church of Rome—namely, Has God given us a single or a double rule of faith? Our readers are aware that the Church of England maintains that God has given us a single rule of faith—viz., Holy Scripture—which, according to her, contains all things necessary to salvation; the Church of Rome holds that God has given us a double rule—namely, Holy Scripture and tradition—and she asserts that the written and the unwritten word of God are both guides of equal authority, and to be listened to with equal reverence. Now, we shall attempt to prove that the system of a double rule of faith is one which in practice cannot work; and that, if tradition is to be our guide, Scripture is useless, if not mischievous.

We need no better proof of this assertion than the conduct of the Church of Rome herself. Though she professes to have two guides, in practice she employs but one of them. Her advocates cannot help admitting, in theory, that God has given us the Scriptures, and that he must have intended them to serve as a rule of faith; but when they are teaching their people, instead of sending them to the Bible to learn their faith there, they think it sufficient to acquaint them with the tradition of the Church. For those who know this, they maintain that the Bible is altogether unnecessary, and there are no passages from the Fathers which they have more pleasure in quoting than those (such as Mr. Aylmer has referred to in the last number) where any of them have asserted that it is possible for a man to know every saving truth without having read the Holy Scriptures. On this possibility the Church of Rome has acted. Among her laity ignorance of the Bible is not the exception but the rule; and it is only where they have come much into contact with Protestants, that it is possible to find many of her lay members well acquainted with it. In this country, where Protestants have exerted themselves so much to circulate the Scriptures, Roman Catholic priests have had an obvious motive for emulating their exertions—namely, in order to show that they had an equal regard for the Book which God has given, and were not afraid to let their people read it; and yet in this country it will not be denied that a vast majority of the Roman Catholic laity are wholly ignorant of the Bible. And this ignorance is far deeper in countries where Protestants have but little influence; and we suppose that it would be possible to find ten Roman Catholics in this country acquainted with the Scriptures, for one that could be found among the same number of persons in Spain or Italy. It is not our object now to find fault with this state of things. The only conclusion we wish to draw is this: that if the Roman Catholic theory be true—if God has left us tradition as our rule of faith, which tradition the church preserves and teaches without any risk of error, then we do not want the Scriptures as our rule of faith, and it is quite unnecessary for us to read them.

But, we will go farther; and we say, that if the Roman Catholic theory be true, the reading of the Scriptures is likely to be mischievous. A saying is attributed to a celebrated Roman Catholic divine, that it would have been better for the Church if the Scriptures had never been written. We are quite aware that no church is bound by the sayings of one of its members, however eminent. A Roman Catholic may answer if pressed by an injudicious speech of Cardinal Hosius, or Cardinal Bellarmine, just as a Protestant would answer if taunted with an injudicious speech of Luther or Calvin, and may fairly say, "The speech was a hasty and an unwise one, and I am by no means bound to defend it." Our motive for quoting here the saying we have just cited, is merely that it expresses in a concise and striking form what we believe to be the legitimate consequence of the Roman Catholic theory of tradition. For let us suppose that theory to be true, and let us examine of what advantage the Scriptures are, considering in succession the three possible cases which may arise.

First, there is the case of that large body of persons of whom we have already spoken, who have learned the tradition of the church, but who have never opened the Bible. These persons, it is plain, have, practically, but a single rule of faith. To them Scripture is useless; their case is the same as if it had never been written. And they are not worse off, but may, without the Scriptures, know everything necessary for their salvation.

Secondly, let us consider the case of those who, having been taught the traditions of the church, afterwards compare them with Scripture, and believe that they find them to agree with it. Now, whatever intellectual gratification these persons may derive from reading the Bible, their religious position is not more advantageous than that of their unlearned brethren; for they will have learned no saving truth from the Bible, which the church will not have taught them already. There are several Roman Catholics (our correspondent Mr. Aylmer, for example) who approve of reading the Scriptures, if it be done in a spirit of reverence and submission to the teaching of the church. Now, we say, these persons have also, practically, but a single rule of faith. In the illustration with which we commenced, we supposed that the Frenchman allowed the traveller to bring the Swiss along with him, and to converse freely with him; only, if any doubt should arise as to the right way, no matter what he might imagine the Swiss to say, it was the Frenchman's directions which were to be followed: such a traveller might have had two companions, but he had only one guide. And so they who read the Scriptures, but only on condition of finding in them the doctrines taught by the church's tradition, do indeed use the Scriptures, but they do not use them as a rule of faith. The church's tradition is their rule, and with that rule the apparent sense of Scripture must be squared.

These two classes of persons, then, have, practically, but a single rule of faith, and are not better off in this respect than if the Bible had never been written. But, let us now pass on to the third class of persons; those who read the Scripture, and who cannot be persuaded that the church's doctrines agree with it. Any Roman Catholic must admit, that such cases, unfortunately, do arise. Many of their divines have asserted, that almost all heresies have arisen from the reading of the Bible. Does it not follow, then, that while the first two classes of persons would not have been worse off if the Bible had never been written, this third class would have been far better off had it never been written?

We shall find still greater reason for coming to this conclusion if we actually compare the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church with the Bible. We say distinctly, that if the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church be true, then the reading of the Scriptures will be certain, in a great majority of cases, to lead a man into error. For example, let us suppose that the Blessed Virgin is justly entitled to the honours paid her in the Roman Catholic Church—honours so great that, in Italy and other countries, she is even more eagerly and more fondly worshipped than her Son—still we believe that a student of Scripture will be almost inevitably led to doubt of the propriety of the worship which his church approves. It will be impossible for him to peruse the meagre accounts given in the New Testament of this so prominent an object of Catholic reverence and worship—to read the brief, frigid (some might even think harsh) speeches of Christ to her—to contemplate the silence of the Apostles, who do not even once mention her name in their epistles—without having the idea suggested, that it was never intended that we should pay her such homage as the Church of Rome demands for her, and without feeling suspicious that the New Testament disowned it, and knew nothing about it.

Again, how must the mind of a devout adherent of the Pope be unsettled—what a shock must be given to his deep reverence for the spiritual head of the church, and his conviction of his undoubted inheritance from the prince of the Apostles of his august prerogatives, when, on examining the Scriptures, he finds no trace of such a personage as the Pope in the sacred page, the title of Bishop of Rome never whispered, no hint given that Peter was ever even there?

Or, again, when a member of the Church of Rome reads the Scriptures, and finds that in all the New Testament not a single mention occurs of any torment to be endured by the righteous after death; and that the Apostles, who so honestly told their converts of all the tribulation they must expect in this world, carefully concealed from them the probability that they should have to bear sufferings in the next—nay, led them to hope for immediate rest from their labours, when released from this troublesome world, and gave them to understand, that when absent from the body they should be present with the Lord—must he not be strongly tempted to doubt the tradition of his church on the subject of Purgatory? And if that tradition be true, will not the reading of the Scriptures have been likely to shake his belief in a capital article of faith?

How many passages of Scripture are there which appear to condemn decisively an adoration paid to images, which the church considers lawful? How many passages which seem to speak of Christ as the only mediator and intercessor? And how completely does the whole Testament seem to ignore those thousands of other intercessors whom the tradition of the church has made known to us?

It would be easy to lengthen this list of points of apparent disagreement between Romish tradition and the Bible. Let the reader, however, only consider the doctrines we have referred to. We are not here disputing but that the Church of Rome may be right on all these points, and that her doctrines may be in some way reconciled with Scripture: all we say is, that there certainly appears to be some disagreement; that many thousands who have read the Bible, with earnest prayer to be directed to the truth, have come to the conclusion that, on these subjects, the doctrine of the Church of Rome does not agree with the Bible—nay, we may add, for ourselves, that if on these subjects we are mistaken, the Scriptures are the cause of our error. We are convinced, then, that if the doctrines of the Church of Rome be true, the reading of the Scriptures is decidedly mischievous, and that it would have been far better for the church had they never been written.

But now comes the difficulty for the Romish theory. God has caused the Scriptures to be written; he surely knew what was best for his church. Are we to suppose that he gave a "revelation" which requires to be carefully concealed? or, that the words of our Saviour and his Apostles were recorded by the Spirit of God only to mislead thousands of those who read them?

For what purpose are we to imagine that the Scriptures were written? Would God have given them to his church as a guide, if he had already provided her with another guide, safer and better? For Roman Catholic divines continually remind us, that oral tradition was first. Now, in the illustration with which we began, we were obliged, in order to make our story probable, to suppose that the traveller had set out with the guide who spoke most obscurely and who had the least to tell; it would have been absurd if we had represented him as taking a second guide, who could tell him nothing but what his first guide told him plainer and better. We ought, however, to have done this, in order, accurately, to illustrate the theory of the Church of Rome. According to her, the church's tradition embraces all the doctrines of Christianity, and teaches them, without possibility of error: and to this guide was added the Bible, which only contains some of these doctrines, and teaches them in such a way as to be likely (more likely than not) to be misunderstood.

The conclusion, to which the preceding reflections have irresistibly led us, is, that if the teaching of the Church of Rome be true, the Scriptures would not have been given. But the Scriptures have been given; therefore, the teaching of the Church of Rome is not true. In fact, we have reason to think, that the system of having two guides does not answer in practice. We have found that the Church of Rome, which proposes to have two guides—Scripture and tradition—finds it necessary, in practice, to silence one of them. We are led, therefore, to believe, that God has given us a single rule of faith; and when we ask what that rule is, since we find that Protestants and Roman Catholics are agreed that the Bible is the rule of faith, although they are not agreed whether anything else is, we cannot hesitate to take that for our guide whose infallibility all confess—Let it be the lantern unto our feet, the light unto our paths.

TALK OF THE ROAD—No. V.

We hope our readers will be glad to hear what Pat and Jem were talking about since. Well, as they were walking home from their work, not long since, Pat asked Jem, "What do you find in the reading now, Jem?"

"Why," says Jem, "my mind was running on that story about the stone and the praty. You mind what you told me about what our blessed Saviour said about it, and it made me think so different of the great God from anything I ever could think before, and it made me feel so different like to him, that I took to reading that place over and over. And sure if I had any doubt about reading the Bible, the reading of that story over and over makes me feel in my heart, that reading God's book is a blessed thing to us poor creatures. And then, when I was reading, the next verse stuck in my mind, and this is it—'Ask and it shall be given to you; seek and you shall find; knock and it shall be opened to you. For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened.' And them words is in my mind, night and day; and there's something I understand, and something I don't."

"Well, tell us about that," says Pat.

"Well," says Jem, "I see plain enough about asking, for sure that is praying to our Father in heaven; and doesn't that say, that if we pray to him, he will answer our prayers. And sure is not that the great thing for the like of us? Well, I see, too, about seeking. If we look to know God, we will come to know him; and where would we seek for him, if we didn't in his own book? Sure I have found more about him there than ever I learned before. But there's one thing I can't make out at all, and that's about knocking; sure that would be at some gate or door like, that seemed closed agen us; but if we don't know what the door is, how can we get to knock at it; and if we don't knock at it, how will we get it open? And I can't make it out at all, and I'm seeking for it, day and night, and thinking maybe will I find it, if I seek."

"Deed and I can help you then," says Pat, "and it's easy to find; for sure I came on it last Sunday, when I was reading the 10th chapter of St. John's Gospel; and though I didn't take heed, as you did, to what our Saviour said about knocking, still I came on the answer."

"And what is it at all?" said Jem.

So Pat repeated the verse (John, ch. 10. v. 6., Douay Bible) where Christ says, "I AM THE DOOR, by me if any man enter in he shall be saved."

"Well if that isn't the very thing," said Jem, "sure I'll never go to work at the Squire's again without thinking of that."

"And why so?" says Pat.

"Don't you know," said Jem, "that big wall round the place, and how would I ever get in without the door in it? and sure isn't that it entirely, when Christ says he's the door? It means the way in, and that there's no stop when the door is open. See the good now of our talking together on the road about the reading. One thing sticks to one person, and another to another; and when we put them together, just see how they fit!"

"Well that's true, anyway," says Pat "but I doubt there's many a one striving to enter in by the Blessed Virgin and the saints, and how will they be? isn't that like making her the door? and, deed, I tried that long enough myself; for sure I never was told it was wrong, or got any teaching to learn me better, till I took to reading. But how will it be at all?"

"Is there anything about that in the Bible?" says Jem. "Is there anything in it nt all for praying to the Blessed Virgin?"

"Well, I don't know," says Pat; "if it's in it I havn't come to it yet."

"Nor I, neither," says Jem; "nor nothing like it. But sure it's hard for me to say that it's not in the Bible; for there's a deal in it that I havn't read yet, a deal more than what I have read; and how can I go to say that it isn't in that?"

"That's true enough," says Pat, "its easy enough sometimes to know that a thing is in the Bible, but it's mighty hard for ignorant creatures like us to know that a thing is not in the Bible. If the priests would only teach us the Bible, and show us what is in it, and what isn't."

"Well Pat," says Jem, "if the things was in it, I suppose they would, and glad enough too; but if the things they teach us isn't in it, how would it be expected they would tell us that, or help us to know it? and that makes me think there is things they teach us that isn't in the Bible at all.

"Well, I mind, now," said Pat, "that I heard Father John preach a sermon against the Protestants, and he said they were heretics because they did not pray to the Blessed Virgin and to the saints and the angels. And I mind he didn't say it was in the Bible; but still he showed us the reason of it; 'for,' says he, 'if you wanted anything of the Queen, sure,' says he, 'it isn't to the Queen you would be going yourself,' says he, 'but you would try and get some one she cared more about than she did about you; and wouldn't your own sense tell you,' says he, 'that it would be better for you to get some great lord or lady to speak for you, than to be putting yourself on her?' Well, now," says Pat, "doesn't all that stand to reason?"

"Well, I mind that sermon, too," says Jem, "and I thought a deal of it then, but I don't now; for I was thinking it over since, and it doesn't stand to reason at all, when you come to look into it; for sure the Queen, God bless her, is only a woman like another after all; and how could she have every one going to herself? Sure she would be fairly worried out of her life, if that was the way. Why, in the time of the famine, sure that was so sore on us, was there man, woman, or child in this parish that wouldn't have gone straight to the Queen, God bless her, if they could only get at her? but how would it be with her, if all Ireland was going to her at wonst, to say nothing of England? Sure she could only talk to one at a time, just like any other; and that's the reason she must have other people for us to speak to, and to speak for us to her. But, sure, that isn't the way with God: sure it couldn't put him out if all the people in the world were praying to him at wonst. So you see it doesn't agree at all when you only come to look into it. And if I could go to the Queen at once, what would stop me? Sure if she was only to see little Billy, and him hungry, and asking me for a praty, when I had none to give him, sure if she could only see that herself, wouldn't it be better for me than if all the lords and ladies in Ireland were talking to her about me. Sure, don't we know that it's seeing that is believing? Don't the quality hear enough about us, and the distress that the poor is in? Sure, they see enough of it in the newspapers to know all about it, but that does no good; but if one of them comes into our houses, and sees the want there, then, sure enough, they give us help. So you see, Pat, it's better for us always just to get to the sight of them if we can, instead of leaving it to others to tell them about us. Now, if God sees what we want himself and if he's able and willing to hear us all, if we were all praying together, without any trouble to himself, why wouldn't we go to himself? Sure it doesn't stand to reason at all, that because the Queen can't see everything and speak to everybody herself, that God can't? And if matters is so different with God and the Queen, it's not common sense for Father John to be telling us that our own sense ought to make us do to God what has to be done to the Queen, only just because she is like another body, and no greater in herself than one of ourselves. I would go straight to her, if I could, and why wouldn't I go straight to God if I can?"

"Well Jem," said Pat, "there's reason in that, sure enough, only I didn't see it before; and sure enough I would spake to the Queen afore the relieving officer or the inspector, if I could, and have more hope in it. But how will we get to know at wonst, if the Bible says anything about praying to the Virgin Mary, or getting her to offer our prayers to God, and to intercede with him for us? For I want to know that, and it would be long to wait till we get all the Bible read through."

"Well, that's what I want to know," said Jem, "and I can't be easy till I get to the knowledge of it. For sure the more I read in the Bible about God's goodness to them that ask him, the harder it seems not to know rightly the right way to ask him. Sure I feel every day more and more, that it can't be right with me till I know how to pray to him in the way that it will please him to hear; and the more I read about him, the more call I feel for praying to him in a way I never did yet, and it's a hard case not to be sure of the right way."

"Why would'nt we ask Mr. Owens?" said Pat, "sure he told us to go back to him any time we pleased, and we did'nt go to him yet, and why won't we ask him about this?"

"Sure that's it," said Jem, "and its early yet, and what's to hinder our just going down to him now; maybe he will just show us what we want in the Bible, and settle us at once: sure enough let us try."

So off they went to Mr. Owens, and if we can find out what passed, our readers shall have it in the next number.

THE TWO FARMERS OF BALLINTUBBER.

There was great joy among the people of the little village of Ballintubber, when it became known, for certain, that their new landlord, the young Lord Kilmarty, was coming to reside among them. It was many years since they had seen the face of a resident landlord. The property had belonged to Mr. Sherwin, an old gentleman, who had lived all the latter part of his life on the Continent; for his debts were so great, that he could not show himself in this country. The whole management of the estate had been left to his agent, Mr. Grip; and how he treated the tenantry, Mr. Sherwin did not care, provided the money, which he expected, was regularly sent over to him. You will guess that much was not done for the improvement of the land, or for the comfort of the people; and, indeed, any one who walked through Ballintubber, would say that it was hard to find a more wretched place, or a more neglected set of inhabitants.

So, when Mr. Sherwin died, and the property passed into the hands of Lord Kilmarty, there was not much sorrow in Ballintubber. They could not well change for the worse; but Lord Kilmarty was known to be very rich, and to be one who would not be forced, by his own necessities, to deal hardly with his tenants: and, besides, there were some who said that they knew him by character, and that he was a very kind man, and a good friend to the poor. All that the people of Ballintubber ventured to hope at first was, that Lord Kilmarty might change his agent, and that they should get rid of Mr. Grip. It would take me too long to tell what reasons they had for not liking him: but I know that he had no one's good word, and that if you could believe all the stories that were told of him, the sooner Lord Kilmarty sent him about his business the better. However, a couple of months after Mr. Sherwin's death, there was a great stir in the village. Workmen were employed in putting the great house to rights, which had been for years going to rack and ruin. By-and-by, furniture and servants were sent down from Dublin; and it was told that the young lord himself was to follow as soon as the place was ready; not to pay them a visit now and then, but to settle for good and all in Ballintubber. The evening he came down, you would have thought the people had all gone mad for joy. They did not ring the bells, because they had not got any to ring, but bonfires large enough to roast an ox were blazing in every direction, and the shouting and hurrooing were such as you never heard the like of. And when their young landlord made them a short speech, thanking them for the welcome they had given him, and promising to live among them, they all went home as happy as if their fortunes were made. A few days after, they were pleased to hear that what they all wished had come to pass, and that Mr. Grip was no longer the agent; but when they asked who was to be his successor, they were not a little surprised to learn that Lord Kilmarty had said that he intended to be his own agent.

"Let him try it for a little while," said Mr. Grip, "I am thinking he'll get tired of it before long." At all events, the young nobleman in the first instance went to work like a man. He had a good knowledge of the best methods of farming; and early and late he was to be seen going about his estate, visiting his tenants' houses, examining what improvements were required, and giving them whatever advice he thought they wanted. They all said that a freer-spoken, civiller gentleman, they had never met. He was not the least bit proud or high in himself. And they thought it mighty odd, for Mr. Grip was so haughty in his manners, that when a poor man spoke to him he would hardly give him a civil answer, and they had expected that, as Lord Kilmarty was a much greater man than Mr. Grip, he would be ten times as hard to speak to. But they found it just the contrary. For the landlord was a great deal more agreeable to deal with than ever the agent used to be; he was fond of his joke, and had something pleasant to say to everybody.

However, the truth must be told, that after the first novelty was over, many of the people began to be a good deal disappointed in the expectations they had formed of their new landlord. The fact was, that many of them expected more than any ten men could satisfy. They seemed to fancy that they were not to stir a hand for themselves, but that their landlord was to clothe them, and feed them, and even to put the food into their mouths. Lord Kilmarty very soon put a stop to any such unreasonable expectations. He let it be seen that his rule was to help those who would try to help themselves; and when he had to find fault with any of them, for the neglected state in which he found their holdings, he did not give them much encouragement if they wanted to throw all the blame on their former landlord. For instance, one day, he was looking at Dan Kelly's farm, by the river, and was remarking to him many things which were not as they should be. Now, Dan Kelly, who was a very well disposed man, though somewhat lazy, and a little too apt to be led by other people, began to make excuses.

"Oh, your honour, if we had always had a landlord like your lordship—but Mr. Sherwin never came near us; and as for Mr. Grip, we only wished he was along with Mr. Sherwin."

"Don't tell me of Mr. Sherwin or Mr. Grip," said Lord Kilmarty—"was it Mr. Sherwin that made that great hole in your thatch, which is enough to set you all floating the next fall of rain, or was it Mr. Grip's business to mend all these gaps in your fence, through which I see your neighbour, Pat Callaghan's cows, come to get their share of your fine meadow—for a fine meadow it would be, if the stones and the weeds were picked out of it.

Besides the good-humoured war which Lord Kilmarty waged in this way against the indolent habits of some of his tenantry, another subject of disagreement was, the best mode of conducting farming operations. I told you before, that Lord Kilmarty had given a great deal of his attention to the science of agriculture, and he came down full of plans for improvement in the manner in which he saw his tenants' farming was carried on. But a great many of them steadily set their faces against the new-fangled ways which their landlord was trying to bring in, and said, that what had been good enough for their fathers and grandfathers, was good enough for them. It was only by a good deal of patience, and by taking them very quietly, that Lord Kilmarty got on. He set them an example of the best system on the lands which he farmed himself, and after the first disappointment was over of some of those tenants who expected him to work miracles for them, they began to feel that he was really trying to do them good, and to be willing to follow his advice. Mr. Grip's prophecy was not fulfilled. Three or four years passed by, and Lord Kilmarty did not yet appear tired of being his own agent, and he might be seen as busy as ever in looking after his estate. The face of the property showed a great change since the day he had first come down. And nowhere was their a greater improvement to be seen, than in the farms of Dan Kelly and Pat Callaghan, of whom mention has been made just now. In Mr. Sherwin's time, they had been always in distress, and their whole farm bore a poverty-stricken appearance. Now, everything about their place looked thriving and flourishing. Their meadows by the river side, produced crops of grass twice as heavy as they formerly used to be; and any one who saw their cattle and the ricks near their house, would have pronounced them very well to do in the world. With all this, their rents were now paid to the day. When Lord Kilmarty came into the property, he had to forgive them a year's arrear of rent. He soon made known that he intended to adopt a new plan with his tenants. Formerly the rent had been fixed at the highest sum the tenants could be got to bid, but then, many of them did not find it as easy to pay these sums as to promise to do so; they were always in arrear, and, consequently, kept in perpetual terror by Mr. Grip. Lord Kilmarty told them, that he wished his tenants to be able to live by their farms; he fixed their rents at a fair rate, and he was ready to give them every reasonable assistance, but then, he expected them to be punctual in paying what they had agreed with him for. And when they had made trial for some time how Lord Kilmarty's system worked, the most of them were ready to acknowledge that it was the best after all.

However, four or five years after Lord Kilmarty had got possession of the estate, he was obliged by very important law business to go over to London. He could not exactly tell how long he might be detained there; but he hoped that it would not be very long. You may be sure the tenantry were sorry to lose him, and the more so because many of them were afraid that he would make Mr. Grip his agent while he was away, for there was no one else at Ballintubber whom he could well employ. Dan Kelly asked him the question a few evenings before he left, as he had come down by his and Pat Callaghan's farm taking leave of them all, "who was to manage the estate while he was away?"

"Well," said Lord Kilmarty, "as I hope not to be very long away, I don't see why I may not go on managing it myself still. Mr. Dormer, the attorney, will be down from Dublin at the proper time to collect the rents; but if there is anything you want done for you, you must write to myself. Now that we have the penny postage, it won't break you to send me a letter if it should be necessary; and whatever you ask that I find right and reasonable, I will give directions to have done for you."

"Troth," said Pat Callaghan, "it is we that won't want to trouble your lordship. Your lordship has done everything for us that we could expect, and we'll be sure to have the rent punctual for Mr. Dormer when he comes."

However, Lord Kilmarty said that circumstances might occur which might render it necessary for them to write to him; so he wrote down on the paper the right way of directing of a letter to him, and left it with them, promising that he would attend to their letters, and also that he would return from London whenever his business should permit. Pat and Dan thought this very kind of their landlord, but they resolved to show him, if they could, now that they had been set going, how well they could go on of themselves. For, ever since they had begun to thrive they had learned a decent spirit of independence; and they hoped that when the young nobleman came back, they would be able to show him everything prospering as well with them as when his eye had been constantly on them. But in these hopes they were sadly disappointed. The winter after Lord Kilmarty had left them was the severest ever remembered at Ballintubber, and it lasted so long that they thought they were not have any spring at all. The little river that was usually so peaceable, at one time this season came tearing down in such floods as had not been known within the memory of man. It was all very well for those who lived on the high grounds, but poor Pat Callaghan and Dan Kelly, whose farms lay low by the river, were great sufferers. It was one very blustering night, after Dan had been kept awake till late, listening to the storm and rain, and thinking how well it was he had a better roof over his head than when first Lord Kilmarty saw it. Not very long after he had dropped asleep he was awakened by the cackling of the fowls, and on getting up found the room all afloat, and the river outside running like a mill-race. He tried to go out, but the night was too dark and the storm was too great for him to be of any use. When morning came out he could see all the mischief which had been done. The stream had torn and swept away property of all kinds. It was only a wonder their houses had escaped. Two of his few cattle had been drowned, and a fine rick, which he had been keeping up, expecting that the prices would be better before he need sell, was carried down the river for a mile. Pat Callaghan did not lose so much as Dan Kelly, though he lost more than he could afford; but he was not a strong man, and he had to bear so much wet and cold, that he got a bad attack of rheumatism, which left him unable to work for a long time. As the time of paying their rent came near, at which they had been once expecting to have had so much pride in showing their punctuality, they found, on the contrary, that they could not be ready with their rent. And, more than that, they were very badly off besides; so that, even if the rent was forgiven them, they saw it would be a hard matter for them to live, to say nothing of working their farms. Many a talk the two men had together on the change in their affairs; and Dan Kelly said one day, as he had said, indeed, often before—

"Well, if Lord Kilmarty was at home, we would not be tried this way. I'll be bound he'd help us over our present difficulties, and put us in the way of doing for ourselves, as we were doing before this winter.

"Why, then," said Pat—and a bright thought seemed to strike him—"What is to prevent us letting Lord Kilmarty know now the way we are in? Did not he tell us to write to him if anything went wrong with us? and I don't think we need wait for matters to be much worse than they are."

Dan was at first a little afraid of this proposal. He said that he did not know where was the paper which Lord Kilmarty left with his directions on it; but Pat Callaghan brought it out from where he had put it, safe in the box under his bed. Then Dan said he was no scholar; but Pat knew that he could write as well as himself, which was not very well, to be sure.

Then Dan said he had got no paper, and, as Pat was not better off, the conversation ended in their both going together to Mr. O'Reilly, the schoolmaster, who was teaching their children, and who had given them a helping hand before, when they had happened to want to send a letter to a friend. For Mr. O'Reilly was a good-natured man and obliging, though it was said in Ballintubber that he was able to sack the Provost of Trinity College in learning. Mr. O'Reilly gave them the paper very willingly, asking them, however, who they were going to write to; but when they said it was to Lord Kilmarty, he pushed up his spectacles on his forehead and stared at them as if they had seven heads.

"Cock you up," said he, "and so nothing less than writing to a lord would serve you. Why, then, and do you think he would be bothered reading a letter from the likes of you? And, even suppose he did, what do you know about the way a lord ought to be written to? Did you ever write to one in your life before? A pretty letter you'll make of it. I would give sixpence to see how it would look on a silver dish when his lordship's footman brings it into him."

"Well," said Dan, "my mind misgave me, when Pat talked about writing to his lordship, that it was but a sorry hand we would make of it; but you see, sir, we are in distress, and if we thought his lordship would attend to our letter, it might set us right in the world again."

"I dare say," said Mr. O'Reilly, "that when his lordship knows your state, he will give you help if you don't give him offence; but you cannot tell what affront he might take at such a letter as you could send him, since you do not know how to write it with proper forms of respect."

"I am sure," said Pat, "his lordship knows that we all respect him, and I don't think he'd be the man to take offence at a poor man's ignorance; but, Mr. O'Reilly, you are a learned man and a scholar, and if you would write the letter for us to his lordship, you would put us both under great obligation."

"Ahem," said Mr. O'Reilly, somewhat mollified by this request, "no doubt, a letter written with judgment and discretion would have a different effect from one that you would write yourselves. I have written letters to some of the first gentry in Ireland, and though I have addressed epistles to none of the nobility, I am sure I could indite such a letter to his lordship as would succeed with him, if he was likely to give any attention to your affairs. But my opinion is, that no matter who writes the letter, Lord Kilmarty has many better things to think on, than on two poor farmers of Ballintubber. So, if you will be ruled by me, it is not to Lord Kilmarty you will send the letter, but to Mr. Harris."

"And who is Mr. Harris?" cried both the men together.

"Mr. Harris," replied Mr. O'Reilly, "is Lord Kilmarty's English steward; and I have it from those that have a right to know, that he can do what he likes with his lordship, and that if you have his good word, you may make sure your petition is as good as granted. So, write your letter to Mr. Harris; he is not a nobleman, and he will not be above reading a poor man's letter, and getting his master's promise to do what you want."

"But," said Dan, "we don't know where Mr. Harris lives, or how we are to direct to him."

"Why, then, you omadhaun, where could he live except with Lord Kilmarty? At all events, if you direct your letter to Lord Kilmarty he will take care that Mr. Harris gets it."

All Dan Kelly's objections were now overcome; but Pat Callaghan, who was more obstinate, exclaimed—

"A purty roundabout plan that would be: we are to send the letter to Lord Kilmarty, and then he is to find Mr. Harris, and give him our letter, and then Mr. Harris is to tell his lordship our requests. Now, if his lordship is so good-natured as to have our letter sent to Mr. Harris, why wouldn't he be good-natured enough too to read it if it was written to himself?"

Mr. O'Reilly was going to speak, but Pat went on—

"And more than that," said he, "here's now near five years that we know Lord Kilmarty, and a kinder and more thoughtful gentleman no one could wish to see; he was never too proud to speak to us when he was here, and it will be newly come to him if he is too proud to read our letters now; and Dan Kelly heard him as well as myself, one of the last evenings he was here, when he told us if ever we were in trouble, to write to him, and he would be sure to do for us whatever was right and proper: and he showed us how to direct to him, so that there is no doubt but our letters will get safe to him; but this Mr. Harris I never heard of before this blessed evening; and even if he gets our letters, how do I know whether he will care for us, men that he never saw? So, Mr. O'Reilly, Dan Kelly may do what he likes, but I won't go to a man I don't know, away from the man that was always kind and good to me."

When Pat answered out so hot and stout, Mr. O'Reilly lost his temper.

"And isn't it great presumption," said he, "in an ignorant man like you to go against your betters; to go setting up your own judgment against the advice of one that was schoolmaster in this parish before you were born? What reason have you to suppose I would recommend you to do what is bad for you?"

"Why, then," said Pat, "you may be my better, but Lord Kilmarty is your better, and you ought not to be offended if I mind what he said to me more than what you're telling me." And off Pat went, leaving Mr. O'Reilly in a rage.

"Mark my words," said he to Dan, "that neighbour of yours will come to no good. I never saw good come of people rejecting the advice of those that are wiser than themselves; he'll give offence to his lordship, and you'll see him turned out of his farm one of those fine mornings. I hope you will not be so foolish as to follow his example."

"No, sir," said Dan, "but I would like to know from whom you heard all about Mr. Harris?"

"Do you think," said Mr. O'Reilly, "I am bound to tell you how I came by all my knowledge? And do you think you could understand if I was to explain it to you? It ought to be enough for you that I tell you, and you need not ask any more questions. But will you take my advice, or will you not?"

"I will, sir, and thank you kindly," said Dan.

So the two letters were written and sent, Pat's to Lord Kilmarty, and Dan's to Mr. Harris, and both the neighbours waited anxiously to see what would be the result of the application.

They had only about a fortnight to wait before something came of it, for a strange gentleman made his appearance in the village. First they thought it was Mr. Dormer come to collect the rents, but it turned out to be some kind of surveyor or engineer, and they found he had been sent by Lord Kilmarty to examine what could be done to prevent the river from damaging their property again, as it had done that winter.

Dan went up with the news to Mr. O'Reilly. "Well, now," said he, "are you glad you took my advice? Take my word for it you never did a better day's work in your life than when you wrote that letter to Mr. Harris; if he takes you up you are a made man; and now what I would recommend you to do is, to write him another letter, thanking him for what he has already done, and asking him to be sure to speak to Lord Kilmarty about this next gale of rent you have to pay."

Dan thought this very sensible advice, and he sent off the letter accordingly; and he thought to himself, "It is lucky for Pat Callaghan to come in for some of the benefit of the work Mr. Harris is going to get done on the river, but I wonder how he will be off when Mr. Dormer comes for the rent."

It was not many days before Mr. Dormer himself arrived, and Pat and Dan went up with anxious hearts to settle with him. Pat had been the first to go, and Dan met him as he was coming away, with joy in his face.

"Look here," said he, "here is the receipt for the last half year's rent; Lord Kilmarty wrote word that I was to be forgiven the whole of this gale. I did not venture to expect more than that he would forgive me some, and give me time for the rest."

This gave Dan great courage going in to Mr. Dormer, for he thought, "If so much was done for Pat, who had no one to speak for him, what will be done for me who have Mr. Harris to back me?" So in he went; but he felt rather awkward when, after he had told his name to Mr. Dormer, the latter only said—"So, I suppose you are come with your rent.

"Please your honour," said he, "this has been a very hard winter with us, and I was in hopes Lord Kilmarty would have written to you about me."

"Do you mean to say you have not brought the rent?" said Mr. Dormer; "I have got your name down on my list here as a very strong farmer, well able to pay; but there are a great many of you scheming fellows, with plenty of money in the savings' bank, but when you come to your landlord, you have nothing for him but excuses."

"I am no schemer, sir," said Dan; "all the neighbours can tell you what I lost in the floods this last winter; and there's my neighbour, Pat Callaghan, that did not lose more than me, and he has been forgiven all his rent; I think it a very hard case that his lordship should put differences between us."

"I had his lordship's directions to forgive him his rent," said Mr. Dormer, "and I have had no directions about you; I can only go by the directions I get, and I advise you to have your rent ready for me next month, when I'll be going this way again, or else maybe it'll be the worse for you."

So Dan went away feeling very cross and vexed, and up he went to Mr. O'Reilly to tell him his story. Mr. O'Reilly was very much surprised, and he said—

"You may be sure there is some mistake; Mr. Harris must have spoken about you, and Mr. Dormer must have excused Pat Callaghan by mistake, instead of you. You had better write over again to Mr. Harris, and tell him the way you are in, and ask him to have the mistake rectified."

"Do you think that was the way, sir?" said Dan. "Well, I'll do as you bid me; only I can't put out of my head what Pat says, that I can't expect Mr. Harris, that never saw me, to care as much for me as Lord Kilmarty, that knows me well?"

"Well," said Mr. O'Reilly, "there's no harm in your having two strings to your bow; and you may write another letter to Mr. Thomson, the butler, that was very civil to you when he was over here with his lord; I dare say he'll speak a word for you to his master."

So the two letters were sent, and Mr. O'Reilly saw no more of Dan for two or three weeks, until one evening he saw him coming up to him, with a very long face.

"Well, Dan, I suppose you have had letters from England?"

"Sorra the letter," said Dan: "but, instead of that, there's worse happened to me than ever."

"What worse?" said Mr. O'Reilly.

"There's Mr. Grip, the taring villain, has seized my cow for poor-rates—the only cow I had left since the floods—and would not take any excuse or put off—bad luck to him! and Pat Callaghan has had his rates paid by Lord Kilmarty; and he says it serves me right for not writing to his lordship himself; for, he says, his lordship is not a man to be led by his servants, but that he does what he considers right himself, and that it is better for me to write to him now—better late than never, sir, if you approve of it."

"Indeed, I don't approve of it, Dan," said Mr. O'Reilly, "and I gave you my reasons before; it is all very well for your neighbour, Pat Callaghan, now; but you'll find, in the end, he did not better himself by his impudence in going troubling his lordship with letters."

"But what am I to do, sir," said Dan.

"I'll tell you," said Mr. O'Reilly, "it might be that his lordship would not mind his servants; but do you think he'd refuse to listen to his mother? So what we'll do is, we'll write a letter to the old countess; and, I think, Pat Callaghan won't say that she hasn't got any interest with her son."

Dan liked this plan very much; but when he came home, and told Pat what he had done, Pat only shook his head at him.

"I thought," said he, "that to-day at last you'd have been brought to write to himself; and it is to his mother you are going! She may be a very good woman, for all I know; but how can she know who you are? or what can she care for you? And you know well that Lord Kilmarty both knows and would benefit you."

Dan was vexed at this, and said—

"You'll find, before long, you're in the wrong box. Expecting to get his lordship's favour, and talking disrespectfully about his mother! To be sure she'd know all about me. Do you think his lordship would keep secrets from her? and, in course, he'd have told her who I was, and all about me."

"I am not talking disrespectfully of her," said Pat, "but I think this, that if his lordship cared enough about you to be talking about you to his mother, he'd care enough about you to grant you a small petition; and, what's more, I know this, that when he went away he did not say, when you are in trouble write to Mr. Harris, or to Mr. Thomson, or write to my mother; but he said, write to myself; and I'll go by what he told me, and not by what Mr. O'Reilly tells me."

Well, not to make my story too long, no more came of this application than of the others. Dan had not his rent ready for Mr. Dormer when he came round again, and Mr. Dormer had no directions to release him; and I don't know what he would have done, only that he had got word that Lord Kilmarty was to be back soon; so he let the whole matter lie over for his lordship himself to decide on.

When his lordship came home, and, after a few days, walked down by the river, he was grieved to see things looking so much worse than he had left them. Pat's farm was beginning to come round; but Dan's, which had always looked the best before, was now in great wretchedness. Dan came to him, and told him all his story—what losses he had, and how Mr. Dormer had pressed him for the rent, and how Mr. Grip had seized his cow, and how Pat Callaghan had been forgiven, and nothing was done for him.

"But," said Lord Kilmarty, "Pat Callaghan, wrote to me as I bid him, but I never had a line from you. I left you well off, and how was I to know you were in any trouble?"

Then Dan told him how Mr. O'Reilly had advised him against writing to him, and had made him write to Mr. Harris.

"I never had a servant of the name," said Lord Kilmarty.

"But, my lord, how could I think Mr. O'Reilly could be mistaken? It was he taught me to read, and only for him I would not have been able to read the directions your lordship left me, and so I thought I could not be wrong in following his advice now."

"Not even when his advice was contrary to the advice I had given you myself?" said Lord Kilmarty.

"But what did you do when you did not hear from Mr. Harris?"

Why, then, my lord, I wrote to Mr. Thomson, the butler, that I got acquainted with when your lordship was over here before."

"Thomson is not with me now," said Lord Kilmarty; "he is with my sister, in Yorkshire, and I suppose he never got your letter; and even if he had, I think you might have paid me the compliment to think you would be likely to find as good a friend in me as in him. But what next?"

"Why then, my lord, I wrote to your lordship's mother, and I hope she spoke to you for me."

"My mother," said Lord Kilmarty, "has never been in Ireland in her life, and probably never heard your name. I see you are sorry now for your mistakes; you have suffered enough by them, and I hope to have you set well a-going again; but take this piece of advice in future—Whenever you can get the master to listen to you, never tell your story to the man."

CONVERSION OF MR. J. KENNEDY, OF NENAGH.

WE condense some of the most interesting reasons given by this persecuted gentleman for abandoning Rome, and becoming free, as addressed to the Nenagh Guardian:—

"SIR—As several false and malicious reports, concerning my reasons for leaving the Church of Rome, have been put into circulation, I beg leave, through your columns, to lay before the public a true and accurate statement of the reasons which led me to take so important a step. I will mention nothing but plain facts, and let any one of the priests who are here named contradict me if they can.

"Now, I can confidently appeal to the clergy and townspeople of Nenagh, as to whether I ever neglected my religious duties; I heard mass daily, often three times in one day; I was always regular in my attendance on the ceremonies of the Church of Rome. I did not interfere one way or the other in the late Nenagh chapel differences. I believe I and two others were the only men in the town who, for weeks, went to the chapel after it was opened, and for which I was grossly insulted. What, then, brought about the change in my views? I observed in some of the printed reports, which I happened to read, of the controversial sermons preached here last year by Protestant ministers, constant reference to the Douay, or Roman Catholic Bible, in support of their arguments. I thought this very odd, and so, having recourse to a Bible approved of by Dr. Denvir, of Belfast, I read for myself, and to my great amazement soon found out many things in it which I knew were contrary to the Church of Rome. I then bought another Roman Catholic Bible, approved of by the present Cardinal Wiseman; but I found they both agreed in being contrary to the Church. I then went to confession to the Rev. Mr. Connellan, and told him some of my doubts, and amongst the rest, why the cup was not given to the laity, as commanded by our Lord? He told me the Church dispensed with it. I asked for what reason? He replied, 'To avoid inconveniences in giving communion to the sick.' He then gave me absolution, and I received the sacrament; but my mind not being satisfied, I still continued reading the Bible.

"When the Jesuits were preaching in Nenagh, I paid great attention to their sermons. Moreover, I went to confession for the jubilee, and having selected the best confessor I heard of, I told him my doubts, and mentioned that I had stood sponsor for my grandchild, the son of Mr. Edward Bourke, of Conece, in the county of Galway, who was baptized in the Protestant Church of Woodford. But he only desired me to go to my last confessor. But I said to myself—Mr. Connellan has already failed to satisfy my doubts. So, some days after, having to go to Dublin, I went to John's-lane chapel and heard two masses. I saw the bishop, and heard his mass. I then selected the most pious and talented of the priests there, and confessed to him. I told him my doubts, and how I could not but suspect I was not in the true Church. I mentioned the fact of the Church of Rome excluding the second commandment from so many of her catechisms; the taking away the cup from the laity; that the Pope did not appear to me to be following God's commands in slaughtering his subjects, in order to retain temporal power. 'I think,' said I, 'God never ordered his Church to put any one to death.' He then got quite angry with me, and said, 'why should I dare to doubt respecting a Church which had stood for eighteen centuries?' 'Mahometanism,' I replied, 'was nearly as old, and yet an error.' He then asked me did I belong to Dublin or the country? and on my telling him to the country, he desired me to go and pray certain prayers, and to banish such thoughts out of my mind, and to come to confession the following day. I did so, and told him I could not succeed, but promised to do my best. He then asked me could I not get my grandchild christened by a priest? I said I could, as I knew my daughter would not disoblige me. He laid it as imperative on me to get the child christened again, and so gave me absolution, and I got the sacrament.

"I returned home and continued to read the Roman Catholic Bible, and I saw by it more clearly every day that I had been educated and was living in error. I told several friends of my doubts, and it was talked of through the town. The Rev. Mr. Nagle called on me on Friday, the 5th May last; and, not finding me at home, he said he would call again at two o'clock. I was accordingly sent for and waited his return. He came, and after the usual courtesies—and I must say he has in this respect advantages that many priests I know do not possess—he told me he heard a report that I was about to abandon the church, and that he called as he knew it was a falsehood, and wished to contradict it. I replied that if he could, on good authority, show me anything to controvert the written Word of God, I was satisfied; otherwise I would abandon the Church of Rome. 'On what grounds?' he asked. 'It shuts out of view the second commandment,' I replied, 'takes away the cup from the laity, and promises to make saints on earth, sends them up to heaven, whether God wills or not, and gets me and such foolish wretches as me to adore them, and sets up their images in places of worship, contrary to God's express command—Deut. xvi. 21, 22.' He asked me had I been speaking to any Protestant on the subject? I said, 'No; that I never heard a sermon from a Protestant, nor ever spoke on the subject to a minister or Scripture-reader.' 'Now, as to relative honour,' said he, 'did you not read how Christ pointed to the image on the coin, and said, "Render to Cæsar the honor due to him."' 'And is relative honour, therefore, to be paid to saints?' said I: 'no, on the contrary—that means, give to the world what belongs to the world, and to God what belongs to him.' He then referred to the age of the church—its miracles and tradition. I told him we had tradition for fairies, and that I would believe the written Word of God before all the men on earth. 'So,' said he, 'you are forsaking your religion on your own authority, without consulting any person.' 'I am,' I replied, 'on the authority of the written Word of God. Is it not said plainly of the Church of Rome in St. John's Apocalypse, xviii. 4—And I heard another voice from heaven, go out from her, my people, that you may not be partaker of her sins, and that you receive not of her plagues? and,' I said, 'Mr. Nagle, just look at your prayers to saints, and calling the Virgin Mary our life, our sweetness, our hope, robbing God of the honour due to him alone. And sure it was only the other day at Thurles that, in obedience to Dr. Cullen, they declared her immaculate conception. So they know more about her now, eighteen centuries after her death, than the Council of Trent 300 years ago, or the holy Fathers of the early church. And, Mr. Nagle, had you not some sort of a doll or wax figure in the chapel on Good Friday last; and were not the ignorant people told that every one who kissed it would have seven years' indulgence. And look at these catechisms out of which I have been taught, and not a trace to be found in them of the second commandment. And why was it left out, let me ask you? And look at this scapular book; I will show you from your own Bible that it is a glaring falsehood—and why do you permit such things? And lastly, why won't you let the people read the Bible for themselves?' 'Is it to have them all like you?' he said. 'Well, but,' said I, 'is it on the Bible that the church is laid, or is it not?' He said it was, 'but, for all that, you are the most presumptuous man I ever knew, to leave our church on your own single authority.' 'Well,' I said, 'I will not go to mass nor church on Sunday next; I am still open to conviction; show me anything that will satisfy my mind, and I will willingly stick to that church I was fond of.' He then went away, and I continued for some time in a woeful state, thinking of the many bright stars, monks, and nuns, apparently of the purest life in the church, besides so many Protestant clergymen of rank and education, going to the Church of Rome. Then I prayed fervently to God to teach me the truth, and keep me from error, and going to my Bible I came on these passages:—'Now the spirit manifestly saith, that in the last time some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to spirits of error and doctrines of devils, speaking in hypocrisy, and having their conscience seared; forbidding to marry, and to abstain from meats; which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving by the faithful, and by them that have known the truth—1 Tim. iv. 1-5.' Well, thought I, one thing is clear, this can't mean the Protestant Church; for they don't forbid to marry, nor prohibit the use of meats; and thus, at least according to the Apostle, they seem to know the truth. I read also in Gal. i. 8—'But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach a gospel to you beside that which we have preached to you, let him be anathema.' This the apostle emphatically repeats in the 9th verse. And where, thought I, can I find with certainty the Gospel which the apostle preached, but in the written Word of God? and surely if I hold by that, I can't go wrong.

"Now, I ask my townspeople to remember that I am not young, being now fifty-five years of age—that my family are settled in life—that I never was considered ambitious nor arrogant: what made me, then, expose myself voluntarily to insult and violence? Nothing but the eternal salvation of my soul, for which I am alone accountable. And if the parties who now assail me knew the happiness and peace of mind I now enjoy, it's not pity they would feel for me, but envy.

"They then broke nearly all the glass in the windows of the house I reside in, and it grieved me to see two Roman Catholic clergymen passing by laughing at the wreck. But it is well known that violence is always the argument they use to deter the people from seeing and using the light which God in his mercy bestows upon them in his word. But what pained me most of all was, to see my aged brother, Lieut. Kennedy, shedding bitter tears and telling me I was going to damn my soul; that the Church of England was raised on Luther, as every Roman Catholic is taught to believe, and as I believed myself for many years, though now, thank God, from reading his Word, I known the difference.

"But I have also been looking a little into the history of the church; and I was very much shaken by the following circumstance:—The priest in John's-lane Chapel made me promise, before he would give me absolution, to have my grandchild again baptized by a priest; and yet he swore on the Gospels of God, at his ordination, that he did 'undoubtedly receive and profess all things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and general councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent.' And in the fourth canon of that very council it is thus decreed—'Whoever shall affirm that baptism, when administered by heretics, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, with the intention to do what the church does, is not true baptism, let him be accursed.' What will the priest in St. John's-lane Chapel, in the city of Dublin, say to this?

"And, then, when I came to understand all the contradictions of God's Word that the Church of Rome teaches and practises, what opinion could I have of the craft and wickedness of trying to keep me, and all other Roman Catholics in ignorance that there are such contradictions? Then I plainly saw why no one was encouraged by the priest to read even the Douay Bible, and some were forbidden to read it, and others told that it was too hard for them to understand it, though the mass, and prayers in Latin are not too hard. I thank God, from my very heart, that, after being so long without it, I at last undertook to study it, whereby I discovered how opposed it is to a great deal of what the church teaches; and how the glorious tidings of free and full pardon through Christ my Lord had been concealed from me, and how that, and the purifying influence of the Holy Spirit were put aside by the false doctrines about penances and purgatory. I once thought to serve God like a slave, so much work did I go through, for fear of his anger. Now, seeing his great love to me, and the wonderful salvation he offers to me by the means of so great a sacrifice—that of his own Son once offered on the cross, whereby 'he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified,' my chief desire is to serve him like a son, willingly, out of humble affection and heartfelt gratitude.

"JOHN KENNEDY."

REPLY TO MR. AYLMER'S LETTER ON READING THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

(7) Mr. Aylmer joins issue with us on the scriptural proof that the priests were to be regarded as "the JUDGES authorized by God to expound his law, and their exposition to be considered BINDING." He quotes Ezek. xliv. 24, which clearly refers only to temporal or criminal causes (in which the Jewish priests were judges), and not to controversies in religion. He quotes next Mal. ii. 7—"for the lips of the priest shall keep knowledge." Now, in the article he refers to, we have already quoted the next verse (8), in which God says to those very priests, "but you have departed out of the way, and caused many to stumble at the law." Mr. Aylmer takes no notice of this, but still claims verse 7 as binding us to whatever the priests say; so we now refer him to verse 9, in which God goes on to say—"Therefore have I also made you (the priests) contemptible, and base before all people." Now, granting, as we do, that the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and that the people should seek it at his mouth, yet when God says that when those priests went astray he himself made them to be despised by the people, is that a proof that God intended that the people should take as binding whatever the priest said, whether right or wrong?

How comes it that they who profess to have an infallible interpreter of Scripture, do always misapply Scripture, and wrest it so strangely, while they who are fallible are thus able to correct them? We shall explain this another time.

Mr. Aylmer also refers to John xv. 27—a text expressly limited to the testimony of those who had been with Christ from the beginning—i.e., his twelve Apostles. How does this apply to priests now?

He quotes also Acts viii. 26. This was the case of a man reading for himself with the Bible in his hands, and confessing that he found it very hard to understand without some one to guide him. A minister of the Gospel (not a "priest," for he was only a deacon) was sent to him, not to take the book away from him, because he could not understand it, but to help and instruct him in reading. Is this most like the practice of the Roman Catholic priests, or of the clergy of the Church of England and Ireland now?

(8) Mr. Aylmer next calls the Scripture "a dead letter," unable to speak for itself. We confess we do not understand this, nor can we perceive what there is to prevent any man who has eyes, and knows how to read, from obtaining, by perusal of the "letter," a knowledge of the "spirit and meaning." On his next point we think we may come to an agreement. We agree with him that, as in civil affairs, there are not only laws but also judges, whose business it is to explain those laws, so God has provided us not only with a written Word, but also with a distinct order of men, whose business it is to explain that Word. Only we do not believe that every priest is infallible, and we suppose neither does Mr. Aylmer. The rule of faith is the written Word and not the priest's teaching (for the written Word is the rule by which the correctness of the priest's teaching is tested), just as, in civil matters, the rule is the law of the land and not the decision of any judge. The decision of an able judge on a doubtful point is regarded as an authority, but is not absolutely binding on his brethren; and if a judge decide plainly contrary to the law, other judges would regard his ruling without any respect at all.

(9) Mr. Aylmer asks—"If we were to be exercising private judgment, where would be the end of litigation and dispute?" We acknowledge that, when fallible men exercise private judgment, there must be risk of error, and consequently room for dispute; and we might have fancied that God would have made a world into which it should be impossible for error to enter. But we know that he has not done so. We must exercise our private judgment, if on no other question at least on this, whether we will use our private judgment on other questions or not. Mr. Aylmer, in the exercise of his private judgment, has arrived at the conclusion that the Church of Rome is infallible, and that he must submit his judgment to her in all religious matters: but in so judging we are convinced he has not escaped error; and this very discussion makes it clear that he has certainly not escaped litigation and dispute. Why God should have left his creatures liable to error is a difficulty which we shall undertake to explain when Mr. Aylmer has accounted for the existence of sin in the world, and has given a satisfactory explanation why earth is not heaven. At any rate we must not refuse to employ the faculties which God has given us, in the hope of avoiding some inconveniences with which the use of them is attended. To give up private judgment, in the hope of avoiding litigation and dispute, is the same as if a man should cure his corns by cutting off his legs.

(10) Mr. Aylmer next says—"Our Blessed Lord never wrote or commanded his disciples to write anything." This assertion he has unwarily copied from Dr. Milner (End of Controversy, letter 8); but that is not true, may immediately be seen by referring to Apocalypse or Revelations, chap. 1, and verses 11, 19. But even supposing that we had not been able to show that Jesus Christ had commanded his Apostles to write anything, what then? Will Mr. Aylmer venture to say that the Apostles wrote the Scriptures by accident or out of their own heads? He knows that his Church holds, that the writers of that Sacred Volume were moved by the Holy Ghost. And as he certainly holds the doctrine of the Trinity, he must believe that what they wrote, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, was written in obedience to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ.

This is really the question on which the whole controversy turns; for if the Apostles wrote the Scriptures according to the promptings of their human wills, then it would be very credible that some of the Christian doctrines might be contained in their writings, and others in the writings of uninspired men. But if we believe that the Holy Spirit directed the formation of the canon of Scripture, then the only account we can give of the reason why the Scriptures were given is, that they were intended to preserve, free from the insecurity of oral tradition, in a permanent form, all the essential doctrines of the Gospel. And it is difficult to believe that this work was left imperfect, and that there are any doctrines which God did not see fit to embody in his word and yet which it is necessary for us to believe. It was to escape this plain inference that Dr. Milner was led to assert that Jesus Christ never commanded his Apostles to write anything; and to insinuate (for he dared not to express it) that the Apostolic writings are a mere fortuitous collection of humanly suggested compositions.

(11) Mr. Aylmer quotes Heb. i. 2—"God hath spoken (not written) to us by his Son." The verse before is, "God who . . spoke in times past to the fathers by the prophets." Did not this apply to the writing of the prophets as well as their spoken words? So St. Peter (1 Ep. iii. 16) says of Paul's epistles, "speaking in them of these things." Would Mr. A. infer from that that St. Paul delivered his epistles by word of mouth, and did not write them?

(12) Mr. Aylmer says, Christ "did not say, He that readeth or heareth the Scriptures," &c. We refer to Apocalypse, chap. i. v. 3, where Christ did say of that book, confessedly the most difficult in the Bible, "Blessed is he that readeth and heareth the words of this prophecy."

(13) Mr. Aylmer's quotation from St. Jerome, having no reference given, is not admissible.

(14) We come now to the texts, 2 Thes. ii. 15, 2 Thes. iii. 6, Rom. vi. 17, 2 Tim. i. 13. It is necessary to remark, that the word tradition is ambiguous. It is used both to express "doctrina tradita" and also the "modus tradendi." It is in the former sense that the word occurs in St. Paul's writings; it is in the latter sense alone that it becomes a subject of controversy. We all agree that we are bound to believe the "doctrine delivered" by St. Paul to his converts, but we differ on this question, how this doctrine has been handed down to us. The texts quoted by Mr. Aylmer afford no proof that there were any doctrines delivered by St. Paul to the churches, which are not now to be found in the written Word of God. Will Mr. Aylmer tell us any one thing which St. Paul delivered to those Churches, which the Church of England and Ireland does not hold now? If he can, we hope that he will; if he cannot, how can he expect us to believe more than we do?

(15) Mr. Aylmer's observations on the case of persons who could not read, have been answered in our prefatory remarks. Such persons must, no doubt, to a certain extent, depend on the guidance of their better educated brethren; but still they are not altogether without some means of forming a judgment for themselves. The other day the newspapers asserted that several English brewers were in the habit of putting a certain poisonous ingredient into their beer. What was a common man to do? How was he to know whether the beer he was offered was poisonous or not? Why, he might soon learn that the accused brewers had challenged full investigation, and had submitted their beer to be tested by the most eminent chemists, who had prononnced it to be free from any noxious ingredient. And he would consider this quite satisfactory, although quite ignurant of chemistry, and unable to test the beer for himself. But now suppose any brewer had refused to submit to investigation, and had declared his beer to be so superlatively good that he could not permit any chemist to test it, then would not one have a very strong suspicion that there was some ingredient not exactly what it should be! And so, in like manner, we think that an unlearned man of common shrewdness, will see that it is wiser to follow the guiding of the Church which invites all who are able to compare its teaching with God's Word rather than that of the Church which will not permit its doctrines to be examined into at all.

(16) Mr. Aylmer assures us that he does not depreciate the Scriptures, but holds his Bible in the highest estimation; we believe that this is sincerely his intention. But we cannot forget that all those who have done most to depreciate the Scriptures, have made the same protestations, many of them with, perhaps, as much sincerity: Mr. Aylmer may be depreciating it without intending it. He goes on to state his object, "to give evident proof that tradition and the instruction of pastors are as sufficient to make good Christians now as in the first ages of Christianity." He had already said that these means were effectual (which we admit, there being then teachers inspired by the Holy Ghost) before the Bible was written. If tradition and teaching are as sufficient now (when there are no inspired teachers, and tradition has been so corrupted), the Bible is as unnecessary now as before it was written, and might never have been written at all. If this will not teach men to disregard it, we know not what would.

Is Mr. Aylmer satisfied with the present extent of Scripture reading and Scriptural education among the Roman Catholics of Ireland? If he be not, can he expect to promote its progress by such arguments as these? But if he be satisfied with it, can he suppose that St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, or the other Fathers, would have been satisfied with it? We are sure they would not.

(17) We come next to Mr. Aylmer's reference to St. Augustine. We have before had occasion to observe that it is quite impossible to reason satisfactorily on the meaning of an ancient author, if merely given a single passage from his works, without an opportunity of comparing it with the context. We have, therefore, made it a rule constantly to protest against second-hand quotations, and against quotations without references. In this instance Mr. Aylmer has put two distinct passages of St. Augustine together, and has given a reference* which only applies to the latter. We might, therefore, be excused from saying anything as to the former part. But we must remark that the limiting clause, "unless he has the charge of teaching others," tells far more in our favour than the rest of the passage tells against us. For we have already admitted the possibility of a man, if rightly instructed, attaining a knowledge of saving truth without a personal study of the Scriptures; but we have said the test, whether the instruction be right, must be a comparison of that instruction with the written Word. Now, if the Romish theory be true, a priest may dispense with a personal study of the Scriptures just as well as a layman. "For a priest is bound to follow the teachings of the Church, and, if he teach her 'traditions,' he will guide himself and his people right, even though he have never opened the Bible. And, on the other hand, a priest, who should exercise his private judgment on the doctrines of the church, and should test their truth by comparing them with the written Word, would be, no less than a layman, in danger of going astray." But, it is plain, from the passage quoted by Mr. Aylmer, that St. Augustine, when stating, as low as possible, the obligations to a personal study of the Scriptures, never dreamed that a priest could be excused from it. He evidently felt, that one who had the charge of teaching others, could only keep his teaching right, by constantly comparing it with God's written Word. We hope, in an early number, to show, by other quotations from St. Augustine, that we are right in this statement of his views respecting the Scriptures.*

In the second passage quoted, St. Augustine says, that we believe the Gospel moved by the authority of the church. And this statement is true, if rightly understood. But it must be observed, as Dr. Milner points out (see End of Controversy, letter xiii.), that when we say we receive the Scripture on the authority of the church, we mean the church considered as a credible, not as an infallible witness; otherwise, he acknowledges we should fall into a vicious circle in attempting to prove the authority of Scripture by the infallibility of the church, and the infallibility of the church by the authority of Scripture. St. Augustine himself elsewhere shows that the evidence on which he believes the genuineness of the Scriptures is the same in kind, as that on which the genuineness of other books is proved.—See Contra. Faust. xxxii. 21, "Si quæritis a nobis, nos unde sciamus Apostolorum esse istas literas, breviter respondemus, inde nos scire, unde et vos scitis illas literas esse Manichæi." And that the testimony of the church was only one of the arguments on which St. Augustine received the Scripture, the reader will find, by consulting his Confessions vi. 5. One of his arguments will scarcely be adopted by those who think with Mr. Aylmer—Eoque mihi illa venerabilior et sacrosancta fide dignior apparebat auctoritas, quo et omnibus ad legendum esset in promtu.

Mr. Aylmer tells us, that he approves of the reading of the Scriptures, if done with unreserved deference and docility to the decisions of the church. He will allow men to look at the dial, provided they firmly make up their minds to maintain, at any rate, that the clock is right. We are sure Mr. Aylmer is right in approving of Scripture reading, but we doubt his being consistent. For our part, we confess, that if we believed the Roman Catholic theory, we should think that the less the Scriptures were read the better. If we must maintain the clock to be right, why perplex ourselves by looking at the dial, more especially if the majority of those who do look at it arrive at the conclusion that the clock is wrong? (See our article—One Guide or Two?—p. 73.)

(18) Mr. Aylmer makes the decrees of general councils the interpreter of Scripture; he mentions this alone, and, of course, he believes in no other; we ask him to consider—

1st. Dr. Cullen and the Pope will pronounce this rank heresy, as bad as any Protestant can be guilty of. "St. Peter's successor" is their interpreter of Scripture, though not Mr. Aylmer's; and they will never tolerate his denial of their interpreter.

2nd. Mr. Aylmer, in No. viii. appears to think an ever-living interpreter necessary; yet, when we look at his interpreter, we find there has not been any in the Catholic Church for three hundred years. For so long it is since a general council of the Roman Church was held; and it may be three hundred years more before they venture to hold another.

3rd. Who is to "interpret" the Council of Trent? Does Mr. Aylmer know all that has been done about that by the Popes? and what a puzzle it has proved, at least as great as interpreting the Scripture!

4th. What are the general councils? Can Mr. Aylmer give us a certain and unquestionable list of them? If he can, we entreat him to do so. If he can not, how are we to find this rule?

(19) Mr. Aylmer says, there never was a heresy that did not profess to be founded on Scripture. We reply, that there have been very many, founded on the rejection of one or several of the books of Scripture.

(20 & 21) In reply to what Mr. Aylmer says of the differing opinions of some who call themselves Protestants, we have to say—1st, that (with the exception of Socinians and some others, whom we do not look upon as Christians, though they call themselves Protestants) we know of no difference among any Protestant bodies about articles of faith, equal to that between Mr. Aylmer himself, on one side, and his Primate and his Pope on the other, about the interpreter of Scripture. They will tell him that their claim, which he evidently rejects, is an article of faith.

2nd. That we are not answerable for the opinions of those who separate from us; but is he equally unconcerned in the opinions of the head of his own church, whom he professes to consider the Vicar of Christ on earth?

(22) Mr. Aylmer is glad that we repudiate the notion that "private judgment" is the same as "unaided, uninstructed judgment." We do repudiate it. We believe that God has given us sufficient means of understanding the Scripture; and we dare not reject those means. We believe that an undying church, instituted by Christ himself, and a teaching ministry, derived and continued from his institution, are important means. And we, in our turn, will be glad (and we yet trust that time may come) when Mr. Aylmer will repudiate the notion that the "private judgment" which he already, to some extent, does exercise, is absolutely subjugated by God to the ipse dixit of priests who have caused many to stumble.

We consider the text he has quoted here—2 Peter i. 20—inapplicable, for it treats of how prophecy was "made" [Douay translation; "fit," Latin version], and the word "private," as both the Greek and Latin show, is not opposed to "public," or the authority of the Church, but refers to the man himself who delivered the propheey, as distinguished from the Holy Ghost who spoke in him.

Mr. Aylmer next argues, if we understand him rightly, that a man cannot exercise his private judgment if the results of his judgment coincide with that of other people. This seems to have been hastily written, and not to require an answer. It is surely unnecessary to point out that several men, reasoning rightly, may, by an exercise of their private judgment, arrive independently at a common conclusion.

(23) Neither do we think that Mr. Aylmer will, on reflection, require us to give any answer to the collection he has made of passages from the Scriptures in which the words reason and authority occur; not one of which is relevant to any point in dispute between the Churches of England and of Rome. We approve of Scriptural arguments; but we cannot consider that it is a proper mode of arguing to hunt up from a concordance texts in which certain words occur, without examining the context, and the whole bearing of the passage.

(24,25,26) The conclusion of Mr. Aylmer's letter is principally taken up with an enumeration of sundry points, which he challenges us to prove from the Holy Scriptures. In the topics which he has put together he has confused questions which it is necessary to keep distinct. Bellarmine divides traditions into Divine, or Apostolical, and Ecclesiastical. The first alone are in question, when the controversy is concerning the rule of faith; and the Church of England doctrine concerning them is stated in her sixth article. The latter relates to the rites and ceremonies of the church; and the Church of England doctrine concerning them is stated in her thirty-fourth article, "On the Traditions of the Church." Her statement in the sixth article is, that all Divine and Apostolical traditions are contained in the Bible, and that nothing is to be received as an article of faith, the belief in which is necessary to salvation, unless it be contained in Holy Scripture. Her statement in the thirty-fourth article is, that every national church has authority to ordain, change, and abolish rites or ceremonies, provided that all things be done unto edifying, and that individual members of such a church must not break ceremonies thus approved by common authority. When, therefore, Mr. Aylmer (26) asks for a Scripture proof of the Church of England table of fasts and feasts, he plainly confounds Apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions. That St. Peter's day is to be kept holy, is not an article of faith, the belief in which is necessary to salvation; and, therefore, the Church of England is not bound in consistency to maintain that this can be proved from the Scriptures: it is but a matter of church discipline, which the church might abrogate if she pleased.

The observance of the Lord's Day rests, also, on the same authority, as far as the Scriptures are silent on the subject. It can, however, easily be shown from Scripture that, in weekly commemorating the resurrection of our Lord, the Church has not acted arbitrarily, but has followed the example of the Apostles. With regard to the abolition of the Jewish Sabbath, the Scriptures are not silent; they not only speak of the abrogation of all the Mosaic law, but they especially declare that this particular part of it is not binding on Gentile Christians.—See Colossians ii. 16.

It is not by tradition, but by our natural reason, that we know that the words of our Lord—"Swear not at all"—are directed against vain and rash swearing, and not against those solemn appeals to God, on lawful occasions, the use of which is commanded in the Old Testament (Deut. vi. 13); just as it is not by tradition, but by natural reason, that we know that the words used by our Lord, on the same occasion—"Resist not evil"—were not intended (as the Quakers suppose) to forbid the use of lawful self-defence.

(21) Mr. Aylmer makes a strange mistake when he

* This reference was omitted in our last number. It was, St. Aug. Contra Epist. Fundamenti, c. 5.

* Since the above was written, we have been able to put our hands on the passage of St. Augustine (De Doctrina Christiana, lib. i. c. 39) from which we doubt not Mr. Aylmer's citation is taken. An examination of it confirms us in our conviction of the absolute necessity of verifying every quotation before arguing on it. The words, "and guided by the decisions of his pastors," do not occur in the passage we have referred to. St. Augustine does not seem to be speaking of the case of an illiterate man depending on the decisions of his pastors, but of the case of a man originally built up in faith, hope, and charity by the Scriptures, and yet able to retain these graces without the continued use of the Bible. He alludes specially to the case of solitaries dwelling without books in the desert. And it cannot be inferred from this passage, that St. Augustine supposed that a Christian living in society (a father of a family, for example) who might be called on to instruct others, could dispense with the use of the written Word.

speaks of our law of divorce, which allows of the "marrying her that is put away." The fact is, our law of divorce does not allow the separated parties to marry. And it is by no means our business to discuss the merits of acts of parliament, which have occasionally been passed in particular cases, giving divorces of a nature which the Ecclesiastical Courts of the Church of England refuse.

We do not reject "transubstantiation" because the word is not found in the Scriptures. If Mr. Aylmer can prove us the doctrine from Scripture, we shall not quarrel about the word. We adopt the words "Trinity" and "consubstantial," because they express distinctly and concisely the Scriptural doctrines, as opposed to the Arian corruptions; but we do not say that the use of these words is essential to salvation, for we know that in the first two centuries, there were thousands of saints who, indeed, held the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity, but who died before these words, "Trinity" and "consubstantial" were introduced.

(25) Mr. Aylmer denies that all the thirty-nine articles can be directly proved from Scripture. We have again to remind him that it is only articles of faith, the belief of which is necessary to salvation, which we assert to be exclusively contained in Holy Scripture. All the thirty-nine articles do not relate to such articles of faith; but those which do, we receive because we believe them capable of Scriptural proof.

The only point in Mr. Aylmer's letter which it now remains for us to notice, is the fact that the Prayer Book version of the 14th Psalm (as well as the Roman Catholic versions) contains three or four verses more than are found in the common authorized version. It should be mentioned, however, that those verses are found elsewhere in the Bible. It is plain that the revisers of the Church of England Liturgy did not consider this transposition a very important variation, or they would not have retained in the Prayer Book the use of the more ancient translation of the Psalms. Roman Catholic divines, however, have fastened on this trifling disagreement with earnestness almost ludicrous; and while not scrupling to allow the Scriptures to remain unknown to the majority of their laity, speak as if they believed that the awful curses denounced against any who should presume to add to the Word of God, were incurred by a copyist who should misplace a verse or two in his transcription.

With regard to these verses the state of the case is this:—The verses in question are not now found, we believe, in any copy of the Hebrew. They are found in most copies of the Septuagint Greek translation. Accordingly they do not appear in the Bible version, which was made directly from the Hebrew; they do appear in the Prayer Book version, which (like modern Roman Catholic versions) is a translation of a translation. Now, it is a curious critical question, whether it be more likely that those words have dropped out of all copies of the Hebrew, or that they have been inserted into some copies of the Septuagint. But it is not an important religious question, because the words are confessedly inspired, being used by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans, chap. iii. Even, then, if we suppose that the Prayer Book version errs, in company with those of the Church of Rome, we must admit that the error is a very unimportant one, and that, if the Church of Rome had been guilty of none more serious, we should not have been justified in leaving her communion.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Finding it impossible, from its great length, to insert the letter of the Rev. R. A. Wilson, we have forwarded it to the Rev. W. Carson, to whom it was addressed.

We have to apologize also to several valued correspondents for postponing communications addressed to ourselves, but which we hope to print in our next number.

In reply to our Kingstown correspondent, we beg to say that we have applied to the Rev. Dr. Murray, of Maynooth, for permission to reprint his reply to the Archbishop of Dublin's essay on Infallibility; should we obtain his leave, we purpose commencing the subject in our next number.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith.

Subscriptions are earnestly solicited, which our friends will observe are payable in advance. The amount may be forwarded either in postage stamps or a Post-office order, payable to Mr. Wm. Curry, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JULY, 1852.

THE USE OF "THE FATHERS" IN PROVING THE NOVELTY OF ERRORS.

In the course of our remarks on the use of the Fathers, in our last number, we stated our opinion, that the Fathers were "above all value in enabling us to convict of novelty the errors which have arisen in the church since their times," of which we undertook to give an example in our next. We now proceed to fulfil our promise; and take as our instance the doctrine of praying to saints and angels.

It is admitted by all learned Roman Catholic conversialists, that saints and angels were not prayed to nor invocated under the Old Testament dispensation. It is also generally admitted by them, that praying to saints and angels is not taught in the New Testament. We give one instance of the latter admission, from Salmeron, a very learned Jesuit—"The Scriptures which were made and published in the primitive church, ought to found (or to lay the foundation of) and to explain Christ, who by the tacit (or silent, which admits that the Spirit did not say it) suggestion of the Spirit, did bring the saints with him; and it would have been a hard matter to command this to the Jews; and to the Gentiles, an occasion would be given thereby (that is, by teaching the worship of saints and angels in the New Testament) to think that many gods were put upon them, instead of the multitude of gods whom they had forsaken."—Salmeron, in 1 Tim., cap. 2, disput. 8.

We think the learned Jesuit has, in the above passage, very fairly admitted and accounted for the fact that this doctrine was not taught in the New Testament; and we fully agree with him, that it would, if contained in the Sacred Writings, have been a great stumbling-block to the Jews, who were taught to worship God only, and also that the Gentiles would have taken it as a plain approbation of their former practice of worshipping dead men. But supposing the doctrine itself to be a true doctrine of the Gospel (and such Salmeron supposes it to be), we are at a loss to know how the Apostles could thus agree to hide it, for fear of creating offences, and teaching actual idolatry. This does not seem to have been the practice of the Apostles. They did not hide the doctrines of the Gospel, for fear men should take offence at them. Nor did they fear that the true Gospel of Christ should make men idolaters. Nor do we see how this notion of their concealing such doctrines, upon such reasons, can be reconciled with St. Paul's declaration to the Ephesians (who had been heathens and idolaters)—"I have kept back nothing that was profitable to you, but have preached it to you, and taught you publicly, and from house to house" (Acts, ch. 20, v. 20, Douay Bible; and v. 27—"I have not spared to declare unto you ALL the counsel of God." Now, if St. Paul preached this doctrine of praying to saints and angels to these heathen idolaters, "from house to house," it would have produced all the evils of idolatry, which Salmeron admits would have followed from teaching it in the New Testament Scriptures; and if St. Paul did not teach it to them, it is clear he did not think that it was profitable for them, or that it was any part of "the counsel of God."

But our present business with it is this:—It is agreed on both sides, that this doctrine is not taught in either the Old or the New Testament, and, therefore, that it is not taught in the Bible at all. Therefore, if it was part of the Apostles' doctrine, it has come down to us by tradition alone. Here, then, comes in "the use of the Fathers;" for we suppose it will be admitted, that if the Fathers, for FOUR HUNDRED YEARS after Christ, have never mentioned this doctrine, except to condemn and to censure it, and to show that it was not then any part of the faith of the church—it will be admitted that this doctrine has not come down through them from the Apostles, but that it must be an invention of later times.

We propose, therefore, to illustrate this "use of the Fathers" of the first four centuries after Christ by showing what they have said of this doctrine.

Our first witness is St. Ignatius, the martyr. He was known in the early church by another name, "Theophorus." This was a Greek word, signifying—"carried by Christ." Some have related, that he took this name from having been one of the children whom Christ took up in his arms and laid his hands upon and blessed; we know not whether this is true, but it is possible, for he was made bishop of the important See of Antioch by the Apostles, about the year 70 (40 years after the death of Christ), and he suffered death for the confession of Christ, about the year 110. In his epistle to the Philadelphians, written shortly before his death, we find these words—"Ye virgins, have Christ alone before your eyes, and his Father, in your prayers, being enlightened by the Spirit."*

Now, this is not the doctrine which is taught to "virgins" in the Roman Church of this day; they are taught to keep the Blessed Virgin and "St. Joseph," and many others, before their eyes in their prayers.

St. Polycarp, a disciple of St. John, and Bishop of Smyrna, also suffered martyrdom about the year 147. In the ecclesiastical history of Eusebius, we have an epistle written by the Church of Smyrna, giving an account of his death. They relate that the Jews insisted that his dead body should not be given up to the Christians, for fear "they should begin to worship this man." On which the epistle observes—"Being ignorant that it is not possible that we should ever forsake Christ, who suffered for the salvation of all who shall be saved of the whole world, OR THAT WE SHOULD WORSHIP ANY OTHER. For him, indeed, we worship, as being the Son of God; but the martyrs we deservedly love, as the disciples and followers of our Lord."—Euseb. Ed. Valesii, Mogunt. 1672. Book iv., ch. 15.

The great Athanasius, writing against the Arians (Oratio III.) says—"No man would pray to receive anything from the Father, and the angels, or any other creatures, neither would any man say, 'God and the angels give me this.'" If St. Athanasius had lived in these days, he might have learned differently. "God and the Blessed Virgin preserve me," or "God and the angels protect me," is not now thought amiss; yet Athanasius says that no Christian in his day would have said such a thing.

And even those Fathers of whose errors we are warned, are useful in this inquiry. For instance, Origen, whom (on the authority of St. Vincent) we have held up as a warning, agrees in condemning this doctrine—"All prayers and

* We do not undertake to affirm that these words were written by Ignatius. The words are in the old copies of his letters, received as true for centuries; but they are not in the new editions of that letter, since the discovery of the Alexandrian Codex. We would not quote the words at all, but for this reason: If the words were not written by Ignatius, they were put into his works in later times by some one else. Now, whenever this was done, it was clearly not thought to be contrary to the doctrine of the church at that time. If a denial of the Trinity had been put into Ignatius's writings, every one would have said—"Ignatius could not have written that;" but the church did not say it of the words in question. So, in fact, this makes the proof stronger; for it shows that these words were not considered contrary to church doctrine when inserted later times, if it were so.

supplications, and intercessions and thanksgivings, are to be sent up unto God, the Lord of all, through the High Priest, who is above all angels, being the Living Word and God. For to call upon angels, we not comprehending the knowledge of them, which is above the reach of man, is not agreeable to reason."—Origen, Lib. 5, Tom. 1, p. 580. Tertullian, too, whom St. Vincent also holds up as a warning, holds the same doctrine, in a book written while he was a Catholic (Apolog. ch. 30. Ed. Rigalt, p. 27. Paris, 1675); he says—These things "I may not pray for from any other but from him of whom I know I shall obtain them, because both he it is who alone is able to give, and I am he to whom it belongs to obtain them." Clearly Tertullian did not hold the doctrine, that it belonged to the saints and angels to obtain his petition for him. And yet, neither Origen nor Tertullian were ever, in their own times, or we believe since, accused of error or heresy for writing the above, which, doubtless, they would have been, had they not expressed truly what the church at that time believed upon the subject.

Even the heretics who separated from the church in those days, are witnesses that they never heard of this doctrine. Novatian, who separated from the church, and established a new sect, about the year 248, held for the most part the same doctrine as the church. He wrote a book in defence of the Divinity of Christ, in which he thus argues—"If Christ be only man, how is he present whenever he is called upon, since this is not the nature of man, but of God, that he can be present in every place? If Christ be man only, why is a man invoked as mediator in our prayers, since the mediation of a man is judged ineffectual to affording salvation? If Christ be only man, why is our hope placed in him, since hope in man* is called cursed?"—(Novat. in Trin., c. 14. In Tertullian's works, as above quoted, p. 715.) Of course we do not quote this as if whatever Novatian said must be true; we do not so rely on even the most orthodox Fathers. But we have quoted those orthodox Fathers above mentioned, to show that they did not know of any such doctrine of the church in their day as praying to saints and angels, and, therefore, that it cannot have been handed down through them as an Apostolic tradition. We quote Origen and Tertullian to show that even erring Fathers knew nothing of it. We quote Novatian to show that separatists from the church knew nothing of it. In this respect, they are all useful witnesses, and as such we use them. Even forgeries may confirm this proof. If the passage which we have quoted as Ignatius's be not really his—if it were forged in later times, and fathered upon him, this only proves that in that later time, whenever it was, even the forger had not learned to dream of Christians keeping angels and saints before their eyes in their prayers.

We have yet one point more to illustrate. We spoke in our last article of the speculations of individual Fathers. These, too, may be a valuable proof that the things they so speculated about were no part of the church's doctrine or faith in their days. This brings us to Gregory Nazianzen, who wrote his first invective against Julian about the year 364—"Hear, O thou soul of great Constantine, IF THOU HAST any understanding of these things." And again, in his funeral oration (Oratio 11) for Gorgonia—"IF THOU HAST any care of the things done by us, and IF holy souls receive this honour from God, that they have any feeling of such things as these, receive this oration, &c." Can any one believe that Gregory would have written thus, if he believed it to be a part of the faith of the church that holy souls do really hear what we address to them? He ventures to address them as one who does not know, and cannot tell, whether they hear or not; and this very address is the strongest proof that it was not the faith and belief of the church in his day that the souls do hear when we call upon them.

We have now gone over every passage in the Fathers of the first four centuries, that relates to this subject. There is no shadow of grounds to suppose that, up to the year 364, any one of them ever dreamed of praying to saints or angels. Every one of them who alluded to the subject, up to that year, did so only to censure and condemn it; and the first who inclines to it at all shows us, by the way he does it, that he does not do it in conformity with the faith of the church.

If we have passed over any passage, in the Fathers of these four hundred years which gives any support to prayers to saints or angels, we suppose some one can show it. It is our conviction that no one can; and, if so, are we not entitled to ask, how can any one believe that prayer to saints or angels was "a tradition of the Fathers," during these four centuries? And if it gradually arose in later times, how can it be an "apostolic tradition," or part of the Apostles' doctrine? Is not this a fair instance of "the use of the Fathers," in convicting of novelty the errors that have arisen since their days?

We trust that our readers will now see that if we refuse to take "the Fathers" as the rule of our faith, it is not because we suppose them to be unfavourable to the doctrines we hold; neither is it because we are unwilling or unable to use them aright, as helps for discovering the truth; but simply because we will not use an unsound rule of faith, even in support of truth; because, in things of such vast importance to the souls and the faith of men, we feel constrained to seek only for a sound, an infallible rule of faith, for ourselves and for others.

* See Jeremiah, ch. 17, v. 5, Douay Bible, to which Novatian seems here to have referred.

KILKENNY—ANONYMOUS CHALLENGE.

THE following challenge, without any name to it, or any clue to the person who wrote it, or any direction in what way an answer could be given to that person, was slipped under the house door of a Scripture reader in Kilkenny. It has been sent to us, in hopes that the answer may reach the person who gave it. We trust that Roman Catholics, generally, will not approve of so mean a way of giving a challenge. Let those who can discuss the subject come forward and do so like men, in the light of day, and they will be fairly and honestly met:—

"CHALLENGE.

"May 18, 1852.

"It will not be denied but that the Church of Rome was once a most pure, excellent, flourishing, and mother church.—Rom. i. 8, chs. vi. and xvi. White's defence of his way, pp. 43, 44. King James in his speech to the Parliament. Whittaker in his answer to Dr. Sand, 2 Demonstrat. Falkin, c. 2, 2 Thess. s. 7, Reynolds in his fifth conclusion.

"This church could not cease to be such; but she must fall either by Apostasy, Heresy, or Schism.

"I. Apostacy is not only a renouncing of the faith of Christ, but the very name and title of Christianity. No man will say that the Church of Rome had ever such a fall, or fell thus.

"II. HERESY is an adhesion to some private and singular opinion or error in faith contrary to the generally-approved doctrine of the church. If the Church of Rome did ever adhere to any singular or new opinion, disagreeable to the commonly-received doctrine of the Christian world, I pray satisfy me as to these particulars—viz., 1st—By what general council was she ever condemned? 2nd—Which of the Fathers ever wrote against her? 3rd—By what authority was she otherwise reproved? for it seems to be a thing very incongruous that so great a church should be condemned by every one that hath a mind to condemn her.

"III. SCHISM is a departure or division from the unity of the church, whereby the bond and communion held with some former church is broken and dissolved. I fever the Church of Rome divided herself by schism from any other body of faithful Christians, or broke communion, or went forth from the society of any elder church, I pray satisfy me as to these particulars: 1st—Whose company did she leave? 2nd—From what body did she go forth? 3rd—Where was the true church which she forsook? Pause on these three words; for it appears a little strange to me that a church should be accounted schismatical, when there cannot be assigned any other Church different from her, which from age to age since Christ his time has continued visible, from which she departed.

"To the Bible Readers

"at James's-street, Kilkenny."

I. The challenger thinks there cannot be apostasy from the faith of Christ without renouncing "the very name and title of Christianity." Take the Socinians, who "deny the Lord that bought them." These men do not renounce "the name and title of Christianity;" and, therefore, according to this challenger, they have not apostatized from the faith of Christ! And we suppose they are still Catholics! We do not wonder that this challenge was given in the dark, so that it could not be answered.

II. The challenger evidently thinks that the majority of professing Christians, at any one time, must be Catholics, and the minority heretics—as if the truth of doctrine depended on counting heads. It is hardly worth while to answer this, except by counting heads, to convict the challenger himself of heresy. For Rome is in a minority at this day. To acknowledge the Pope is with her an article of faith at this day—and the whole Greek Church, including all the Churches of the vast empire of Russia, as well as Greece and Turkey, all the Churches of England, America, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, &c., and all Protestant sects, reject her, far exceeding in number those who obey her.

But it is not true that we must follow the majority. A great Catholic doctor (acknowledged as such by the Church of Rome herself), St. Vincent of Lerins, who wrote his "Commonitory against Heresy" in the year 434, undertakes to tell us what we should do "if some new infection goeth about to corrupt, not a little part, but the whole Church"—ch. 3. And he gives us an instance of it too in ch. 4—"When the poison of the Arians had now infected not a little part, but well nigh the whole world, in such sort that (almost all the bishops of the Latin tongue deceived, partly by force, partly by fraud) men's minds were covered, as it were, with a mist, what in so great a confusion was to be followed? Then, whosoever was truly a lover and a follower of Christ, by preferring ancient faith before new error, was untouched with any spot of that infection."

The same argument which makes the challenger a Romanist now, would have made him AN ARIAN then!

We adopt St. Vincent's conclusion, "to call those anathema which teach otherwise than once hath been received, was never otherwise than needful, is everywhere needful, and ever shall be needful."—See Gal. ch. 1. v. 8, 9, Douay Bible.

And this is true, although error should be in the majority, as Arianism was then.

The challenger asks, by what general council was the Church of Rome ever condemned? We answer, by the general Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, which condemned any one who should afterwards make a new creed, which the Church of Rome did in 1564; and many other instances we could give.

He asks—"Which of the Fathers ever wrote against her?" We answer, all of them. For there is, perhaps, not one of the Fathers that has not written against some or all of the errors that she now holds.

III. If the Church of Rome, in the Apostles' days had refused to hold Christian communion with the Church of Corinth, or any other Church, she would plainly have been guilty of schism. She now refuses to hold communion with the Greek Church (which is as old as herself), the English (nearly as old), and all those we have mentioned above. If she has no just cause for this refusal, she is guilty of schism now. And what is the cause? The English Church is willing to hold communion with the Church of Rome, in all the articles of the ancient Catholic creed, which has come down from the Apostles' times; and in all other things that are lawful by God's Word. The Church of Rome will hold no communion with the English Church or the Greek Church, unless they will profess the Creed of Pope Pius IV., made 1500 years after Christ. Which is guilty of the schism? If, in the Apostles' days, the Church of Rome had brought out the Creed of Pope Pius IV., and refused to hold communion with any Church that held to the Apostles' Creed, and that alone, would she not have been guilty of schism? And is she not guilty of schism now, for doing the same?

Correspondence.

IS THE DOCTRINE OF PURGATORY TAUGHT BY THE EARLY FATHERS?

SIR—I am just after reading, in your last number, a letter, from an anonymous correspondent, requesting some Catholic priest or layman to publish the opinions of the Fathers, who lived in the three first centuries, in favour of Purgatory.

I at once proceed to meet the wishes both of yourself and correspondent; with all due regard, however, to the limited space afforded by your periodical.

I do approve of persons going back to first principles, and slaking their thirst for knowledge in those fountains which are near its source.

1. To begin at the beginning: I find it recorded, in the second Book of Machabees, xii. 43 (I am not now quoting this as Scripture, but what, at all events, you must admit it to be, an authentic historical testimony), that Judas Maccabeus, "making a gathering, he sent twelve thousand drachms of silver to Jerusalem for sacrifice, to be offered for the sins of the dead, thinking well and religiously concerning the resurrection." It is added, in the 46th verse—"It is, therefore, a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead, that they may be loosed from their sins." From this it is evident, that the solemn usage of praying for the dead was the same among the ancient Jews as among the early Christians, and Roman Catholics of the present day. Before I gratify you, therefore, with reference to the Holy Fathers on this subject, let me pointedly inquire why it is that Christ, who sedulously condemned the fabulous inventions and superstitions of the Pharisees, did not as decidedly censure this portion of the public worship of the Jews?

I must have a direct answer to that question.

I can discover no such condemnation, either on the part of our Saviour or his Apostles, in the New Testament; but can trace in all the most ancient liturgies of the Christian Church a solemn commemoration of the dead.

Now, to lay before your readers the quotations you so much require from the early Fathers:—

2. (Third Century)—TERTULLIAN (Quintus, Septimus, Florens.), one of the most learned men of the Primitive Church, who lived between the years of 160 and 230, says—"Among the APOSTOLICAL TRADITIONS received from our fathers, we have oblations for the dead on the anniversary day." De Corona Militis, p. 209. In his treatise on Monogamy, chapter 10, page 555, he thus advises a widow—"Pray for the soul of your departed husband, entreating repose to him, and participation in the first resurrection—making oblations for him on the anniversaries of his death."

3. (Third Century)—St. CYPRIAN (second century)*—"Our predecessors prudently advised that no brother departing this life, should nominate a churchman his executor; and should he do it, that no oblation should be made for him, nor sacrifice (?) offered for his repose, nor prayer in his name offered in the church"—Epist. l., page 2.

4. (Fourth Century)—EUSEBIUS, styled the Father of Ecclesiastical History, and who lived between the years 257 and 339, thus writes describing the funeral service of Constantine the Great:—"In this manner did Constantius perform the last duties in honour of his father. But when he had departed with his guards, the ministers of God, surrounded by the multitude of the faithful, advanced into the middle space, and, with prayers, performed the ceremonies of Divine worship: the prince reposing in his coffin, and the people, in concert with the priests, not without sighs and tears, offered up prayers to heaven for the repose of his soul, in this manifesting the most acceptable service to a religious prince. The deceased emperor was thus admitted to a participation in the religious rites, the mystic sacrifice (?) and holy suffrages of the faithful."—Eusebius De Vita Constant., Lib. 2.

5. [Fourth Century] St. CYRIL—"There (in the Sacrifice of the Mass) we pray for the holy Fathers and the bishops that are dead; and, in short, for all those who are departed this life in our communion; believing that the souls of those for whom the prayers are offered receive very great relief, while this holy and tremendous victim lies upon the altar (?)"—Catech. Myst., 5 pages 297, 298. Read prior and subsequent to this quotation.

6. [Fourth Century] St. CHRYSOSTOM (your favourite scriptural advocate)—"It is not in vain that oblations and prayers are offered and alms given for the dead. So has the Divine Spirit ordained that we might mutually assist one another."—Homil. 21. NOT WITHOUT REASON WAS IT ORDAINED BY THE APOSTLES, THAT IN CELEBRATING THE SACRED MYSTERIES (?) THE DEAD SHOULD BE REMEMBERED."—Homil. 3, in Epist. ad Philip.

7. [Fourth Century] St. EPHREM, of Edessa, in a work entitled his Testament (tome 3, page 294, Edit. Vossii., page 371, Edit. Oxonii) thus clearly and scripturally expresses himself on the subject:—"My brethren, come to me, and prepare me for my departure, for my strength is wholly gone. Go along with me in psalms and in your prayers, and please constantly to make oblations for me. When the thirtieth day shall be completed, then remember me; for the dead are helped by the offerings of the living. Now, listen with patience to what I shall mention from the Scriptures. Moses bestowed blessings on Reuben after the third generation (Dent. xxxiii. 6); but, if the dead are not aided, why was he blessed? Again, if they be insensible, hear what the Apostle says:—"If the dead rise not again at all, why are they then baptized for them?"—1 Cor. xv. 29.

8. I shall abstain from giving you long quotations from ORIGEN (Homil. 6, in Exod, tome, 2, page 148; as likewise, Homil. xvi. in Jerome tome. 3); from ARNOBIUS, of Sicca, in Numidia; saints BASIL and ANNAOSE, all in favour of the doctrine of Purgatory, as a place of temporal punishment or purgation after death, where some souls are detained, but relieved by the prayers and alms of the faithful, especially by the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass.

You may observe, in the foregoing extracts, that where the words—"Sacrifice," "Holy and tremendous Victim," "Mystic Sacrifice," and "Sacred Mysteries—occur, I have inserted a note of interrogation to simply inquire what do they mean, if not the Sacrifice of the New Testament, or Catholic Sacrifice, anciently so called (Chrysostom Serm. de Cruce et Latrone), the word "MASS" not having been introduced for a couple of centuries afterwards.

I fear I have made too great an inroad on your space, in showing that the Fathers of the three and four first ages concur in opinion as to the existence of an intermediate state; many of them interpreting a remarkable passage of St. Paul (1. Cor. iii. 13, 14, 15) as denoting expressly some region of purgation for the soul. I shall now conclude with a quotation not from the Greek or Roman Fathers, but from one of the elders of your own church, which so completely embodies the sentiments of Roman Catholics on the subject, that I cannot but offer it to the serious consideration of your readers. Bishop FORNES, on Purgatory, thus expresses himself:—

"Let not the ancient practice of praying, and making oblations for the dead, be any more rejected by Protestants as unlawful. It is a practice received throughout the universal Church of Christ, which did ever believe it both pious and charitable. Many of the Fathers were of opinion, that some light sins, not remitted in this life, were forgiven after death, by the intercession of the Church in her public prayers, and especially those which are offered up in the celebration of the tremendous mysteries; and it is no absurdity to believe so. The practice of praying for the dead is derived, as Chrysostom asserts, from the Apostles."

Your most obedient,
WARNER CHRISTIAN SEARCH.

We willingly publish the above letter, trusting that it will tend to bring out the truth as to whether the doctrine of Purgatory was known in the first three centuries.

We must first remind the writer what the question is which he has undertaken to answer. Our correspondent. "A Catholic," in our last number (page 69, first column), asked that some one would bring forward all the proofs of Purgatory that could be found in the writings of the Fathers of "the first three centuries." Now, it is clear that nothing can be a fair answer to this, but what is taken from writings of the first three centuries. The object of the person who made this call was to learn if the doctrine of Purgatory was held during the first three hundred years of Christianity. It is a poor answer to say that it was held in after times. Such an answer is, in fact, a confession that Purgatory was not believed for the first three hundred years, and cannot be proved from the writers of that time.

Now, every one will see that the writer of the letter which we have printed above is a man of learning, that he is one who would be well able to give proofs from the Fathers of the first three hundred years, if any such proofs could be given. Yet, what does he do? He gives seven proofs (besides others which he says he could give, but which he does not give), and of the seven which he gives, only two (the second and the third) belong to the three first centuries. To make this plain, we have prefixed to each the century to which it belongs, marked thus, [ ]. The writer has acknowledged, near the end of his letter, that he takes his proofs from the fourth century as well as the first three, but he has not given our readers any means of judging how many of his proofs are taken from the first three, and we have, therefore, taken the above method of pointing it out; and the result is, that only two of his proofs have anything to do with the question whether Purgatory was believed in the centuries in question.

Now, if we succeed in showing that those two do not prove that the doctrine of Purgatory was held by the Church, it will then be established that Purgatory was unknown to the Christian Church for 300 years; and, of course, it follows that no such doctrine was taught by the Apostles, and that it must be an innovation of men in later times.

For convenience of reference we have also numbered the proofs which he gives.

The writer of the above letter, "Warner Christian Search," takes his first proof from the Book of Maccabees. Now, the writer of this book was not one of the Fathers of the first three centuries; he was a Jew, who lived about 200 years before our Saviour came into the world.

On this "W. C. Search" pointedly inquires "why it is that Christ, who sedulously condemned the fabulous inventions and superstitions of the Pharisees, did not as decidedly censure this portion of the public worship of the Jews? I must have a direct answer to that question." And a very direct answer we will give. The book of Maccabees was not any "portion of the public worship of the Jews." The Jews never acknowledged that book as Scripture, given by inspiration of God. And it was no part of our Saviour's office to correct every error that had ever been written in a book by any Jew.

But what have the Fathers of the first three centuries to do with the book of Maccabees? Did they consider this book to be inspired Scripture? We know that the Church of Rome pronounces it to be inspired Scripture; but we know, also, that the Church of the first three hundred years did not consider it inspired Scripture. We know that the Fathers did believe in all the books of the New Testament; and every passage in those books which is against Purgatory is good proof that they did not believe in Purgatory. But how can it be a proof that they believed in Purgatory, because something like Purgatory (for it was not plainly Purgatory) is found in an old Jewish history, which those Fathers did not believe to be inspired Scripture at all?"

1. We come now to his proofs from the writers of those centuries. The first he quotes is Tertullian. We are rather surprised that he should venture to do so. Did he not read our leading article, in last number, on "The use of the Fathers?" We showed there that Tertullian became a heretic, and left the Catholic Church to become a believer in a wretched impostor, called Montanus, who professed to be the Holy Ghost himself! We then quoted a passage from Tertullian which speaks expressly of Purgatory. "W. C. Search" does not venture to quote that passage, while he thinks it worth his while to quote two passages from Tertullian which makes no mention of Purgatory at all! Why was this? Cardinal Bellarmine himself, the greatest of Roman controversialists, did quote that passage as a proof of Purgatory. Why did not "W. C. Search?" Was it because we had spoiled that passage for him, by showing that in that very chapter Tertullian professes to have received that doctrine from the impostor Montanus? But should not this have been a warning to him to be careful how he quoted proofs from Tertullian? Should he not, at least, have looked to see whether the books which he quoted were written while Tertullian was a Catholic, or after he became a heretic? Now, the fact is, that both the passages which "W. C. Search" quotes from Tertullian (and he quotes only the two) are both taken from books written by Tertullian after he became a Montanist and a heretic! And the latter of those books "De Monogamia," was written expressly to defend the Montanist errors against the Catholics!!

But what was the doctrine of Tertullian himself while he was a Catholic? Did "W. C. Search" never read this? "Since it stands firm about the resurrection of the dead, grief for the dead is idle, and the impatience of grief is idle. . . . . and we do injury to Christ when we do not contentedly accept their being called away by him, as if they were to be pitied." Do not Roman Catholics pity those who are suffering excruciating torments for ages in Purgatory? They do pity them, since they pay money to get them out. If Tertullian had believed this about them, could he have helped pitying them? Yet he affirms that to pity them who are called away is to do an injury to Christ! Surely Tertullian was no believer in Purgatory when he wrote that. But, telling us about Purgatory, after he had become a heretic, he tells us where he had learned it—from the impious Montanus. Is it not strange that men who call themselves Catholic should turn away from what Tertullian believed while he was yet a Catholic, and preach to us only the deadly heresies he fell into after he had left the Catholic Church? Is not this a striking proof of the dangers they run into who forsake the Scriptures to follow "the Fathers" as their rule of faith? Why do they not quote to us Mahomet and the Koran? Mahomet believed in Christ, and he believed also in his own inspiration. Tertullian (after he became a heretic) believed in Christ, and believed also that Montanus was the Holy Ghost, and gives us the doctrines which Montanus taught. Why not quote Mahomet to us as well as Montanus?

After what we have said of the books of Tertullian, which "W. C. Search" quotes (de Corona, and de Monogamia), it is needless to inquire whether the passages quoted do really allude to Purgatory or not. In fact, they do not; the first passage speaks only of offering for the dead; it will appear, farther on, that this does nothing to prove belief in Purgatory. The second passage is wrongly translated by "W. C. Search;" he gives it, "entreating repose to him;" the Latin word is "refrigerium," and means "refreshing." Now, those who never believed in Purgatory do believe that the souls of the faithful which are with Christ are refreshed by Christ; and if they, knowing, as they do, that Christ has promised to refresh them, and does refresh them if they pray to him to perform his promise and to refresh them, how can that prove that they believe in Purgatory? But it is needless to go on with this; for we acknowledge that Tertullian believed in Purgatory after he became a heretic; but we find that he himself confesses that he learned this doctrine, not from Christ, but from that false and impious impostor, Montanus. Any one who chooses can take this heresy of Tertullian to himself in spite of us; but we trust that, after what we have now written, they will not easily impose it on our readers, and we trust that "W. C. Search" will not impose it on himself.

* Our correspondent is mistaken (we suppose accidentally) in stating Cyprian to have lived in the second century. We have in sertel (third century) which he, perhaps, intended.

2. The other writer whom "W. C. Search" quotes from the first three centuries, is Cyprian. He quotes the following passage from his first epistle—"Our predecessors prudently advised, that no brother departing this life should nominate a churchman his executor; and should he do it, that no oblation should be made for him, nor sacrifice offered for his repose, nor prayer in his name offered in the church."

We never correct translations through mere pedantry; we take them as they stand, however doubtful, unless they suggest a meaning that the writer never intended. The word "repose" is taken by Roman Catholics to express relief from torment; we, therefore, object to that word being put in, when it is not a certain translation of the original. "W. C. Search" has put it into his translation from Tertullian, when the proper word is refreshment; he has also put it into his quotation from Eusebius, when there is no word to answer to it in the Greek; and he puts it into Cyprian here, when it is at least a doubtful translation. Cyprian's words are—"pro dormitione ejus;" this may mean, "upon falling asleep," or "on his death," at least as well, if not better, than "for his repose." Which of these meanings was really intended by Cyprian, we leave to be judged of from what we shall presently quote from him.

There are serious reasons for doubting whether Cyprian ever wrote these epistles at all. It is possible that they are the works of a forger, in later times. But we waive this question altogether; and we take these epistles as if they were written by Cyprian; and we proceed to inquire whether his having written that passage is any proof that he believed in Purgatory. It is clear that there is no mention of Purgatory in that passage. If oblations and prayers might reasonably be offered for the dead, from some other motive than to free the soul from Purgatory, then St. Cyprian and the Church in his time might have offered them from that other motive; and then the passage would give no proof of Purgatory at all. That there may be other motives, we have already shown in various articles on Purgatory, to which we refer our readers; but it is not necessary to introduce them here, because we can prove, out of St. Cyprian's own mouth, that he did not believe in Purgatory at all; and then, it will be clear that, when he speaks of oblations and prayers for the dead (if this passage were really written by him), it must be on some other account than to get them out of Purgatory; and here it is to be observed, that we are not going to quote from St. Cyprian's epistles, but from his treatises, which we know were really written by him. Hear, then, what he writes in his treatise "De Mortalitate," which was written to comfort and sustain his people, when multitudes around him were dying of the pestilence—"Already heavenly things are succeeding to earthly, and great to small, and eternal to transient. What place is therein this for anxiety and solicitude? Who, amid these things, is tremulous and mournful, except him in whom hope and faith are wanting? It is for him to be afraid of death who hath not willingness to come to Christ; and for him to be unwilling to come to Christ, who does not believe that he has begun to reign with Christ; for it is written that the just lives by faith. If thou art just and livest by faith, if thou truly believest in God, why dost thou not embrace that call to Christ which is given to thee, as one who will be with Christ, and secure of the promise of the Lord? and for that thou art delivered from the devil, make thyself joyful in the deliverance . . . . . Simeon cried out and said:—'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word, for my eyes have seen thy salvation;' proving surely, and bearing testimony, that THEN for the servant of God is peace, THEN free and tranquil rest, WHEN, rescued from those turmoils of earth, we gain the port of rest and eternal security." "This pestilence as to Jews and heathens, and Christ's enemies, is a plague; so to the servants of God, it is departure to their salvation. . . . the righteous are called to their refreshing, the unrighteous hurried into punishment." "We ought not to put on the garb of black here, while they have already taken on them white raiment there." "Shutting out our dread of death, and thinking of the deathlessness which comes beyond it . . . when the day of our own summons comes, going without delay, and with a ready mind, to the Lord who calls us . . . Let us embrace the day which makes over each of us to his own resting-place; which, after rescuing us hence, and ridding us of the chains of earth, places us back in Paradise, and in the heavenly kingdom." Was all this said by Cyprian to persons who he thought were just about to drop into the flames of Purgatory, to burn there in torments for thousands of years? Is it possible to think that the man who preached this was a believer in Purgatory? If "W. C. Search" still thinks so, let him listen to this, taken from St. Cyprian's address to Demetrius, written on the same occasion—"Once gone from hence, there is no more place for repentance; no satisfaction can be accomplished; it is here that life is either lost or saved; it is here that eternal salvation is provided for, by the worship of God and fruit of faith." Is not this plain speaking? Did this man believe in making satisfaction in Purgatory?

What answer is it to all this, to say that Cyprian "offered" and "prayed" for the righteous departed? Suppose that he did (of which we are not sure), but suppose he did, was it done to get them out of Purgatory? or was it not rather a thanksgiving for their deliverance out of every misery, and for their admission to rest and peace? Why, the Church of England and Ireland does this; she never celebrates the Holy Sacrament without offering this prayer to God—"We bless thy holy name for all thy servants departed this life in thy faith and fear."

We have now gone over all the witnesses that "W. C. Search" has brought for Purgatory from the first three hundred years of the Christian Church. They are only two! One of them believed it only after he left the Catholic Church and became a heretic; the other, who was always a Catholic, never believed it all.

We are entitled now to take it as established that this notion of Purgatory was no doctrine of the Gospel or of the Church for THREE HUNDRED YEARS. Whenever it came in afterwards, it was an invention of men.

This great fact does not rest on the above proof only: we have it confessed by the greatest men among the Roman Catholics themselves. We have room here for only two. The ablest opponent the English Reformation had at its rise, was Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, and he says, in his eighteenth article against Luther, "for some while it was unknown; it was late known to the Universal Church." The most learned defender the Roman Catholic doctrine has in these countries now, is Dr. Newman, lately made Rector of the Irish Catholic University; and he says, speaking of later ages than we are now inquiring about, "as time went on, the doctrine of Purgatory WAS OPENED upon the apprehension of the Church"—Essay on Development, p. 417. We may be sure these men would never have made such admissions, unless they were well convinced that such attempts as that of "W. C. Search," to prove Purgatory from the early Fathers, was utterly hopeless.

We have purposely omitted the proofs which "W. C. Search" has brought from the fourth century, because they are no answer at all to the question whether Purgatory can be proved from the writings of the first three centuries. Our business in this article is to examine that question by itself. We shall, however, examine them further on some other occasion. In the meantime, we ask our readers, and "W. C. Search," to observe, that we have fully answered all that has been produced, from the first three hundred years. If "W. C. Search" can produce any further proof, within the three centuries, our pages are still open to him to do so. If he cannot, the call of "A Catholic," in our last number, to all Roman Catholic bishops and priests, to come forward and supply the proof, is still open to them. If none can do it, our readers will agree with us, that Purgatory was not the doctrine of the Christian Church for at least THREE HUNDRED YEARS. And, in the meantime, in order to give the letter referred to full publicity, in accordance with our promise, we insert it a second time in our present number, as follows:—

PURGATORY.

SIR—I want to come to the point about the doctrine of purgatory. I want to know, once for all, if it was or was not the doctrine of the Church of Christ in the first ages. Let us take the first three centuries to begin with. I call upon some learned Catholic layman, or Catholic priest, to publish the opinions of the Fathers, who lived in those three centuries, in favour of purgatory. And I call on you, sir, to publish anything of this kind that may be sent to you. I hope our priests will see that it is essential that this should be done, in order to counteract the effect of your articles; and I hope that you will see that the fair play which you profess requires that you should publish it.

I hope some Catholic more learned than me will have the charity to come forward and do this, for I have not been able to do it myself.

I remain your obedient,
A CATHOLIC.

ST. AUGUSTINE'S PRAYER—PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I congratulate myself on having been the humble instrument of getting you, even in any shape or form, to pray for the dead. As a Catholic I rejoice thereat, and hope that more than a few Protestants will be found to join you in a formula of prayer which, as far as it goes, I look upon to be rather Catholic. It cannot, I trust, be possible that your Protestant readers will feel hurt at seeing you so beautifully condense St. Augustine's prayer, or for adopting and throwing so much light on so truly ancient and Catholic a tradition.

No prayer that Catholics use denies the mercy of Christ, goes beyond or contrary to the promises of God, or repudiates the all-saving efficacy of the Redeemer's blood. Did I believe, or could I imagine, that praying to the saints to intercede for us with God, or that to remember the faithful departed in our prayers, derogated in the least from the merits of Christ, I would not address my prayers to the saints, nor pray for the repose of the faithful departed; but the fact is, we Catholics believe, and are taught, that in doing both we acknowledge solely the merits of Christ, since it is through him, and in him, we are in the enjoyment of the "communion of saints."

I did not, in my first letter to you, say or seem to think that St. Monica received her final judgment as soon as she departed this life. I will now be more explicit; the church teaches me, and I believe her teaching, that each soul undergoes a particular judgment immediately after death, and is rewarded by a just God according as it is found guilty of mortal or venial sin, or of not the least stain of venial sin. If defiled by sin—that is, mortal sin—the soul is lost for ever; if defiled by venial sins, such as St. Augustine felt apprehensive, lest his mother, though a saint, might have died guilty of, some purgation would be required, in order to fit that soul for the enjoyment of the beatific vision. Venial sins are those for which St. Augustine "hoped to find some place of pardon with God," who is infinitely just. If a soul depart this life free from the least stain of venial sin—that is, if it preserve its baptismal innocence through life—the full enjoyment of heaven, and of seeing God face to face, is the lot of that happy soul. Such was not the case since Adam fell till Christ died on the cross, and opened the gates of heaven, till then shut against fallen and lost man.

In the early ages the Catholic Church has not used the term Purgatory, as far as my reading leads me to think, nor have the early Fathers; but they and the church offered up prayers and oblations for the faithful departed. In your article, headed "Prayers for the Dead," in the number of the LAYMAN which is now before me, you acknowledge that, in the ancient liturgies, prayers were offered up for the dead. Now, I ask, why did not the persons who composed said liturgies confine themselves to merely returning thanks to God for having admitted into heaven the persons mentioned in these liturgies? Evidently because they could not be sure that they were in a full and perfect state of bliss; and any diminution of that is a punishment, or a purgation. Thus it is that I connect prayers for the dead and Purgatory. Therefore, it was that St. Augustine prayed for his mother's sins after her death, although he knew and "believed that God had already done what he asked"—that is to say, had insured her salvation and eternal happiness.

You collect a few opinions, held, as you state, by "holy men in the early ages of the church," about prayers for the dead, but none of which were ever adopted into it. Their rejection or non-adoption is no surprise, as the church was always on its guard against heretical or anti-scriptural opinions, no matter whether coming from holy or unholy men. But when, subsequently, the Catholic Church has defined the object of praying for the dead, you entirely reject her authority. You quote and endeavour to make light of the words of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, and St. Gregory the Great, the former of whom flourished A.D. 386, the latter 218 years later. You say, "There may be cases, and there are, in which it would be easy to bring more Fathers in favour of an error than against it." Do you mean, sir, an error in a point of faith? If such be the Fathers, or if you show that they have taught heresy, I shall begin to be on my guard against them; but when I see St. Cyril, St. Augustine, and St. Gregory in favour of a doctrine settled by the Catholic Church, I shall, as a Catholic layman, continue to believe in the doctrine of Purgatory.

Hoping that this will reach you in time for publication,

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A CATHOLIC.

Loughrea, June 5, 1852.

We are glad that our correspondent sees less to condemn, and more to approve, than he expected in our doctrine. We trust that this will always be the result of that fair discussion which we seek to promote.

But our correspondent is not correct in supposing that he has brought us to the views we expressed. We have said no more than has been often said by the best and wisest of the Church of England and Ireland. The writer of our former article on St. Augustine's prayer for Monica would have written the same, at any time for twenty years past, or since he could form an opinion on the subject.

Nor can we allow our correspondent to suppose that we agree with him farther than we really do. We believe that the prayer of faith (which alone is acceptable to God) may be founded upon any of the promises of God. We believe that whatever God has promised to do, we may lawfully call upon him to do, either for ourselves, or for any others, who are one with us in Christ. But here we stop. "Show us the promise of God." We cannot pray for the souls in Purgatory, because we have no promise from God on which to found such a prayer. On the contrary, we know that God's blessed promises leave no room for such a prayer; and, therefore, it is not a prayer founded on the promises of God, but on the inventions of men; and, therefore, it cannot be the prayer of faith, or acceptable to God. If "A Catholic" thinks differently, we call upon him to show us a PROMISE FROM GOD to let souls out of Purgatory in answer to our prayers. When he shows us such a promise, then we will offer such a prayer. Until he shows us such a promise (which, of course, he cannot do) he has no right to suppose that our opinions about prayer give ANY support to prayers for souls in Purgatory.

He says, that "no prayer that Catholics use denies the mercy of Christ, goes beyond or contrary to the promises of God, or repudiates the all-saving efficacy of the Redeemer's blood." In this we widely differ from him. We know that the Church of Rome not only allows, but encourages men to use prayers that offend in all these points. We ask his opinion of the following prayers:—"O Mary, thou hast to deliver me from Purgatory; thou hast to conduct me to Paradise;" "Open to us, O Mary, the gates of heaven, since thou hast the keys; nay, thou thyself art, as the holy Church calls thee, the gate of heaven." Will he tell us upon what promise of God these prayers are founded?

But we go further, and say, that all prayers for the relief of those supposed to be suffering in the flames of Purgatory do offend in all these points. First, such prayers are against the mercy of Christ. For why do souls suffer such tortures? Either those tortures are NECESSARY or not. If they be necessary, what is the necessity? We suppose all who believe in Purgatory will say, "it is necessary to make them fit for the enjoyment of heaven, for which they could not otherwise be fit." Now, if this were so, prayers that they should be excused such suffering would, simply, be prayers that they should not be made fit for heaven! All such prayers do, therefore, suppose that these sufferings are not necessary, but that these souls may be made fit for heaven without these sufferings. Well, then, what are these sufferings for, if souls can be fit for heaven without them? Is not this as much as to say that God tortures them for his pleasure, and not for their profit? Prayers to let them off the suffering necessarily imply this; and such prayers deny the mercy of Christ. Secondly, all such prayers are contrary to, and go beyond the promises of God, until some one can show a promise from God to deliver souls out of Purgatory upon our prayers. Show us such a promise. Thirdly, all prayers which suppose that souls must needs be cleansed from sin, by being burned in the fire in Purgatory, do repudiate the all-saving efficacy of the Redeemer's blood, which St. John tells us cleanseth us from ALL sin"—1 John i. 7, Douay Bible. If it be true that there be some sins that cannot be cleansed, except by being burned out in the fire for thousands of years, then it is false that the blood of Christ can cleanse from ALL sin. And does not this doctrine repudiate the all-saving efficacy of the blood of Christ? Strange that it should be the venial sins that the blood of Christ cannot save, and which only ages of burning can cleanse.

We do not follow our correspondent into the question whether Purgatory was held by the Fathers, because we have already shown, in this number, that it was not held in the Church for three hundred years. We refer him to our observations upon the letter of "Warner Christian Search."

Our correspondent seems to be satisfied that his prayers for souls in Purgatory are the same as St. Augustine's prayers for Monica. Now, we will give him a simple method of trial, which will convince him of the contrary. Let him mark these words in St. Augustine's prayer—"I know that thou hast already done what I ask." These words are most suitable in St. Augustine's prayer, else he would not have put them into it. Now, let our correspondent take any prayer for getting souls out of Purgatory, which he himself or any other Roman Catholic uses, and let him put those words into that prayer, and see if the words do not turn the prayer into such nonsense, that he will be ashamed ever to use it with those words in it.

Will any one venture to furnish us (for publication) with a prayer for getting souls out of Purgatory, with those words of St. Augustine's prayer in it? If none will venture to commit such an absurdity, is it not clear that prayers for getting souls out of Purgatory must be totally different in their nature from St. Augustine's prayer for Monica? Until some one shall furnish us with such a prayer we shall decline to discuss further St. Augustine's prayer for Monica, as giving any authority for prayers for getting souls out of Pugatory.

SIR—I cannot allow the next number of your journal to issue without correcting the following misstatement of yours, which I find in the centre of the first column, page 71, of your present June number:—

"On this text (John v. 39.), however, Mr. Aylmer exercises his private judgment in a manner which many Protestants would not have courage to imitate; and, notwithstanding the authority of the Greek Fathers and the Irish Roman Catholic bishops, prefers the rendering—'Ye search the Scriptures.'"

I prefer no such thing; but, in my letter of the month of March last (see March number, page 35, first column), distinctly stated what, fearlessly of contradiction, I now reiterate, that there is nothing in the original text of St. John to prove that the word corresponding to "search" is to be taken in the Imperative, or the Indicative mood. I do not mean to contend for either, as I maintain my interpretation applies equally to both. We, Roman Catholics, translate it imperatively, because most of the Fathers (though not all—St. Cyril, for instance) do so; but Protestants, who disregard tradition, have nothing but the text to guide them; and hence, as Parkhurst observes, some divines of the Church of England have declared for the indicative acceptation of the word.

I subjoin the correction of a few typographical errors which appear in the publication of my letter in this month's number, and remain, sir,

Your obedient, very humble servant,
M. V. AYLMER.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR JULY.

From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.

THIS, in most districts, will be the principal month for cutting meadows and saving hay. We cannot too often impress on our readers the great necessity of preserving the saccharine and nutritious juices as much as possible, which consists in cutting the principal grasses when they are at prime, and before they begin to form woody fibre, tedding it out by hand immediately after the scythe, gathering it into windrows or lap-cocks before the dews begin to fall; to keep airing it, and increasing the size of the cocks gradually each day, so as to allow of the free expulsion and evaporation of the superabundant sap, and preserve the colour and concentrate the juices; to avoid, as much as possible, cutting in wet weather, or, at least, while the grass is saturated with rain; and to keep the ground constantly well raked up and clean, that it may have the advantage of the earliest sunshine and wind to evaporate it to dryness, it being impossible to save hay well if the ground it is to be spread out on be wet. Mowers always object to leave off cutting when it rains, as they find it much easier to cut when the grass is saturated with wet than when it is dry; but the owner suffers in the quality of the article and the expense of saving, as grass cut wet, if dry weather does not follow to allow of its being tedded out, soon gets yellow at the under side; but if cut dry, it keeps its colour much longer, if wet should come on before it can be tedded out. Meadows should be cut close to the ground, not only on account of the advantage received by the next crop, as the aftergrass never thrives well if not mown close, but the bottom portion of the grass weighs more heavily, and yields more in quantity than the upper parts. Plenty of hands should be engaged for haymaking, particularly in catching weather, as between times there will be various occupations to employ them profitably, particularly hoeing, weeding, and thinning the green crops, which come in now opportunely, and must be attended to; no time should be lost, after the hay is properly seasoned, in carrying and securing in ricks, instead of tramping it in field-cocks, by which much loss and waste in quantity and quality will be prevented.

Weeds will now be quickly springing up in every direction, and should be as quickly extirpated by hand and horse hoeing, &c., amongst the green crops, and by the scythe in the pastures and along the ditches and hedge banks, and docks and thistles pulled out of the corn crop; they make a large addition to the manure heap, and may be profitably used in bedding down the stock in the sheds and yards; but for such purposes they should be cut before flowering. If they are allowed to seed, they should be burned, as adding them to the manure or compost heaps will only tend to increase and perpetuate their species; and instead of lessening their numbers, multiply them, making their extirpation, year after year, more difficult.

Turnips.—The sowing of turnips should be finished off as early as possible in the month, and the hoeing and thinning of those already sown vigorously proceeded with. Swedes will require a distance apart of from 12 to 15 inches in good medium soil; and in deep, rich, sheltered aspects 18 inches apart. Dale's hybrid and Aberdeens, 12 inches; and the large, white, softer kinds, 9 to 10 inches apart. This is a good time to make up blanks by Swedes.

Mangel-wurzel and sugar beet should be thinned out to the same distances apart as Swedes, under the like circumstances; they will require grubbing and horse-hoeing between the rows, at least twice during the month, to keep the soil light and friable, which should be repeated till the crop closes in so that further interference would be injurious. Blanks may now be made good by transplanting.

Carrots and Parsnips should be horse and hand hoed, and, if forward, for the last time by the end of the month, previous to which they should be carefully looked over, and if more than one plant has been left at the proper distance, it should be removed, and all such plants produced from seeds which have vegetated since the last thinning should be removed also.

Rape should be hoed and singled out as soon as sufficiently high, and before they begin to have the effect of drawing each other up weakly; they may be left at 10 to 12 inches apart, every way, giving the crop on the richest soil the largest space.

Chicory.—Continue cleaning and hoeing between the plants, till the crop closes so much as to be injurious to trespass through it.

Potatoes, if planted early, cannot be gone through henceforth without injury; but if the stalk will admit of it, giving them a final earthing with the double mould-board plough will be of service.

Peas and Beans, in early localities, and if sown early, may be ready for harvesting by the end of the month. The peas may be mown, or cut with a hook, and rolled into bundles left to dry, and turned over daily, till ready to carry and stook. The beans are best cut with a hook, and tied into small sheaves with straw bands, and set up to dry in stooks, and when dry enough they should be carried and stacked.

Bere will be ready for harvesting some time in the month; it should be cut before it is dead ripe, and bound and stooked immediately. This is a crop that comes away so early as to admit of a stolen crop of stone turnips or rape to be taken off profitably.

Flax should be pulled as soon as ready, which will be when the seed pods are changing from a green to a brown colour, and the stalk has become yellow for about two-thirds of its height; but if any of the crop is lying or lodged, it should be pulled at once, and kept by itself. If the crop is uneven in length, the longest must be pulled first, and kept separate from the secondary growth; but if there is not much of the latter quality, it will not be worth the expense of pulling it. The flax, as it is pulled, should be kept even at the roots ends, like a brush, and if intended to be rippled in the field, which is the most approved practice, the handfuls, as they are pulled, should be laid across each other diagonally, to be ready for rippling. The apparatus is very simple. The ripple consists of a row of iron teeth screwed into a block of wood, and may be made by any handy blacksmith.* It is to be taken to the field, where the flax is being pulled, and screwed down to the centre of a nine-feet plank, resting on two stools. The ripplers may either stand or sit astride at opposite ends. They should be at such a distance from the comb as to permit of their striking it properly and alternately. A winnowing-sheet must be placed under them, to receive the bolls as they are rippled off; and then they are ready to receive the flax just pulled, the handfuls being placed diagonally, and bound up in a sheaf. The sheaf is laid down at the right hand of the rippler, and untied. He takes a handful with one hand, about six inches from the root, and a little nearer the top with the other. He spreads the top of the handful like a fan, draws the one-half of it through the comb, and the other half past the side; and by a half-turn of the wrist the same operation is repeated with the rest of the bunch. Some, however, prefer rippling without turning the hand, giving the flax one or two pulls through, according to the quantity of bolls. The flax can often be rippled, without being passed more than once through the comb. He then lays the handfuls down at his left side, each handful crossing the other, when the sheaf shall be carefully tied up and removed. The object of crossing the handfuls so carefully, after rippling, when tying up the beets for the steep is, that they will part freely from each other when they are taken to spread out on the grass, and not interlock, and be put out in their even order, as would otherwise be the case. If the weather be dry, the bolls should be kept in the field, spread on winnow-cloths, or other contrivance for drying; and, if turned, from time to time, they will win. Passing the bolls first through a coarse riddle, and afterwards through fanners, to remove straws and leaves, will facilitate the drying. If the weather be moist, they should be taken in-doors, and spread out thinly and evenly on a barn floor, or on a loft, leaving windows and doors open, to allow a thorough current of air, and turned twice a-day. When nearly dry, they may be taken to a corn-kiln (taking care not to raise it above summer heat), and carefully turned until no moisture remains. By the above plan of slow drying, the seed has time to imbibe all the juices that remain in the husk, and to become perfectly ripe. Flax ought not to be allowed to stand in the field, if possible, even the second day; it should be rippled as soon as pulled, and carried to the water as soon as possible, that it may not harden.

* The best ripples are made of half-inch square rods of iron, placed with the angles of iron next the ripplers, 3-16ths of an inch asunder at the bottom, half an inch at the top, and eighteen inches long, to allow a sufficient spring, and save much breaking of flax. The points should begin to taper three inches from the top.

NOVELTY OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC DOCTRINE OF EXTREME UNCTION.

Among the many arguments on which the Church of Rome relies, and which she makes use of, both to confirm the attachment of her own members, and to attract converts within her pale, we believe that there is scarcely any one more effectual for her purpose than the claim of exclusive antiquity. It is continually asserted by her controversial writers, that the doctrines and discipline of the Church of Rome are as ancient as the first preachers of the Gospel, and have been handed down, pure and unchanged from their times; and Protestants are repeatedly taunted with the novelty of their creed, and accused of departing from the rites and practices of the primitive Church. In our own country especially, the influence of this argument or assertion can scarcely be exaggerated. No one who is familiar with the language and ideas of the Irish peasantry, can fail to be impressed with their deep reverence for antiquity, and the value which they consequently attach to every object, sacred or secular, which has been, as it were, consecrated by time. Nothing is more common than to hear the humbler classes of Roman Catholics speak of the "auld Church" as being alone possessed of the true faith: and they feel a kind of proud satisfaction in clinging to a creed which, as they conceive, has preserved its purity unsullied throughout the lapse of ages, and has been transmitted to them, unaltered and uncorrupted, from the times of the apostles themselves.

Now, we freely admit the truth and soundness of the principle which lies at the bottom of these feelings and convictions. It is this—that Christianity is a Divine revelation, proceeding from God as its first author, and proclaimed to mankind by his messengers; and that, therefore, the nearer we can ascend to the source, the more likely we are to find the doctrines of Christianity in a state of purity. But if this be so, it obviously follows that all Christians, whether they be Roman Catholics or Protestants, ought to be anxious to learn how far the faith which they profess be indeed the primitive faith which was taught by Christ and his Apostles. We are as zealous upholders of antiquity, when rightly understood, as the most devout member of the Church of Rome; and this very point is one of the chief grounds of our controversy with her. We assert that she has not handed down the pure Catholic faith, but that she has overlaid it, from time to time, with more or less modern corruptions of her own invention. We assert that she can produce no adequate warrant from Scripture, no support from primitive antiquity, for many of her most important rites and doctrines. If we can establish these assertions to the satisfaction of our readers, we may safely leave it to their discernment to decide whether she really possesses that "venerable antiquity" to which she lays such exclusive claim; or, rather, whether she is not justly liable to the heavy censure denounced by St. Paul against those who "depart from the faith."—1 Tim. iv. 1.

In illustration of the truth of the foregoing remarks, we propose, at present, briefly to examine the doctrine of extreme unction. This is one of the rites of the Roman Catholic Church which, from its connection with the solemn season of death, and from the influence which it is believed to exercise on the state of the departing spirit, is a subject of deep interest to all her members. To be deprived of "the rites of the church" is looked upon by them as the greatest misfortune which can befall a dying person; and hence the threat of withholding these rites is, as recent events have proved, one of the most efficacious weapons which can be used by the ministers of the Roman Catholic Church, when they wish to coerce the conduct of any individuals among their flocks. When any person is at the point of death, his friends and relations spare no pains to secure the presence of the priest, in order that he may administer extreme unction to the dying man; and when once this task has been accomplished, their minds are happy, and the sick man departs in peace.

But, perhaps, the inquiry may arise in some minds, what is the origin of extreme unction? Is it commanded in Scripture? Did this custom always exist in the Church? Does this rite bestow any real benefit upon him who receives it? These are points on which every sincere Roman Catholic ought to be anxious for information; but on which, nevertheless, his religious instructors are not always either willing, or, perhaps, able to clear up any doubts that may arise. And yet, considering the very great importance which Roman Catholic priests attach to this sacrament of their church; considering, moreover, that their possession of an infallible head ought to be a never-failing remedy for any doubts and difficulties that may arise; taking these things into account, one would naturally expect to find clear and consistent replies to all the foregoing questions in the works of the eminent divines of the Church of Rome. But, alas! when we come to consult them, we find nothing but contradictions and inconsistencies, as we shall now proceed to prove.

And first, as regards the institution of this supposed sacrament:—Roman Catholics and Protestants are both agreed that every true sacrament of the Christian Church must have been instituted and appointed by Christ himself—nay, the Council of Trent has denounced an anathema against any person who presumes to believe otherwise.* Hence, if extreme unction be really a sacrament, some mention of its institution by Christ ought to be found in the Gospels. But we may search in vain for any such command; and this fact is admitted by most Roman Catholic writers. In one of the popular catechisms of that church we find the following passage:—†

"Q. What is the fifth sacrament? A. Extreme unction. Q. When did Christ institute it? A. The time is uncertain; some think it was instituted at his last supper; others, that it was done between his resurrection and ascension."

This is also the statement of Dens, who writes as follows:—‡

"Q. Was this sacrament immediately instituted by Christ? A. St. Thomas answers in the affirmative. This is collected from the Council of Trent, which teaches that it was promulgated by S. James; therefore he judges that it was not instituted by him, but immediately by Christ. Q. When did Christ institute it? A. The time is uncertain; yet it is very likely that he instituted it after his resurrection." Bellarmine simply states (without assigning any authority) that the institution is to be inferred from the passage in S. James v. 14. Now, let our readers consider the full extent of these admissions. If any question is raised about baptism or the Lord's Supper, we can point to the very passage in the Gospel histories which records the institution of each of these sacraments, and we can quote the very words of our Blessed Lord, enjoining the perpetual use of them in his Church. But with regard to extreme unction, no such command exists. The time of institution, we are told, is uncertain. Some writers fix on one period of our Lord's history, and some another: but all their guesses are alike destitute of a shadow of foundation from Scripture. Is not this fact of itself sufficient to make any thoughtful person doubt whether extreme unction be really a sacrament at all?

In the declaration of the Council of Trent respecting extreme unction, there is one word, the history of which is too curious to be omitted, inasmuch as it proves the uncertainty and vagueness which existed in the minds of the learned doctors who composed the council, regarding the origin of this supposed sacrament. The decree of the Council of Trent states, that extreme unction was "Instituted by Christ, insinuated in St. Mark, and promulgated by St. James."*

The passage in St. Mark's Gospel, here referred to, is as follows (chap. vi. 13)—"And they (i.e., the Apostles) cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them." Now, we are informed by the historian of the Council of Trent,† that the assembled divines at first boldly stated in their decree that the sacrament of extreme unction was instituted in this passage of St. Mark; but a divine who was present remarked, that this rite could not have been then performed by the Apostles, because they were not made priests until the last Supper; and were, therefore, incapable of administering extreme unction when they were first sent forth by our Lord. This meddling theologian disconcerted the sacred synod. The holy Fathers, embarrassed by the inconsistency, began to look about for some way of ridding themselves of this contradiction. Extreme unction, said this infallible assembly, was not instituted, but merely insinuated in St. Mark, and afterwards published in St. James. Thus the unction of the evangelist became, in the hands of these wise and learned divines, an insinuated sacrament. This fact proves very plainly the confusion and perplexity in which the Council of Trent felt themselves to be involved, when they attempted to bring forward Scripture proof for the institution of this supposed sacrament.

But we have not yet done with the inconsistencies of Roman Catholic divines on this subject. Maldonatus, a Jesuit, and one of their most learned commentators on Scripture, in writing on the before-quoted passage of St. Mark, asks—"If the sacrament of extreme unction be not here, where is it?" This question is not asked without reason; and yet, according to the confession of some of the greatest divines of the Church of Rome, the unction in St. Mark was not sacramental, or for the healing of the mind, but for the health of the body only. This was the opinion of Cardinal Cajetan and Cardinal Bellarmine, who recites other great authorities on the same side.‡ And any unprejudiced person, calmly reading over the words of the evangelist—"they anointed with oil many that were sick and healed them"—would obviously come to the same conclusion. Why, then, was Maldonatus so very anxious to find the sacrament of extreme unction in this passage of St. Mark? He well knew that the divines of his church had generally denied the unction which the Apostles used in St. Mark to be a sacramental unction, and that they had laid the stress of their cause upon St. James; but he saw the obvious inconvenience of this course; for the same unction being plainly spoken of in both places (as we shall see presently), those writers who give up one passage in effect give up both, and thus leave their sacrament without any testimony of Scripture at all.

We now come to the well-known verse of St. James, which the Council of Trent declared to be the promulgation of the sacrament of extreme unction. It runs as follows (James v. 14, 15, Douay Version):—"Is any man sick among you? let him bring in the priests of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick man: and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him." [N.B.—The Greek word here translated priests is πρεσβυτερους, which properly signifies "elders."] The first thing to be determined in this passage is the true meaning to be attached to the words—"The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." If they stood alone, no person would hesitate to admit that they refer to a miraculous cure to be wrought upon the sick person spoken of in the previous verse. "The Lord," it is said, "shall raise him up." From what? Obviously from his bed of sickness. The word used by St. James (ἐγερεῖ) is the same as that spoken by our Lord himself, when he effected the miraculous cure of the impotent man recorded in St. John's Gospel, ch. v. 8, and addressed him thus:—"Rise, take up thy bed and walk." So far, therefore, the object of the anointing spoken of by St. James is manifestly identical with that practised by the Apostles when they were first sent ont by our Lord. St. Mark informs us, as we have already seen, that the Apostles "anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them." St. James (one of those same Apostles, be it remembered), in the passage just quoted, orders a sick man to send for the elders of the Church, who were to pray over him and anoint him with oil: and he adds that "the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." The object aimed at in both cases is clearly the same—namely, the recovery of the sick person, which was to be accomplished by the exertion of the miraculous powers then vouchsafed by the Lord to certain members of his church, in accordance with his own parting words (S. Mark xvi. 17)—"These signs shall follow them that believe. In my name they shall cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." These miraculous gifts were not bestowed upon all Christians alike, nor could they be exerted on all occasions. If an indiscriminate gift of healing all diseases was possessed by the Apostles and their cotemporaries, it is manifest that they might all have been alive to this day. There must have been some inward movement of the Spirit of God upon the mind, before any person could feel confident that a miracle could be wrought through his instrumentality; and this is the meaning of the "prayer of faith" spoken of by S. James, which one or more of the elders, moved by the Spirit of God, were to make for the recovery of the sick person, in full persuasion that the Lord, who gave the inward impulse to perform the miracle, would complete his own work, and restore the sick man to health.

The words of St. James, therefore, plainly refer to the miraculous cure of diseases, of which the anointing with oil was the outward sign. The same sign, as we have seen, was used by the Apostles generally for the same object; and even our Lord himself sometimes condescended to accompany a miraculous cure with some outward sign, as, for example, when he anointed the eyes of the blind man with clay—John xi. 6. But St. James goes on to add, "and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." Now, we frequently read in Scripture that bodily diseases were inflicted by God as a punishment for some sin. Thus, in the Old Testament, King Uzziah was stricken with leprosy for offering sacrifice in the sanctuary, and Gehazi, the servant of Elisha, was visited with the same disease for lying, and covetousness. We read, too, in St. John's Gospel, that our Lord thus addressed the impotent man, whom he had cured—"Behold, thou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee." And St. Paul writes to the Corinthians, who had profaned the sacrament of the Lord's Supper—"For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep."—1 Cor. xi. 32. In cases such as these, therefore, when the sickness was inflicted as a bodily chastisement for sin, the healing of the disease was a testimony that God forgave the sin. Thus, for example, when our Lord cured the man sick of the palsy (Matt. ix. 2, 6, 7), he addressed him thus—"Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee;" and, in this case, it deserves to be especially noted that the miracle was wrought as a proof that the sins of the sick man were forgiven—See verses 5, 6.

We have entered at some length into an explanation of this passage of St. James, because, when rightly understood, it affords no countenance whatever to the pretended sacrament of extreme unction. The anointing prescribed by St. James was to be administered to persons who were not to die, but to be raised up from sickness; it was primarily intended for the miraculous cure of diseases, and, therefore, was to last only so long as the Lord vouchsafed the gift of miracles to his Church; and the recovery of the sick man was to be the sure and certain token of the forgiveness of sins promised by the Apostle. But that the anointing recommended by St. James cannot be the same as the extreme unction of the Roman Catholic Church, is evident from the following considerations:—St. James directs that the sick person should be anointed in reference to his cure; but the priest anoints him while in the agonies of death, when there is no prospect of recovery, and never administers this unction while there appears any hope of life. The Apostles order this anointing for the cure of the body; but the Church of Rome applies it principally for the cure of the soul, concerning which St. James gives no directions: for what is said of the forgiveness of sins is to be referred to faith and prayer, and not to the anointing. The anointing which St. James recommends was only applied in some cases, perhaps very few; but the Church of Rome uses it in all cases: therefore, St. James's unction, and the extreme unction of the Church of Rome, are two very different things.

Again, when we come to examine the effects which the great Roman Catholic divines ascribe to extreme unction, we find ourselves involved in the utmost confusion and perplexity. "It remits mortal sins," says Dens.* "It is not to be understood of mortal sins," says Faber.† "It remits venial sins," says the Catechism of the Council of Trent;‡ and it adds a reason, "for mortal sins are taken away by the sacrament of penance." "No," says Thomas Aquinas, "this is not true; it does not take away venial sins, but only the remains of sin."‖ "Yes," says the Council of Trent, "it takes away both venial and mortal sins, for it wipes away all remains of sin."§ Thus nothing but perplexity seems to attend us in almost every step that we take in investigating the opinions of Roman Catholic divines regarding the effect of this rite. Where, we may well ask, is the great benefit Roman Catholics derive from their boasted possession of an infallible head, if it cannot enforce even the semblance of unity and consistency in the account which their divines give of what they refer to as one of the most important sacraments of their church?

We have seen that the words of the Apostle James related to the healing of the sick, or to their restoration to health, and that they furnish no authority for anointing the dying, solely with a view to their departure. There is reason to think that the practice of anointing the sick was superstitiously continued after the miraculous powers of healing had ceased; but of its being considered a sacrament, to be administered to the dying for their spiritual benefit, we read nothing for many centuries after Christ. There is no mention of it in Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, or Cyprian, or in any of the writers of the first centuries, who wrote frequently and plainly of the discipline and sacraments of the Church. Four hundred revolving years ran their ample round, and left no trace of this sacrament. The ancient Fathers have treated freely of the two sacraments which have always been recognised in Christ's Church; Baptism and the Lord's Supper meet the reader's eye in almost every page of their works. But extreme unction, wonderful to tell, is never mentioned. This ceremony which, in modern days, is said to remit sin, and strengthen the soul of the dying, and to be almost indispensable to salvation is nowhere spoken of. This was a woeful and vexatious omission in the good Fathers, and has put modern Roman Catholic divines to a sad puzzle. Bellarmine and Archbishop M'Hale endeavour to excuse the ancients for omitting the history of this sacrament in their works, by alleging their want of occasion. The cardinal and archbishop for once are right. The early Christian authors had no opportunity for mentioning such a sacrament; for, in plain truth, such a sacrament did not then exist.

Pope Innocent the First, who flourished so late as the fifth century, is the earliest witness adduced on the Roman Catholic side of this question. Decentius, Bishop of Eugubium, in Italy, had occasion to consult the pontiff on this subject, who returned the following answer:—"The diseased faithful may be anointed with consecrated oil of chrism. This ointment may be used, not only by priests, but by all Christians, who may anoint not only themselves, but also their friends. But the chrism may not be poured on penitents, for it is a kind of sacrament."¶

We request the reader's particular attention to this reply. Pope Innocent says that not only priests, but all Christians may anoint themselves as well as their friends. The Church of Rome now says, that extreme unction can only be administered by a priest, and anathematizes all who believe otherwise. Pope Innocent calls this rite, "a kind of sacrament." The Council of Trent denounced a terrible anathema against any person who should presume to deny that extreme unction was a true and proper sacrament instituted by Christ. Surely, we have here abundant proof that the Roman Catholic Church now holds a doctrine altogether different from that which it held in the time of Pope Innocent the First, and that, therefore, it cannot be the immutable, and infallible church which it professes to be.

There are various other interesting points on this subject, to which we cannot now advert, but to which, on some future occasion, we may, perhaps, invite the attention of our readers.

TALK OF THE ROAD—No. VI.

So Pat and Jem went straight to Mr. Owen's house, and he brought them into his study.

"Well, boys," said Mr. Owens, "did you read anything of the books, and how do you like them?"

"We like them well, your reverence," said Jem, "for they teach us more about God than ever we knew before, and they teach things that ought to make us love him, if we have any heart to him at all."

"And do you find much difference in the books?" said Mr. Owens, turning to Pat.

"Nothing to speak of, for so far, your reverence," said Pat; "there's words here and there not just the same; but for the meaning, there's no differ to signify, that I see yet."

"There are some differences, though," said Mr. Owens, "that will surprise you very much when you come to them, for some of them are just the very contrary of the difference you might expect to find in the two books. But I will tell you about that some other time, for I would rather hear you speak now, if you have anything to ask me about what you find in the books."

"That's just it, your reverence," said Jem; "we want to ask you about the right way of praying to God; for sure when we see what he says to them that pray to him, it's a poor thing not to know the right way."

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "it is a good thing when reading the Bible makes us ask questions like that; but if you could explain your difficulty a little more, I might know better how to help you."

"Well, your reverence," said Pat, "we want to know if the likes of us, poor creatures, may just go straight to God, and pray to him ourselves, without anybody to speak to him for us, or if we must get somebody to speak for us and offer our prayers to him—somebody that he will be more willing to listen to than to ourselves."

"That's a very important question," said Mr. Owens, "and the answer is very plain; we are sinful and fallen creatures, not fit in ourselves to speak to a God, who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity; and, therefore, we have no reason to hope that our prayers will come up to him at all, unless somebody that a holy God can listen to should offer up our prayers to him, and intercede with him to accept our prayers."

"Why, your reverence," said Jem, "sure the Protestants don't believe that!"

"A man who does not believe that," said Mr. Owens, "cannot be a Christian, and so we need not talk about his being a Protestant. But we do believe it, and it lies at the root of our religion, and all our prayers to God are founded on it."

"And so," said Pat, "your reverence thinks it good to get the Blessed Virgin, and the angels, and the saints to speak for us to God, and get him to hear our prayers?"

"No," said Mr. Owens, "I did not say that we were to get them to speak for us; we should be sure to get some one that we know can hear us, and that we know God will hear."

"And who will we get, your reverence," said Pat, "if we don't get them to speak for us?"

"Maybe your reverence means," said Jem, "the verse that we read here in the two books, the last night we were here."

"That's just what I mean," said Mr. Owens; "and, now, do you remember what it was?"

"I do, your reverence," said Jem; "it was just this—'There is one God, and one mediator of God and man—the man Christ Jesus.'"

"Well," said Mr. Owens; "we think that if we go to God without that mediator, that we have no right to believe that God will accept our prayers; but if we have that mediator to intercede for us, and offer up our prayers to God, and ask him to receive them, then our prayers will be accepted by God; and before we go any farther," said Mr. Owens, "let me show you, out of the Douay Bible, why we think so." So Mr. Owens turned to the following passages and read them—"I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh to the Father but by me."—John xiv. 6. "Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it you."—John xvi. 23. "Jesus is entered into heaven itself, that he may appear now in the presence of God for us."—Hebrews ix. 24. "He is able also to save for ever, them that come to God by him; always living to make intercession for us."—Heb. vii. 25. "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not."—Luke xxii. 32. "And not for them (the Apostles) only do I pray, but for them also who through their word shall believe in me."—John xvii. 20. "So here you see," said Mr. Owens, "if we want to come to God in prayer, we must come through Christ, who is the way; and we must pray in the name of Christ, if we want our prayers to be granted; and then Christ makes intercession for us, that our prayers may be heard, and he prays for all who believe in his Word." So you see," said Mr. Owens, "we do not want for somebody to pray for us, and to intercede with God to hear our prayers; we have one who is able and willing to do it; and if we want our prayers to be heard we must offer them up through his intercession—that is, we must ask him to speak for us, and to offer our prayers to God."

"And may we ask the saints and angels to do it at all, your reverence?" said Pat.

"That's a thing that God must know better than we can," said Mr. Owens. "I have showed you, out of the Douay Bible, that we have great promises to those who pray through Jesus Christ, and ask him to intercede for them. But did you find, in the Douay Bible, any promise to those that pray through the Virgin Mary or the saints?"

"Your reverence," said Jem, "that's the very thing we want to ask you; neither of us has found the like of that in the Bible; but we haven't read all the Bible, and it will take us long to do it, and maybe it is in that part that we haven't read; and we just want to know if there is anything in it at all about asking the Blessed Virgin and the saints to pray for us."

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "I think it would be better you would ask some one else that question; for if I say there is no such thing in the Bible, you will think, maybe, that it is because I am a Protestant that I say so, or because I do not understand the right sense of it; and so, perhaps, you would not believe me."

"And who will we ask, your reverence?" said Pat.

"Of course, you will ask Father John," said Mr. Owens. "If he can show it to you in the Bible, of course he will: and if he cannot show it to you in the Bible, then you will be sure that it is not there; and may be you would not be sure merely for my telling you."

"Well, your reverence," said Jem, "that would be the right way; only I doubt it would not do at all."

"And why not?" said Mr. Owens. "Sure your clergy ought to be ready to tell you whether the things they teach you are in the Bible or not."

"They ought, your reverence," said Jem; "sure enough, that is true; but, then, that is just the thing we durstn't ask them at all."

"And why not?" said Mr. Owens.

"Why, your reverence," said Jem, "if it was in the Bible, that would be all right; and I'm thinking Father John would be ready enough to tell us if it was in it; but if it's not in it, your reverence, wouldn't I be in the queer way to be asking Father John to tell me out of the Bible what's not in the Bible at all? Isn't that what would anger him? And how do I know but what he might curse me from the altar, and leave me without a bit to put into the childer's mouths? So I would rather take your reverence's word for it. Is there anything in the Bible for asking the saints and angels to bring our prayers to God for us?"

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "in that case I must answer you. There is not one word in the Bible, from beginning to end, to tell us to ask either saints, or angels, or the Blessed Virgin, to pray for us; but a great deal to tell us that we want nobody but Jesus Christ to offer our prayers to God. Just listen to this," said Mr. Owens, "'Having, therefore a great High Priest, who hath passed into the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God.' . . . 'Let us go, therefore, WITH CONFIDENCE to the throne of grace; that we may obtain mercy, and find grace in seasonable aid.' Here, you see," said Mr. Owens, "our having such a High Priest is sufficient to warrant us to pray with confidence for the mercy and grace we want; and if that is enough to make us pray with confidence, what room is there for anything more? And more than that," said Mr. Owens, "I can tell you, that the Roman Catholic books, that argue for asking the saints to pray for us, do never give any proof for it out of the Bible; and, of course, if they could give proof out of the Bible, they would."

"And what proof do they give for it, your reverence?" said Jem.

"The proof they give is this," said Mr. Owens:—"they say that the Bible tells us to pray for each other, and to ask each other to pray for us. And so far they are right, for the Bible does teach us to do that; and then they say, would it not be better still to ask the angels and the saints in heaven to pray for us? But that is an invention of their own; for the Bible does not say that."

"Well, your reverence," said Pat, "I would like to hear more about that; sure there's my brother, that went to Australia, if he was here now, I would rather ask him to pray for me than anybody at all; he was the good brother, and he used to read the Bible betimes, afore any of the other boys thought of reading it; and though he was not so attentive to his duties as some of them, he was the best Christian at all; and sure I would be glad I could only ask him to pray for me; and if he was in heaven, wouldn't he care for me still? and wouldn't his prayers be better still?"

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "I hope our friends in heaven do remember us, as we ought to remember them; and it may be that they still pray to God for us; but we can say nothing at all about that, because God has not told us anything about it; and no one else could tell us anything about it. But I do not see how you, as a Christian, could ask your brother, in heaven, to pray for you, the same as you would if he was standing beside you."

"Well, if your reverence could show me the differ," said Pat.

"Where is he now?" said Mr. Owens.

"In Australia, your reverence," said Pat.

"That is just at the other side of the world," said Mr. Owens. "If you could make a hole straight down into the ground, and dig it about eight thousand miles deep, it might come out at the other side, near about where he is; it is a long way," said Mr. Owens.

"It is, your reverence," said Pat.

"And you would like to ask him to pray for you?" said Mr. Owens.

"I would, your reverence," said Pat.

"Well, then," said Mr. Owens, "just go down on your knees here, this moment, and call upon him to pray for you."

"Oh, your reverence," said Pat, "sure I couldn't do that."

"And why can you not do that?" said Mr. Owens.

"Because, your reverence, he can't hear me," said Pat.

"Would it not be a great sin to do it?" said Mr. Owens.

"It would, your reverence, not a doubt of it," said Pat; "and I dursn't do it at all."

"But you would ask your brother to pray for you, if he was standing here beside you?" said Mr. Owens.

"I would, surely, your reverence," said Pat.

"But it is quite a different thing to call upon him to pray for you while he is in Australia?" said Mr. Owens.

"It isn't like it at all, your reverence," said Pat.

"And if you got a letter to-morrow," said Mr. Owens, "to say your brother was dead, would that be the same as if he was standing here beside you?"

"No indeed, your reverence," said Pat; "nothing like it."

"And if you then went down on your knees," said Mr. Owens, "and called on him to pray for you, which would that be the most like—asking his prayers while he was standing beside you, or calling on him while he was in Australia?"

"It would be a deal more like asking while he was in Australia?" said Pat.

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "the only reason the Roman Catholics can give for praying to the saints in heaven to pray for us, is this, that it is just the same as asking our friends beside us to pray for us. Now, you see it is not the same, but quite different; it is just like praying to our friends on earth in a way that no Christian durst do, for fear of making God angry with us. Tell me now," said Mr. Owens, "would you go down on your knees and call on the present Pope, Pius the Ninth, who is at Rome, 1,000 miles off, to pray for you?"

"No, your reverence," said Pat; "no Catholic would do that."

"Would it not be very wicked and sinful if they did?" said Mr. Owens.

"It would, your reverence," said Pat.

"Would it not be putting the Pope in the place of God to suppose he could hear what you said?" said Mr. Owens.

"Well, I think it would be very like it," said Pat.

"If you spoke ever so loud, the Pope could not hear you," said Mr. Owens.

"He could not, your reverence," said Pat.

"And if he knew of your prayer at all," said Mr. Owens, "it could only be because he knew the thoughts of your heart."

"Nothing else, your reverence," said Pat.

"Can you speak loud enough to be heard in heaven?" said Mr. Owens.

"I cannot, your reverence," said Pat.

"Well, then," said Mr. Owens, "if the saints hear your prayers, it can only be because they know the thoughts of your heart; and is that not putting them in the place of God, for Solomon says to God—'Thou only knowest the hearts of all the children of men?'" and here Mr. Owens showed them the words in the Douay Bible—3 Kings, ch. viii., verse 39.

"And is there nothing in the Bible, your reverence," said Pat, "for praying to the saints or angels?"

"Nothing at all," said Mr. Owens; "and if there was, you may be sure Father John would show you that much of it; but he would not like you to come upon these words of Jesus Christ—'The Lord thy God shalt thou adore, and Him only shalt thou serve.'"—Matthew iv. 10.

"Well, your reverence," said Jem, "now it comes to my mind that I learned a catechism at the big school I learned to read in, that was kept by the monks, or the Christian Brethren, as they call them; and in that catechism, it was took out of the Bible that St. John, the Blessed Apostle, did worship an angel; and sure St. John would not do it if it was wrong; but I disremember what part of the Bible they took it out of."

"I will show you the catechism and the place in the Bible, too," said Mr. Owens. So he took down off the shelf a little book, called "AN ABRIDGMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE, with proofs of Scripture, on points controverted, by way of question and answer. Composed in 1649, by H. T., of the English College at Douay. Now revised by the RIGHT REV. JAMES DOYLE, D.D., and prescribed by him to be used in the united Diocess of Kildare and Leighlin. Dublin: printed by Richard Coyne, 4, Capel-street, printer, bookseller, and publisher to the Royal College of St. Patrick, Maynooth, 1846." So Mr. Owens read out of the title page. "Is this the book?" said Mr. Owens.

"It is, your reverence," said Jem; "and is that the Doctor Doyle that was Roman Catholic Bishop of Kildare?"

"The very man," said Mr. Owens, "and he was the most learned and clever man that has been a Roman Catholic bishop in Ireland for many years; and you see he revised this book himself, and ordered it to be used in his diocess; and that is the way you came to learn it. And now let us look for the Scripture proof for praying to angels, and you may be sure this book will give the best proof that can be got in the Bible." So Mr. Owens turned to page 52, where it speaks of the lawfulness of worshipping saints and angels. "Question—How prove you that?" "Answer—First, out of Joshua, ch. v., verses 14 and 15, where Joshua did it—'I am Prince of the Host of the Lord, SAID THE ANGEL to Joshua, and Joshua fell flat on the ground, and adoring, said, what saith my Lord to his servant?" And here Mr. Owens bid them observe the words—"said the angel to Joshua;" and then he turned to the place in the Douay Bible, and showed them that this person who spoke to Joshua is not called an angel at all, but in the second verse of the next chapter, he is called THE LORD; so it was the Lord, and not an angel, that Joshua worshipped. And then Mr. Owens read the rest of the same answer in Dr. Doyle's Catechism. "Secondly, Apocalypse, chapter xxii., verse 8, where St. John did it (though the angel had once before willed him not to do it, in regard of his apostolical dignity, chap. xix, v. 10), and I fell down, saith he, to adore before the feet of the angel, who showed me these things." And then Mr. Owens stopped; and Jem waited for a minute; and then he said—"And did the Blessed Apostle fall down to worship the angel?"

"He surely did," said Mr. Owens.

"And what does your reverence say to that?" said Pat; "does not that make it out to be right to worship the angel?"

So Mr. Owens said nothing at all; but he took the Douay Bible, and opened it at the place that the catechism refers to (Apocalypse, or Revelation, xxii. 8), and bid Pat read it; and so Pat read—"And I, John, who have heard and seen these things. And after I had heard and seen, I fell down to adore before the feet of the angel, who showed me these things."

"Well, your reverence," said Pat, "is not that the very thing that is in the catechism?" and Pat looked as if he thought, now, that Mr. Owens was only imposing on them, when he told them there was nothing in the Bible for worshipping angels, and that maybe the priests had the Bible on their side after all.

"And what do you say?" said Mr. Owens turning to Jem.

"What can I say," said Jem, "when St. John worshipped the angel."

"Read the next verse," said Mr. Owens to Pat.

So Pat read—"And he said unto me, SEE THOU DO IT NOT, for I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them that keep the words of the prophecy of this book. ADORE GOD."

"You see now," said Mr. Owens, "when St. John went to worship the angel, the angel warned him not to do such a thing, and told him to worship God."

"Well," said Jem, "if that does not beat all! Now I know what I wanted."

"What is that?" said Mr. Owens.

"That there is nothing in the Bible for worshipping angels," said Jem; "for sure if there was any proof at all of it there, they would not have to go in such a bare-faced like way to take a proof out of the very place that bids us not do it."

"That is enough for me, too," says Pat; "it's surely not in the Bible."

"One word more," said Mr. Owens. "You see in the note in the Douay Bible, on chap. 19, v. 10, it says, that maybe the angel only said it out of modesty, on account of the dignity of St. John as Apostle. That may lead you to think that though the angel was ashamed to let an apostle worship him, yet he would have let you or me adore him easy enough. So now, Pat, look back to the last verse you read, and see why the angel would not let St. John worship him."

"Because he was his fellow-servant, your reverence," said Pat.

"And is the angel fellow-servant to any one else?" said Mr. Owens.

"To all them that keep the words of the prophecy of this book," said Pat.

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "you see that if we keep the words of this prophecy, we, too, are forbidden to worship the angel, by the very same reason. And mark this, too," said Mr. Owens; "the question in Dr. Doyle's catechism is about worshipping SAINTS as well as angels; but the answer offers no proof for praying to saints, not even so bad a one as it gives for angels; so you may well think there is nothing in the Bible for worshipping saints."

"Well, your reverence," said Pat, "we have got what we wanted this night anyway."

And so they were going away, but Jem stopped. "Your reverence," said he, "if the blessed Apostle was going to do what was wrong, why was that put in the Bible?"

"To show us," said Mr. Owens, "how great the temptation is to worship other beings beside God; and to show us what need all men have to watch against a sin that even an apostle might fall into, if he was not warned; and to show us, too, that we might not follow even an apostle against the words of Christ—'The Lord thy God shalt thou adore, and him only shalt thou serve.'"

"I see now, your reverence," said Jem; "and I see it's no use to pray to angels, when the angel knows his duty better than to take our prayers. Sure enough we must worship God only."

"And remember, too," said Mr. Owens, "that if we want to be heard, we are to pray in the name of Jesus Christ, and trusting to him as our mediator, and then we have his promise to hear us."

SHALL ROME HAVE THE EXCLUSIVE CONTROL OF EDUCATION?

In a former number of this publication we put to Roman Catholic laymen the important question, whether it was for the advantage of this country, morally and politically, that the Romish priesthood should obtain the exclusive control over the education of the laity. We endeavoured to point out to them that the answer to that question should be determined by the actual results which had followed from their success in securing this great object of their policy in other countries; and we cited the example of Italy to show that there, at least, degradation, moral and political, had resulted from their success. The argument, however, which we then urged must, to a great degree, depend, not on the example of one nation or one country, but on the uniformity of results that have flowed from the same causes; and the country to which we would next call our readers' attention is Spain.

Among all the great nations of Europe, there is not one in which the domination and control of the Romish priesthood has been carried to such an height of power and exclusiveness as in Spain. The birth-place of Dominick and Ignatius Loyola, of Francis Xavier, and Alphonsus Liguori, the four most memorable saints canonized by Rome in modern times, her rulers influenced by their spirit, were ever ready to compel submission to Rome by the power of the sword. From her ports issued forth the invincible Armada that was to destroy heresy in England, and her armies were arrayed by the side of the forces of the League, to crush the Huguenots in France. For the education and instruction of the Spanish people in the dogmas of Rome, an ecclesiastical establishment had been created and endowed, which numbered in its ranks at least one-thirtieth of the whole population of the country; and the teaching and control of this vast army of ecclesiastics was enforced by the dungeons and autos da fe of the terrible Inquisition. No book unsanctioned by that tribunal could circulate in Spain; and so jealous was it of the slightest contamination of heresy, that even the epithet of "learned," applied to a heretic author, by the most orthodox of their own writers, was rigorously expunged, lest it should be supposed that any heretic was rightly called so. In Spain, then, at least, the Roman Catholic Church had full and complete sway over the national mind; and if her teaching does, indeed, produce as its fruit that righteousness which the inspired wisdom of Solomon tells us exalteth a nation, what country in Europe—what nation in the world—should have attained the same height of moral and political grandeur, and retained it, as long as the Spanish monarchy?

In contrasting the past and present condition of the Spanish monarchy, we will avail ourselves of the eloquent description given by Mr. Macaulay, in one of his brilliant essays. After describing the vast extent and power of the Spanish empire in the sixteenth century, when the Spanish monarch ruled over the whole Peninsula, over Naples and Sicily, over Holland, Flanders, and Franche Comte, and when a boundless empire in America poured its treasures into her bosom, and every neighbouring nation trembled for its independence, he thus proceeds:—"The ascendancy which Spain then had in Europe was, in one sense, well deserved. It was an ascendancy which had been gained by unquestioned superiority in all the arts of policy and war. In the sixteenth century, Italy was not more decidedly the land of the fine arts, Germany was not more decidedly the land of bold theological speculation, than Spain was the land of statesmen and of soldiers. The character which Virgil has ascribed to his countrymen might have been claimed by the grave and haughty chiefs who surrounded the throne of Ferdinand the Catholic, and of his immediate successors. That majestic art 'regere imperio populos,' was not better understood by the Romans, in the proudest days of their republic, than by Gonsalvo and Ximenes, Cortes and Alva. The skill of the Spanish diplomatists was renowned throughout Europe. The sovereign nation was unrivalled both in regular and irregular warfare. The impetuous chivalry of France, the serried phalanx of Switzerland, were alike found wanting when brought face to face with the Spanish infantry. In the wars of the New World, where something different than ordinary strategy was required in the general, and something different from ordinary discipline in the soldiers—when it was every day necessary to meet, by some new expedient, the varying tactics of a barbarous enemy, the Spanish adventurers, sprung from the common people, displayed a fertility of resource, and a talent for negociation and command, to which history scarcely affords a parallel."

Such was the eminence attained in the arts of war and government by the Spaniards of that age; nor were they wanting in the liberal arts and sciences. Prescott, in his history of that period, observes:—

"The Castilian scholars of that age may take rank with their illustrious contemporaries of Italy. They could not, indeed, achieve such brilliant result in the discovery of the remains of antiquity, for such remains had been long scattered and lost amid the centuries of exile and disastrous warfare consequent on the Saracen invasion. But they were unwearied in their illustrations, both oral and written, of the ancient authors; and their numerous annotations, translations, dictionaries, grammars, and various works of criticism, many of which, though now obsolete, passed into repeated editions in their own days, bear ample testimony to the generous zeal with which they conspired to raise their contemporaries to a proper level for contemplating the works of the great masters of antiquity, and well entitled them to the high eulogium of Erasmus, that 'liberal studies were brought, in the course of a few years in Spain, to so flourishing a condition as might not only excite the admiration, but serve as a model to the most celebrated nations of Europe." The Spanish universities were the theatre on which this classical erudition was more specially displayed. Academies of repute were to be found in Seville, Toledo, Salamanca, and Alcala, and learned teachers were drawn from abroad by the most liberal emoluments. At the head of those establishments stood the illustrious city of Salamanca. Such was its repute, that foreigners as well as natives, were attracted to its schools, and at one time 7,000 students were assembled within its walls. Nor was this devotion to literature confined to the pursuits of classical literature; the same historian adds:—"A similar impulse was felt in the other walks of knowledge. Jurisprudence assumed a new aspect under the learned labours of Montalvo. The mathematics formed a principal branch of education, and were successfully applied to astronomy and geography. Valuable treatises were produced on medicine, and on the more familiar practical arts, as husbandry, for example. History, which, since the time of Alphonsus X., had been held in high honour and more widely cultivated in Castile than in any other European state, began to lay aside the garb of chronicle, and to be studied on more scientific principles." Nor did this literary ardour and progress fail in producing the more permanent works of genius. Soon appeared that wonderful work of genius that has made the name of Cervantes and the achievements of Don Quixote familiar to every nation in Europe. Then, too, Calderon almost rivalled in fertility of intellect our own immortal Shakspeare. To these might be added a host of other names which rendered the Spanish literature of that day a worthy rival of that contemporaneous literature of England, which boasted the great names of Shakspeare and Spenser, of Bacon and Raleigh. But while the English literature of the Elizabethan era was but the glorious dawn of that bright day of literature and science of which we have not yet seen the close, the Spanish literature of the same period was only a meteor light which shot up brightly, indeed, at first, but having long since passed away, has only made the succeeding darkness more gloomy and intense. For two centuries Spain has not produced a single name eminent in literature or science. Alone, of all the nations composing the great European confederacy, Spain has sent no contribution to the numerous and various discoveries of modern times. The names of Newton, Laplace, Liebnitz, Tycho Brache, Kepler, and Gassendi, show that science has had its votaries in every part of Europe, except the Spanish peninsula. To the Spanish mind the discoveries of Newton brought no light; for they were the discoveries of an heretic, and therefore could not enlighten an orthodox son of the Roman Church. Those universities which the piety and liberality of Isabella founded or enlarged, have all disappeared, save Salamanca; and that celebrated seat of learning, like Spain herself, exhibits only the melancholy decay which has come over all Spanish greatness. A modern traveller, speaking of it, says—"The days of its collegiate glory are long since past by, never to return. Its walls are now silent, and grass is growing in its courts, which were once daily thronged by at least 8,000 students—a number to which, at the present day, the population does not amount."

Nor has it been only on the literature of Spain that blight and decay have fallen. Where is now the mighty empire, on whose vast possessions the sun never set, and at whose greatness the other nations trembled? The sixteenth century saw Holland revolted and independent. The middle of the seventeenth century saw Portugal assert its independence; whilst Flanders and Franche Comte were wrested from the Spanish crown, to increase the strength of France. The close of the same century saw the whole of the Spanish monarchy pass under the dominion of the grandson of Louis XIV.; and for the next century, Spain was but an humble satellite, following, in peace and war, the politics of the French court. One-half of the nineteenth century has now passed. It has seen Spain rescued from French invasion by the bayonets of an heretic army. It has seen almost the whole of the vast empire in America throw off their allegiance to the mother country, and establish independent republics. Whilst Spain itself, for the last twenty years, has been the prey of anarchy and civil war, to be succeeded only by the domination of a successful military adventurer. No wonder, then, that all modern travellers unite in mourning over the sad lot of Spain. Struck, as they all are, with the wonderful advantages of a country intersected by great rivers, defended by noble mountains, rich with the most productive mines; having ports looking on every sea, and blessed with a climate fitted for every production—advantages which had made it, when under the dominion of the Romans and the Moors, a garden of plenty and delight—when they see the picture of neglect and desolation—moral and physical—which the greater part of the Peninsula presents, the face of nature, and the mind of man dwarfed and curtailed of their fair proportions; their inherent fertility allowed to run into vice and luxuriant weeds; the energies of her people misdirected; their capabilities for all good converted into elements powerful only for evil—no wonder they should mourn and lament over the change that has come over the fair vision, and abhor and denounce the blighting superstition which, for centuries, has placed the ban of its curse on all knowledge and all learning, which did not pander to its exclusiveness. Yes, to preserve to Spain an exclusively Roman Catholic population, to have none but Roman Catholic judges, and a Roman Catholic army; to permit access to no literature except Roman Catholic literature, was the grand object of political wisdom in Spain. Philip II. declared that he would rather lose all his dominions than be the sovereign of a single heretic. For this the Jews were banished, the Moors were expelled, and the Protestant heretics of Holland driven into a successful rebellion. In truth, Spain affords the most striking example of the effects which this system will produce, when it is pursued consistently through all its practical consequences to inquisitions and acts of faith. The progress of all nations necessarily depends upon activity of mind, and upon the advancement of knowledge. The arts of navigation and war, the results of the most profound and sublime searches of science, can never long flourish when knowledge is not ardently and boldly cultivated by many minds. A priesthood who claim exclusive control over the education of the laity, soon usurp a jurisdiction over sciences the most remote from their own peculiar province, and forbid their cultivation.

It is no wonder that no mathematician should have arisen in Spain, after the fate which Galileo experienced from the Inquisition in Italy. Spain had not, and still wants engineers, because she had no mathematician; and she had no mathematician because she had an Inquisition. She could not profit by the discoveries of foreign nations in the arts and sciences, because the Inquisition and Index Expurgatorius excluded all literature that did not recognise the infallible right of Rome and her priests to dogmatize on all branches of human learning and knowledge.

The void created by the expulsion of the Jews and the Moriscoes might have been supplied by the natural progress of population; but what could revive the spirit, the curiosity, the sense of security, the ardour of mental enterprise, which had been extinguished by the example of their expulsion? To give the Church of Spain and its priests entire and complete control, the mind of the people was emasculated; and the government which, at their instance, made the exercise of the understanding penal, soon found itself without statesmen, without officers, and without seamen, and fell into that state of wretched debility which is but a just retribution for its cowardly intolerance.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE TRIAL OF SIGNOR AMEDEO BERT, VAUDOIS PASTOR OF TURIN.

[Translated from the original Italian.]

He was summoned by the editor of a paper called the Ultramontana (which is considered to be the organ of the Jesuits), on account of an article he had written in another paper, answering a calumnious attack upon the Protestant faith.

On Saturday (10th July, 1852), I was conducted to the Audience-hall of the tribunal, and made to seat myself on a bench which had been occupied a few minutes before by five or six felons, who had received condemnation, and were led away by the carbineers as I entered. I remained for five hours, upon this seat of the guilty.

My article was immediately read aloud, in which, after giving a sketch of the Lutheran reformation, I said—

"From that epoch the Protestant worship was received by many people who were wearied with the ceremonial and spiritual yoke of Roman Catholicism, and eager for a religion not of human policy or corrupt and false doctrine, but of the pure and divine religion of the Gospel. Hence it is that millions of Protestants are found in the world—and with them progress and civilization in the highest degree. And the reformation of the sixteenth century would certainly have made still further conquests (since its object was only to free men from the yoke of superstition, and to conduct them to religious liberty), but for the obstacles of imperial absolutism, the Inquisition, and the order of Jesuits. So powerful were these obstacles that, after the first part of that century in which so many abandoned Romanism, the religious movement stopped, and, except a few individual conversions, Rome retained all the nations which had not already deserted her. The number of Protestants did not materially increase. The truth, therefore, did not make progress, nor did liberty and civilization; for political institutions cannot improve, in any important degree, till both the people and their rulers understand their true interests—till, in short, the principle is everywhere recognised that religion is a thing of conscience, and not to be interfered with by governors, except so far as to preserve public order.

"We must confess, however, that the ignorance and coarse-mindedness of the people in general serve to instigate their spiritual rulers to keep them in religious slavery, so that they—innocent and imbecile instruments of the pride, avarice, and other passions of those rulers—bind chains round themselves, and, instead of seeking to enjoy the inestimable blessings of religious liberty, and a faith of their own, they prefer believing without reflection whatever they are told.

"It is also true that, in the present state of Europe, many nations are (apparently) unable to do without a religion of pomp and ceremonies, and that, according to the opinion of many, if they should lose such a religion, they would fall into infidelity, being unfit to raise themselves to a purer and more spiritual faith.

"But have Protestants a different disposition from Roman Catholics? Are not all men brethren? Was not the Gospel, in its most spiritual form, adapted in the earlier ages to both east and west? Surely, then, what is good for one nation is good for another. Therefore, the spiritual Christianity which Protestants now profess may become the religion of the Italians, since they have no less natural inclination for the truth than any other nation. The Gospel is Catholic, is universal: let it then be Catholic for all people."

This extract finished, the criminal counsel accused me—

1st. Of having excited contempt for the religion of the State, by saying "that the people were wearied with the ceremonial and spiritual yoke of Roman Catholicism, and eager for a religion not of human policy, and corrupt and false doctrines."

2ndly. Of having said "that the Roman Catholic religion was opposed to civilization, saying that in the present state of Europe," &c.

3rdly. Of having proclaimed it "a religion of ignorance," saying that "a spiritual Christianity might become the religion of the Italians."

Having made numerous digressions upon the lights and influence of Catholicism, and the respect due to it, he concluded by urging that I should be condemned to two months' imprisonment, and a fine of four hundred livres. The President then asked if I had anything to say in my defence.

I rose and said—That I had chosen an advocate to defend me legally; I had, therefore, nothing to say, except that I had been aimed at by the ultra-Catholic journals, in the falsest accusations, which pointed me out as a rationalist, a man without religion, &c.; so that it might well be said—"If such be the shepherd, what must be the sheep?" That I paid no attention to all this as long as I was alone in the cause, knowing that a public man cannot satisfy all, and that his duty is simply to continue in the way of conscience and loyalty. But when his religion is attacked—when the morality of his flock is called in question—then he ought no longer to be silent; silence becomes a crime. Wherefore, after six or seven months of abuse and vituperation against us, I took my pen to enlighten the public, whose business it was to pronounce judgment. One thing was certain, that as soon as the Vaudois were authorised by the government to erect their church in Turin, a torrent of insult and calumny was poured forth against them by the journals of the ultra-Romanists, and that I was bound to reply, not with a view of irritating them, or throwing contempt on their religion, but merely to neutralize the injurious effect which might result from so much abuse of us. We, the Waldenses, were citizens of the State; our worship was not only tolerated but protected, and we had a right to be respected.

For the rest, I was, indeed, convinced of the truth of my religion, but without intolerance; my writings and sermons, and even the accused article, breathed a spirit of charity, and recommended Christians, of various persuasions, to have no strife but in love, knowledge, and good works. That I did not believe that any magistrate could really condemn me; but I was ready to submit respectfully to any penalty it might be thought needful to inflict, for as the Waldense ministers are bound to preach obedience to the law, so they ought to set the example of it; and if they have transgressed, it is just they should be punished.

The Advocate Jecchio, minister of public works, and my counsel, now spoke:—

He observed—First, that the Waldenses have a right to a church in Turin for public worship, which had been authorized by the ministry alone, without a meeting of the Chambers. That, if public worship is sanctioned, it follows that it is both a right and a duty for the pastors to spread their faith both orally and in writings, and to combat contrary opinions; this does not involve a scandal against the State religion. That no attack against it had been made by Signor Bert, and nothing even said which could be subversive of the decisions of the Council of Trent.

That, on the other hand, the Romanist journals had put forth the most scurrilous abuse of Protestantism, and it was the duty of Signor Bert, both as a Protestant and as a pastor, to repel attacks which came even from the bishops of the State.

He then proceeded to read some extracts from the journals in question:—

The Armonia journal expressed itself thus, in the number for the 22nd of August, 1851:—

"The Protestants, then, will have their temple at Turin, and there all that is perverted in the capital will congregate, to hear preaching in which will be propounded all that is most poisonous against Catholicism."

"What is the Protestant religion but the fruit of northern sophisms, the worship of audacity and lasciviousness, which spring up amongst the Germans?"

"A Protestant temple at Turin: this is to call the stranger amongst us—to call down the refuse and scandal of Germany; it is to throw open our State to barbarian and intolerant sects, to degrade the dynasty of Savoy, whose highest merit it is to have combatted these barbarian and ruinous doctrines. It is, in short, an insult to our statutes, to Italy, to our King."

In the number for the 28th of February, 1852, are found these expressions:—

"The Protestant religion only aims to persecute and kill whatever does not follow it. If any Protestant is merciful, this is not the fruit of Protestant doctrines, but of a mind naturally disposed to good, and formed by study and education; or, more frequently, it is the result of fear; they dare not put forth in all their fulness the doctrines which are brooding in their hearts, until they feel themselves strong enough to defend by force of arms what their pen expresses."

Nearly at the same time the Echo of Mont Blanc expresses itself as follows:—

"The erection of a Waldense Church, at Turin, is an intrigue prepared, not with the view of raising up a place of prayer and religious instruction, but to create a focus for disorder and demoralization."

"The only dogma of the Protestants is, to kill the Pope and the King."

"The Piedmontese people do not deserve such an insult as that of allowing Protestantism to exist at their side." "Wherever it (Protestantism) penetrates, all it does is to spread ruin and bloodshed over the country." "To admit Protestantism is to approve the preaching of every kind of folly, disgraceful wickedness, and monstrosity."

The Catholico of Genoa says, amongst other things, that

"The government, in authorizing the erection of the Waldense temple at Turin, contaminated the capital with that abominable opprobrious worship."

And, finally, passing over much more abuse and continued revilings, this is the manner in which the Lord Bishops of the State, in their protest to his Majesty against the erection of the new temple at Turin, have expressed themselves on the subject of the Waldense religion—

"Vanity, ignorance, love of novelty, and immorality, have availed themselves of the erection of the temple to scandalize good Catholics, to spread everywhere indifference on religious matters, and conduct the people by little and little to Atheism, the final, necessary, and fatal consequence of the spirit and mind of Protestantism."

The Advocate then proceeded to observe that M. Bert, in the accused article, had, indeed, narrated the corruption, the ignorance, and the abuses of the Romish religion, and especially in the times of Luther, on the occasion of the sale of indulgences; but these are things of public notoriety, and Signor Bert was not guilty in saying what every one knows. Not that the Christian religion—the infallible Word of God—can itself be corrupted; but fallible men ruin and corrupt, in their speeches and writings, even the religion of the Lord.

That, finally, Signor Bert is well known for his moderation and tolerance—which is shown even in the article in question. He then demanded that I should be acquitted free of all cost; but the tribunal, before deciding on my case, determined to consider the cause of the editor of the journal, who had inserted an article in the same number of the "Progresso," written by a so-called Ugo Belfiore, on Roman Catholic prayers, images, and worship of the saints; for which he, like me, was prosecuted.

In fact, this Ugo Belfiore (an Italian and Roman Catholic emigrant) had unmasked, with much spirit, first, the absurdity of prayer in a language not understood by the people; secondly, the impiety of worshipping the saints, which is only the old Pagan folly restored, under another name, in Romanism; thirdly and finally, the gross superstition with which God is represented by images, while a worship is paid to the images themselves, as if there was something Divine and adorable in them.

The counsel for the editor then proceeded to speak. He first dwelt on the injustice of having waited eight months before proceeding to the public prosecution of the two cases; for such productions are good or bad according to the tide of public opinion at the moment. These two articles, which might be acquitted eight months ago, because they were conformable to the then state of public opinion, might now be condemned, merely because that public opinion had somewhat changed.

Secondly, For the rest, nothing had been written inconsistent with the respect due to the State religion; for even the Council of Trent had declared that the Church might substitute the vulgar tongue for Latin in prayers and preaching, if it seemed to her a good and desirable thing.

Thirdly, As to the worship of saints, the Council of Trent willed that men should have recourse directly to God, in the name of Jesus Christ, as a just and Christian practice; for God is not like the princes of this world, who have representatives through whom access to them is obtained. Many abuses on this point prevailed, and Belfiore had pointed out some of them; but the Council of Trent had exhorted men to destroy abuses, and had also commanded that no images should be made of the Most High, and no superstitious veneration paid to any, as if they had any virtue in themselves. Belfiore was, then, in accordance with the real desire of the Church of Rome.

The counsel then demanded, as Jecchio had done, that his client should be acquitted.

At the end of half an hour, the following sentence was pronounced by the tribunal:—

"Whereas, though in the article, entitled 'Is the new Waldense Temple a School of Immorality?' some strong expressions may be found, it appears that the author was excited to them by the outrages poured forth by the press against the Protestant religion—of which he is the pastor—in this capital; but no expressions can be found which contain any direct or indirect attack on the religion of the State; and with regard to the article, entitled 'Prayer according to the Romish Church,' although it is innocent of the imputed crime (of aggression against the State religion), still the offensive comparison between our religion and that of the pagans, and the degrading remarks on some of the saints, are likely to occasion scandal,

"Therefore, the Pastor Amadeo Bert and the Editor (the Advocate Grassi) are declared not guilty of the imputed scandal, and acquitted, free of cost; but the editor (in consideration of the offensive words in the said article [Belfiore's]) is condemned to five days' arrest and fifty-one lire fine."

I consider that the cause of liberty of conscience has thus gained an important victory. If we had written these articles in Naples, Rome, or Tuscany, we should have been sent to the galleys. . . . . The five hours I spent at the bar of the accused were, for me, five hours of real happiness. I thank the Lord for it, with all my heart; and hope I may ever be enabled to defend our cause, in Piedmont, with moderation, truthfulness, and freedom, and be ready to suffer any penalty, if I can but be favoured to promote, more and more, the sacred cause of civilization through the Gospel.

THE ELECTIONS—A DIALOGUE.

John.—Tom, did you give your vote for Father M—— at the election?

Tom.—I don't quite understand what you mean, John; surely the priest did not stand for the county?

John.—No, Tom, I did not mean that; but did you not hear that Father M—— told us all, the Sunday before the election, that we were to vote for him, and for God, and for our holy religion; and that if we did not, we should be despised and shunned in this world, and eternally miserable in the next? and said that he would not give the rites of the Church, when they were dying, to any that voted against his man; and, after mass, he said—Let those that intend to vote for ——— and heaven, go to the right, and those that are going to vote for ——— and hell, go to the left; and afterwards sent men round to all the boys' houses, to tell us not to dare to vote for any one but Mr. ———; and the men told us that we might look sharp if we voted any way but the way he wished; for, if we did, we had better not show our faces in the market at C——, and, coming winter, perhaps, our corn and hay would be burned, and, maybe, our houses too; and you know they smashed the windows of two or three that they were in doubt of, by way of earnest as to what they would get. You were a bold man, if you set Father M—— at defiance after such warnings as them!

Tom.—And yet, John, they call this freedom of election and independence of votera. Did you see the address that the priest's man stuck up on the chapel gate? What was the heading of it?

John.—Why, I think it was—"To the Independent Electors," &c.

Tom.—Just so. But it is a queer kind of independence, to have our windows smashed, our stacks set on fire, afeard to show our face in the markets or fairs, hunted in this world, and damned in the next, unless we do as the priest orders; you don't call this freedom and independence, do you, John?

John.—Why, not exactly; but, then, surely the priest must know who is the best man.

Tom.—Why must he? What is the use of parliament giving us a right to vote, if we dare not give it to whom we like? The parliament had better at once have given all the poor people's votes to the priest, if they can ruin a man in this world and send his soul to hell in the next, for exercising his right to vote as he wishes himself.

John.—Well, Tom, there seems some truth in what you say; it does seem very strange that a man should be damned for voting for this man or that.

Tom.—Why, John, to tell the truth, my notion is, that these so-called liberal men are always the greatest tyrants. The priests get men returned that will play their game. It's little such priests care about the souls of their flocks, as they call them, or about their religion either, I'm thinking; it is their own interests they look to; they make the members that they have sent to parliament vote as they please; I hear tell that they are called the Pope's Band, or Priests' Brigade—they get acts passed which seem to give power to us, poor people, but it is because they think that they can drive us like a flock of sheep to the hustings to vote as they please.

John.—Well, Tom, there's no denying what you say. Very little, I believe, they do care for us, except for what they make by us; but what can we do? We never could stand the country, if we went against them; they would make it too hot for us.

Tom.—That wouldn't be, John, if every one had the courage to give the priest his mind, the way Ned C—— did. Do you remember what Ned C—— said when the priest told him he must vote for his candidate?

John.—I do, well. He said he would vote for whom he pleased, that the law gave him his vote to use as he liked, and that if his reverence would mind his religion more, and politics less, it would be better for himself and the country.

Tom.—And what did the priest say?

John.—What could he say, when it was the truth? He turned it off and said that it was his religion that he was asking the vote for; and seeing he could get no good of Ned, he went off to bully some one else.

Tom.—Now, John, let me ask you this question, What is the charge that the priest brings so often against the Protestant religion?

John.—That it depends on Acts of Parliament; or, as he says, it is "the Parliament religion."

Tom.—Well, now, and what does our own depend upon? If you do not vote so as to get a man in, that you do not know, and don't care for, you are to be ruined in this world, and damned in the next; is this religion? Do you call it religion, to make the eternal salvation of a man's soul depend upon giving a vote this way or that? Do not let us talk about the Protestant religion depending upon acts of parliament. No Protestant minister ever said that a man would be damned if he gave his vote to this man or that. Now, John, you have told me what the priest said at the chapel: you have told me that he said that our religion depended upon members of parliament; that men should have their houses in flames in this world and their souls in flames in the next, if they did not vote with him; now, let me tell you what the Scripture reader said to me the other day. We talk very friendly together, though I call myself a Catholic. I said to him—Well, Mr. ——, how will the election go? Well, Tom, he replied, I hardly know; I hope, however, that our Heavenly Father will so order things that peace may be preserved, and that such measures may be passed as will insure the happiness and welfare of our country; my prayer is—"That God may so order the course of this world by his governance, that his Church and people may be able to serve him in all godly quietness."

"Why," said I, "you seem to care very little about the election."

"No, Tom, you are mistaken," says he, "I care about everything that may bring happiness or misery to our country; and I hope the providence of God may so order it, that those who are sent to parliament may legislate for the honour and happiness of our Sovereign and our country."

"I wish, Mr. ——," said I, "that our priest took things as quietly; he says that our religion depends upon the election and the parliament."

At that he smiled and said—"And I begin to think he's right, Tom. The religion of the Church of Rome is the religion 'of this world.'—John xviii. 36. It seems it must be maintained by violence, falsehood, fire, and sword. The priests feel this, and therefore they are stirring themselves so in this election. The weapons of the Church of Rome seem to be curses, threats, sticks, and stones. The weapons of our religion are the truths, and arguments of Scripture.—2 Cor. x. 4. Our religion—that is, the religion of the Gospel—is not 'of this world.' It does not depend upon such things as an election. It does not depend upon Acts of Parliament. It depends upon the Gospel of Christ, and therefore we can afford to be more quiet on such occasions. But as you have said so much of the election that the priests are so violent about, I will tell you of one kind of election that I feel very anxious about. The election which the priest seeks to carry will soon be over, and priests, candidates, and voters will soon be removed to another world, to give an account of all they have done in this. But the election which I am so anxious about, is one which our religion does really depend upon."

"Pray, Mr. ——," said I, "what election is that?"

"It is, Tom, the 'election of God.' God sent his only beloved Son into the world that men might be saved; my business is to proclaim this blessed truth, to persuade men to embrace the Gospel. I cannot make them do so—that is out of my power—God alone can do that; God, the Holy Ghost, can alone lead men's hearts to embrace the Gospel. 'No man can come to the Son except the Father draw him.'—John vi. 44. To elect is to choose, and the Father hath chosen those whom he leads by his Spirit to believe on his beloved Son, that they may be saved. This is the election on which real happiness in this world and in the next depends. My business is to try and persuade men to embrace the offer of God's mercy in Christ. If I succeed in this, and that I see them living by the rule of the Gospel, loving God and man—'bringing forth the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God'—then I hope I have evidence that God hath chosen them unto eternal life. When I see a man giving evidence of a 'work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God and our Father' (1 Thess. i. 3-4), then I can say, as St. Paul does, that 'I know his election of God,' because the Gospel has come to such 'not in word only but in power, and in the Holy Ghost.' This, Tom, is the election that I feel interested about. Have you any interest in this election?"

"I do not know, sir," said I; "I never so much as heard of it before. It is little that the priests care about this sort of election; but I see it's more concern to us than elections for the county."

"Yes, Tom, it is of very great importance," said he. "It is all very well to revile the Protestant religion; but I would ask you as a sensible man, to tell me, which religion seems to you to be most according to truth, and most agreeable to the character of a Holy God? The religion which is dependant upon a vote for a member of Parliament; the religion that would send a man to hell if he did not vote as his priests wished; or the religion which, while it would thankfully accept the outward peace which good government gives, declares that its business is to lead souls to God, to fit them for heaven, and to labour to produce in them that faith and those good works which give good evidence that they have the 'election of God.' Which election do you think concerns the honour of Christ and the safety of our souls the most—the election for the county or the election of God? And which do you find the priests of the Church of Rome most anxious about?"

Mr. —— and I then parted; but, to tell you the truth, John, I could not get what he said out of my head. I think there is a deal in it, and don't know what to think of our religion. There is so much violence, lying, threatening, and cursing, that it does not seem like the religion of the Lord Jesus, which proclaimed—"Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will towards men." I really do not know what to think; what do you say, John?

John.—Why, Tom, I say nothing, but I have my thoughts about it as well as you; and so they parted.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received Mr. Aylmer's letter, which shall be inserted in our next.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville st.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name ond address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith.

Subscriptions are earnestly solicited, which our friends will observe are payable in advance. The amount may be forwarded either in postage stamps or a Post-office order, payable to Mr. Wm. Curry, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, AUGUST, 1852.

THE IRISH ELECTIONS.

IT is not our habit to engage in party politics, and it is not our intention to do so now. Advocates as we are of civil and religious liberty in the truest sense, we disclaim all desire to influence other men's actions, except by setting before them principles which they themselves may think fit to govern their conduct.

We write of the late elections in Ireland, not for the purpose of personal or individual censure, but to induce our brother Catholic laymen calmly to consider the principles on which many of those elections have been conducted, and to judge for themselves whether those principles be suitable for a free state and a Christian people. It is the principles we seek to discuss, and we use the facts only to show what the principles are.

The most striking fact in the Irish elections has been the manner in which the Roman Catholic clergy have interposed to control the choice of the electors. We feel that little proof of the fact is required, as most of our readers must be well aware of it from their own observations.

The Roman Catholic clergy have claimed for themselves the right of choosing the representatives, wherever they had any chance of being able to effect it by any means.

It would be ridiculous to give long proofs of so notorious a fact; so we give but a few—"Meath, in her priesthood, sat in calm council, and selected as her representative," &c. (letter of the Rev. Mr. Kelsh, a priest in Meath—Tablet Newspaper, July 31). Here it was the priests only who met to choose the representative; and "Meath" is said to have made the choice, as if it were the exclusive right of the priests to act for Meath, the laity having nothing to do but to obey, and, therefore, not being consulted in the matter. And accordingly we find Mr. Lucas and Mr. Corbally both acknowledging the power by which they were returned in the following words:—

"For sending him (Mr. Lucas) to parliament, the bishop and clergy of Meath deserve and enjoy the gratitude of the Catholics of the empire."—Tablet, August 7.

"The number of votes recorded in his (Mr. Corbally's) favour amounted nearly to two thousand, and for those he was indebted to the bishop and the Catholic clergy. . . . . . If it had not been for the clergy HE WOULD HAVE BEEN BEATEN."—Speech at Meath election, Tablet, July 31.

Take again the great County of Tipperary:—

"It is well known that it is the priests of Tipperary, and the priests alone, who can and will gain a triumph over the enemies of freedom, in this great county, at the coming election."—Tablet.

And Archbishop M'Hale, at the Galway election, expressly recognises and approves of it—

"No doubt the clergy of Ireland are very much responsible for their share in the result of the contests now waging though the land."—Tablet, July 24.

The means taken to carry into effect such elections are equally notorious. The priests having made their choice, were prepared to maintain that their choice was the choice of God, and that it was an offence against God to vote against their men.

We give one or two instances at random of the manner in which the priests have used their spiritual powers to force their candidates on electors.

An influential priest at Tralee is reported to have said:—

"Let me suppose one of THESE WRETCHES (those who would not vote as he bid them) prostrated by sickness—suppose the hand of death heavy upon him, and a messenger come to me to attend him in his dying moments. If there were no other priest in the way I would be bound to go. I dare not refuse to attend. But I confess I would be sorry in my heart to be called on to attend the death-bed of such a being. . . . . I could have no hope of converting a heart so hardened, so lost to every sense of duty and religion, as to vote in support of those who would trample on the Lord of Hosts."

We have no doubt that Father M—— would attend, with the usual alacrity of a Christian minister, at the death of any person guilty of any other sin, and would not be without hope of converting him. Such dreadful sentences are reserved for political disobedience to the priests at elections.

In the town of Westport the following placard was carried in a procession at which many priests were present :—

"Whoever votes for a supporter of Lord Derby's government votes for the massacre of his countrymen, the violation of the house of God, AND THE POLLUTION OF THE BODY AND BLOOD OF HIS REDEEMER."

We should not quote such placards as the work of priests, were they not countenanced by the highest authority. At the Galway election Archbishop M'Hale spoke as follows :—

"If you wish that your chapels should be wrecked, that your priests should be flung into prison, that THE GOD OF HEAVEN, under the form of bread and wine, should be exposed to blasphemous insult, as he was on a late occasion, you will support Lord Derby's government."

Of course all this refers to the party fight at Stockport. Lord Derby is accused of getting up that fight. It is an old and a good rule, that when any persons are suspected of having wilfully contrived a wicked action, it should be considered who could profit by that act, and who has taken advantage of it. Those are the persons most likely to have instigated it ; and not the persons whose interests it was most likely to injure. Now, mark this ; scarcely a priest who spoke at the late elections but brought forward this party fight as the most effectual thing to support his cause. Not one supporter of Lord Derby's government did so. We challenge attention to this. Every one said that this occurrence was the most injurious thing that could have happened for Lord Derby—that it was just the thing to give a handle to his enemies, and to do him no good. By every rule of common sense, if any one was to be suspected of getting it up, or instigating it, it was those who have been so industrious in using it as their chief instrument in carrying out their views at the elections. For ourselves, we think the angry passions of ignorant men are the proper explanation of such scenes ; and we make no doubt that the guilty on both sides will be impartially punished by the law. In the meantime the occurrence has been made use of by the priests as a handle for putting forward all their spiritual power for controlling men's political conduct.

"For such a one and God ;" or, "for such another and the devil," were cries too well known at these elections to need our giving instances here. Nor can any one doubt by whom these cries were raised.

But it was not spiritual terrors alone which the priests sought to make use of. The priest above referred to also said, at Tralee—

"If there be a Catholic elector in this borough, who will dare to go forward and register his vote for the enemy, pass him by with scorn and contempt. Let him fester in his corruption. . . . . Assemble in a body to-morrow, go to those unfortunate wretches, and make them acquainted with the consequences of their guilt."

Our readers need not be told that the "consequences" which a Roman Catholic elector would be led to expect from a visit of an infuriated rabble, thus urged on by a priest, would be gross insult, personal danger, loss of business, or employment, or livelihood. An election mob is not sent to a man's dwelling to preach to him, but to put him in terror of his life and property. We might easily multiply instances of this, but let the following description of the duties of a priest at the elections suffice. It is taken from a letter published by Mr. Lucas in the Tablet, of July 10, page 437, column 3 ; and no one knows better the duties of a priest, on such occasions, than Mr. Lucas, the member for Meath :—

"The priest will have not only to exhort, and entreat, and COMMAND his people to vote for the POPULAR candidates, but he must bring the voters together, and go with them to the polling places, and watch over them at the tally-rooms like a sentinel (why not 'collar them like a bailiff?'). . . . . The priest must be THE CUTTER AGENT !!"

We should hardly believe this either if we did not find it in the Tablet. But without this they could not have succeeded.

Our readers are no doubt familiar with the odious cry of "Orange Catholic," which, in many places, has been set agoing by the priests themselves. It is no light thing in Ireland to be held up to the people as a traitor of the vilest description. Such a cry is more likely to put a man in fear of his life, than to convince his conscience.

On the means which have been thus used, we have but one observation to make here. If the priests believed that the Roman Catholic laity were really willing to be guided by them, the priests would never use such arguments as these. To those who were ready to be guided by priestly advice at elections, the priests would give advice only, and would give it in the most agreeable manner. When a priest uses spiritual terror to make electors vote as he wishes, that priest feels and knows that nothing less than spiritual terrors will make the elector vote in the way required. When the priest calls in the aid of a mob, and uses the fear of insult and ruin to make men vote as he wishes, then that priest knows that even his spiritual terrors will not be enough. Let those who have suffered under this treatment take comfort from this. Priests have used such weapons only from a despairing feeling of their own decaying influence and power. The extent to which the priests have used such weapons, shows how many of the Roman Catholic laity are ready to assert their political freedom. Such weapons may obtain a seeming victory for a time, but in reality they hasten the advance of freedom.

The extent to which the priests have endeavoured to be masters of this election, may be partly judged of from the number of cases in which priests have come forward on the hustings as proposers or seconders of candidates. The following list may give some idea of it :—

List of Roman Catholic Priests, proposers, seconders, or CANDIDATES (!) at the late elections.

Rev. John Falvey	... Cork City.

And that the highest sanction should not be wanting, Archbishop M'Hale himself proposed candidates at two county elections—Galway and Mayo. This list is taken from the Tablet newspaper. It is not complete, because in uncontested elections the proposers and seconders are often not recorded ; and in several such cases priests did probably come forward. Yet it shows forty-seven instances ; and if complete, the number would probably much exceed fifty. We believe this could not be paralleled in the history of any former election in Ireland. The number of priests who were speakers at election meetings is past calculation. In Meath, for instance, the priests seem to have been the only persons who had the privilege of speaking on such occasions. No respectable Roman Catholic in the county would do the work.

Of the exertions of the priests in the polling booths, on the roads, and in the streets, in forcibly dragging electors in the opposite direction to that in which they would have gone, if left to themselves, we need say nothing, as our readers must have seen it themselves.

Where such scenes did not take place at elections, the reason will be found rather in the circumstances of the place than in the character of the men. Whenever it could be attempted it has been attempted, and in every case to the full extent to which it could safely be carried ; wherever it was not tried, it was evidently impossible to try it. The writer of this has, with regret, seen those whom he was accustomed to look on as the most respectable members of the priesthood, taking as violent a part as the most violent.

The number of Englishmen whom the priests have returned for Ireland (and that too, in places where Irish Roman Catholics of distinguished sincerity and ability sought the representation), is a fact which should not be overlooked. Observe the following instance from the speech of Dr. Kieran, at the Dundalk election (Tablet, July 17, p. 463, col. 3) :—

"The very reverend gentleman then referred to the candidature of Mr. Gartlan upon whose talents and character he passed a high eulogy, and appealed to him to retire and make way for Mr. Bowyer."

And for what reason ?

"That gentleman," continued Dr. Kieran, "although an Englishman, had been recommended by the highest ecclesiastical authority in England and Ireland."

Meaning, of course, the English Cardinal Wiseman. This was the sole ground. Mr. Bowyer was first appointed member for Dundalk, by Cardinal Wiseman, and Mr. Gartlan, the Irish solicitor, who defended O'Connell in the state trials, although he had publicly pledged himself to go to the poll in spite of all opposition, dared not to do so before an Irish constituency, because the English Cardinal had forbidden it !!

We have often warned the laity that Drs. Cullen and Wiseman have instructions from the Pope to use every means to break down the spirit of Irish nationality, and bring it into total subjection to Rome ; and here we have a striking proof of the truth of our warning.

On the whole, who can fail to see that a desperate effort is being made, on the part of the priesthood, to choose the representation of Ireland themselves, and to leave nothing but obedience and submission to the laity ?

And for what purpose is this done ? Some men seek to be returned to parliament from mere vanity. It is not from this motive that the priests seek to return our members; they are too wise, and too well directed by their superiors, to pay such a price as this election has cost them for the mere vanity of showing their influence.

Only consider what it has cost them—in Meath, for instance. It is well known that the Roman Catholic Bishop of Meath, in speaking of the duty of electors, at a public dinner, in the town of Oldcastle, was told by a Roman Catholic gentleman, of station and influence, "that if that was the gospel that his lordship preached, the sooner they heard another gospel the better." And when that gentleman retired from the table, several others rose up, and followed him. It is well known that another Roman Catholic gentleman has said, that the expression "surpliced ruffians" was coming true! It is well known that, in the Chapel of Athboy, on Sunday, July 24th, when the priest preached on those who dared to vote for Grattan, five or six Roman Catholics, distinguished for their birth, their intelligence, or their influence, rose up, and left the chapel, and have said that they would not return to it. It is well known that all the influential Roman Catholics of Meath, and a great body of the middle class, are indignant and disgusted at the interference of the priests at that election.

This was too high a price to pay for mere vanity, and it was not for mere vanity that it was incurred. The state of Europe tells the object; the priesthood are everywhere grasping at political power, as their last resource. The Pope is kept upon his throne by foreign politics and foreign bayonets, and the Jesuits are everywhere striving for political power. It is so in Ireland, too. If the priesthood can return their own members, they become a political power in the country; and they feel that in their present critical position, the most desperate efforts must be made, the greatest dangers must be risked to accomplish this last hope against an impending fall.

This is the great fact of the Irish elections, and we ask "Catholic laymen" to consider the principle it involves.

On that night when our Blessed Lord was about to found his kingdom in his own blood, he had occasion to correct his apostles for coveting for themselves that kind of power which political rulers possess; and he said to them—"The kings of the Gentiles lord it over them; and they that have power over them are called beneficent, BUT YOU NOT SO."—Luke xxii. 25, Douay Bible. They were not to covet nor to possess the power of temporal or political rulers.

That same night when Pilate asked him about his kingdom, he answered—"My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world my servants would certainly strive, that I should not be delivered to the Jews, but now my kingdom is not from hence."—John xviii. 36. Political power is the power of the sword; because it rests upon the sword. In every country there are men who would overthrow the existing government of that country if they could, or if they dared. Any government that is not prepared to defend itself against such men by force will quickly perish. We happily do not see this so plain in England; but if we look over Europe, we see plainly that all political power depends on the sword for its support. But our Saviour says, there was to be nothing of the kind in his kingdom, because HIS KINGDOM IS NOT OF THIS WORLD. All political power exercised by Christ's ministers in that capacity, and by that title, is, therefore, at variance with the essential nature of Christ's kingdom upon earth.

We do not forget that clergymen are citizens too; and in that capacity may lawfully exercise their fair share of political power. Had the priests confined themselves to voting as electors—had they confined themselves to using such persuasion with other electors as their superior intelligence might give them, we should not have had one word to say against it. But when they claim to have a right in the character of priests of Christ, by that title and in that capacity, to overrule and govern the political conduct and political privileges of other men, then we say that, claiming to be priests of Christ, they are subverting the kingdom of Christ; they are confounding, and destroying, and denying its true and essential character; they are building up for themselves a kingdom of this world, which is not the kingdom of Christ; they thrust him from his kingly throne, to rule themselves in baser seats.

These directions of Christ concerning his kingdom may account for a fact which is proved by the experience of the world, however contrary it may be to any expectation which we might otherwise have formed—namely, that political power, in the hands of the ministers of Christ, has ever taken the form of the most oppressive and hopeless of human tyrannies. Men did, not unnaturally, expect that it would be otherwise. The world indulged a hope that they whose passions were regulated by a higher power, whose aims were directed to man's greatest good, whose minds were sanctified by a more immediate inspection of the Most High, would be more fit than any others to have the direction of this world, more likely to prove benefactors of mankind, than any others who could exercise authority upon them. And the expectation, perhaps, was natural. Yet it has ever been disappointed. We do not speak now only of the priests of Rome; we speak of the Primitive Church in its purest days, of the reformed Churches of all Protestant sects, heretical or not, and we affirm that the possession of political power, of the powers of this world, by any of them, has ever shown a constant tendency to degenerate rapidly into the worst form of tyranny.

We glory in the conviction that the Gospel has conferred the greatest political benefits on mankind. Even in our own days, we know that it has shown its mighty power in humanizing political institutions: it has abolished slavery in most Christian countries, and has well nigh abolished the slave trade from the face of the earth. But these things have ever been done when Christ's ministers assumed no political or earthly power to themselves.

Wherever they have sought to become what Christ warned them that they should not be—wherever they have attempted to turn his kingdom into a kingdom of this world—they have proved anything but benefactors to mankind.

We need look no farther for an instance than to Rome itself. There the experiment of Christ's ministers, assuming to themselves the temporal and political power, has had the fullest and the fairest trial, and the clearest result. The history of Rome, for centuries, has been, and now is at this day, one long-continued contest of tyranny on the one hand and rebellion on the other, which we ourselves have seen break out into the flames of civil war, and which we now see compressed by the most hateful tyranny that can oppress a nation—her own rulers supported by foreign bayonets, and resting upon them alone. But the Papal Government, being infallible, is beyond repentance; and instead of now providing a free government for her Roman subjects, is seeking to grasp in her own hand the political rule of all other countries; and hence the scenes that we have witnessed at our Irish elections.

There is no remedy for this, but that our countrymen should learn that Christ declared that his ministers should not be so—that his kingdom should not be of this world. Let us learn to believe in the kingdom of Christ, not merely as it shall be hereafter in the world to come, but as it now is in this present world. It is a kingdom that waxes strong, and confers blessings on man, by using no human powers, but trusting solely upon him who was its founder, and who alone can be its keeper and defence. But let it once stretch forth the arm of flesh for its own defence, and its inherent power is departed with its real character; then none but Christ himself can heal the wounds that arm of flesh inflicts; and we learn to curse the hand that dares to mix up what God has made distinct and separate.

In the spread of this true knowledge of the nature of Christ's kingdom upon earth, we place our only hope for the safety of our earthly kingdom. In proportion as the people learn this, the priests will have to acknowledge and submit to it in their conduct.

WE reprint the following able letter from the Meath Herald, as it seems to be written with a desire to avoid hurting the feelings of Roman Catholics, who are guiltless in the matter. We shall, of course, publish the answer when it appears.

TO THE RIGHT REVEREND DR. CANTWELL.

RIGHT REVEREND SIR—If a general election be often a time of passion and folly, it is often succeeded by a time of reflection and regret.

I have waited until the time of passion may be over, and the time of reflection come, to address you on an important question respecting the teaching of your church, that naturally arises out of the late election for Meath, and which now forces itself upon our notice.

It is not my intention to trouble you on the political view of the late election. Your own reflection, now that the heat of the contest is over, may lead you to doubt whether your victory be worth what it has cost.

It is true, the county of Meath is made for the present a close borough, to which you can nominate whom you please, however flagrantly your nominee may misrepresent the feelings of the county. Yet even such a power may be purchased too dearly.

If you reflect upon the feelings you have called forth in the minds of all the leading Roman Catholics of this county—Prestons, Barnwells, Husseys, Farrells, Cruises, Plunketts, Delanys, and a whole host of respectable Roman Catholic electors of the middle class—you may well say, "One more such victory, and I shall be undone!"

If you consider the lesson you have given to Protestants, that no services rendered to your church and cause can secure the gratitude of yourself and your clergy,

If you consider how you have divorced the cause of your church from all association with the names that shed a lustre upon Irish history,

If you consider what a wound you have inflicted upon the just national feelings of Irishmen in your election of a nominee to be forced upon this county,

If you consider the effect which the conduct of yourself and your brethren for the last two years has had upon English Roman Catholics, in making the Emancipation Act a nullity in England, Scotland, and Wales (from all which but one Roman Catholic has been returned), thus depriving them of their fair and just share in the representation of the country,

If, I say, you consider all this, in a time of solemn reflection, you may well doubt whether you have not paid too high a price for the privilege of returning, as member for Meath, a man who will be a mere cypher in parliament, powerless to redress the real grievances of the country, because no possible British minister will dare to accept his support—powerless to advance even the interests of your church, because his very presence in parliament will be the most fatal argument against it.

If you had witnessed the scenes that passed in Kells at this election—if you had seen the filthy and disgusting insults to which all respectable Roman Catholic voters were subjected—if you had seen the filthy treatment bestowed at his own door, on that Roman Catholic in Kells whose charity and exertions for our poor have been most admirable (Mr. Flood's political opinions and mine are sufficiently different to make this just testimony to his worth above all suspicion)—you would tremble to think how nearly the violation of political gratitude is connected with the extinction of all private gratitude, all social virtue, all sense of civil liberty, everything that makes a people worthy of respect or admiration.

If you had seen your priests, some acting as check clerks in public polling booths, some like constables or bailiffs in the streets, seizing by the collar Roman Catholic voters at the door of the tally-room which they wished to enter, and dragging them with violence through the street to the tally-room which they wished to avoid, you would tremble to think how you had lessened the respect of the people for a sacred character and calling.

Or if you could now hear how every respectable Roman Catholic in Kells expresses his deep disgust at such doings, and such scenes, you would fear lest this desperate effort to over-ride everything good and honourable in the feelings of your own people, may not prove the last fatal blow to your political power. Be assured, Right Reverend Sir, that multitudes are now inquiring whether religious liberty can be really supported by a system of civil tyranny in the hands of spiritual men; multitudes are now inquiring why politics should not be left to the laity; and many Roman Catholics are considering whether the clergy, of all persuasions, should not be restrained by law from taking part in elections, except only by giving their own votes. It is not for me to interfere with the consideration which Roman Catholics around me are giving to this subject, except by venturing to offer the willing consent and support of the clergy of my own Church to such a law, as it may apply to ourselves.

But the political view of this election is not the chief subject of my present address to you. I had no political interest in this election. I gave my vote, against my own political feelings, only to manifest my sympathy with those independent Roman Catholic electors whose conduct commands the sympathy and respect of all honourable men.

The question arising out of this election, on which I now require you either to speak or to be silent, is the teaching of your church upon political obligations—the teaching of your church upon solemn oaths—whether you use them as instruments of fraud, or as pledges of integrity! whether you teach men to violate them or to observe them!

It is a question which it behoves the people of this empire to understand; it is a question which must mainly influence the now wavering judgment of your own people upon the merits of the teaching of your church; it is a question upon which your speaking or your silence will be equally instructive.

Let me now show you how this question arises.

There was an electioneering meeting held in Kells, on Sunday, June 13, to give Mr. Lucas an opportunity of stating the principles on which he sought to be member for Meath.

Mr. Lucas was introduced to the meeting by the Rev. N. M'Evoy (your representative in Kells) as "the tried and trusted advocate of every principle dear to the hearts of the entire prelacy and priesthood of the land." If the keeping of oaths was a principle dear to the prelacy and priesthood, of course Mr. Lucas would be an advocate of that principle. Mr. M'Evoy said further—"Let them but send to parliament fifty or even forty members pledged to oppose any and every government that will not make tenant right and the abolition of the Church establishment cabinet questions."

When Mr. Lucas spoke, he said "the next thing Father M'Evoy drew my attention to is the subject of the Established Church * * * By the blessing of God in heaven, I will never rest nor cease my exertions, as long as I am in any position to exercise any public functions whatever, until that accursed monopoly, the Established Church, BE CUT DOWN BY THE ROOT." And how this was to be done he explains further on; when speaking still of the same subject he says—"We must try to put your discontent into the form of an ACT OF PARLIAMENT; at least, we will have a good fight for it."

There is no mistake, Sir, about this, for it was published by Mr. Lucas himself, in his own paper, the Tablet, of June 21st. And you will not deny that Mr. Lucas goes to parliament, as member for Meath, pledged to use his vote and influence, as a member of parliament, for the total overthrow of the Established Church; and that this is one of the chief grounds upon which you and your priests have returned him. Of course, sir, you read the Tablet, and so you were well aware of all this. Your priests were well aware of this too, for I believe more than twenty of them were present and heard it; and one of them, the Rev. Mr. Kelly, of Kilskire, in speaking after Mr. Lucas, said "he believed, in his inmost soul, in the sincerity of his (Mr. Lucas's) promises, and his ability to carry them out." You yourself wrote a letter to Mr. Lucas two days after that speech was delivered (which letter is also published in the Tablet of June 21), in which you thus state your directions to your priests, "after maturely weighing the talents, HONESTY, and efficacy of the various candidates, ... It is I conceive the duty of the clergy to explain their views to the electors of their respective parishes," &c., and you express your own "cordial concurrence" in their choice of Mr. Lucas. It is, therefore, clear that you and they have chosen Mr. Lucas as member for Meath upon this, as one of the chief grounds of your choice, that he is prepared to vote in parliament for an act for the total abolition of the Irish Church establishment, and for the confiscation of its property; and so far from denying this, you and others will perhaps wonder why I take so much pains to prove so plain a fact.

Now mark what follows; you send him to parliament, with the declared object of doing this.

What is the next step?

On the first day on which Mr. Lucas presents himself to sit in the House of Commons, he is to take the oath on condition of which the Emancipation Act admits Roman Catholics to parliament, of which the following is a part—

"I DO SWEAR that I will defend to the utmost of my power the settlement of property within this realm as established by the laws; and I do hereby DISCLAIM, DISAVOW, AND ABJURE any intention to subvert the present CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT as settled by law within this realm: and I do solemnly swear, that I never will exercise any privilege to which I am or may become entitled, to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion or Protestant government in the United Kingdom; and I DO SOLEMNLY, IN THE PRESENCE OF GOD, profess, testify, and declare, that I do make this declaration and every part thereof in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of this oath, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever; SO HELP ME GOD."

"By the blessing of God in heaven (says Mr. Lucas in Kells) I will never rest nor cease my exertions until the Established Church be cut down by the root, and we must put this in the form of an act of parliament."

"I do hereby disclaim, disavow, and ABJURE any intention to subvert the present Church establishment, as settled by law within this realm—SO HELP ME GOD." So SWEARS Mr. Lucas in parliament.

What follows next? Which is Mr. Lucas to keep—his promise to the priests in Meath, or his oath to God in parliament?

This, Right Reverend Sir, is the question which I put to you. Mr. Lucas's conscience is in the direction of you and your priests. You and your priests obtained this promise from him. You and your priests send him to parliament to take this oath. It rests with you, his spiritual guides, either to reconcile the promise and the oath, or to instruct him which he is to keep and which to violate.

What direction will you give him in the matter?

In a religious point of view the question you have to decide is no light one. "We who worship the one true and living God, to whom all things are known, who can neither deceive, nor be deceived; when we call HIM to witness the things which we assert or promise, with what zeal, with what religion, with what care ought we to look to it, that the oath which we give shall be holy and inviolable?" It is no light thing before God to make such an oath an instrument of fraud and deceit.

In a political point of view your decision on this question will also be of great importance; it is no light thing to disclose to your fellow-subjects in this empire, that no oath which you and your representatives can take can be any security for your good faith in what you swear.

You are also aware that an inquiry is pending into the doctrines which are taught to the Irish priests at Maynooth. You are aware that the books out of which they are taught in that college contain direct authorities for violating such oaths. You are aware that the defence which will be made for the college is this, that although this doctrine is contained in those books, yet the priests who are instructed out of those books do not adopt or practise this doctrine of violating oaths, or do not apply it to the oath in question. But if it should appear that the bishop and the priests of a whole diocess do sanction Mr. Lucas in violating this oath, and not only that, but send him to parliament pledged to them to violate it, what will this defence avail?

I enter on this subject with reluctance. You are aware that many Protestants consider the violation of oaths made to heretics to be a systematic part of the Roman religion. I have never treated it as such. I know, indeed, how far it is authorized in the books which are of greatest authority in your church. I know that it is THE LAW OF YOUR CHURCH that such oaths are to be violated. All this I know well. But I never could think of charging such a wicked doctrine on Roman Catholics in general, because I know many Roman Catholics who would scorn to adopt such a doctrine, even on the authority of their church. I cannot forget that Lord Fingal, Lord Arundel, and many other Roman Catholics, have declared that this oath is binding on their conscience, and have acted accordingly. Among the upper and middle classes of Roman Catholic electors in Meath, I am convinced that the great majority will be horrified at the thought of Mr. Lucas taking this oath FALSELY under the sanction of yourself and your priests.

Out of respect for them, I have heretofore avoided even discussing this subject. But I can do so no longer. You and your priests are, in fact, in sending Mr. Lucas to parliament, pledged to violate this oath; we are, therefore, forced to inquire whether you will now direct him to abandon this pledge or to violate this oath. We are forced to inquire whether it be indeed the doctrine of the Roman Catholic bishops and priests in Ireland that solemn oaths taken to those whom you call heretics are to be violated. If it shall appear that you do indeed adopt and sanction such a principle, it will be of practical importance to know it, for although nine-tenths of the Roman Catholics of Ireland will honestly disavow such a doctrine, yet you have showed us that you and your priests may yet be able to choose as representatives those few Roman Catholics who are willing to submit their consciences to the direction of priests in this matter.

What, then, are the directions which you are prepared to give to Mr. Lucas? Will you tell him that his pledge is impossible to be kept, and that he must abandon it? Or will you instruct him that it is lawful for him to swear that he has no intention of subverting the Established Church, in order that by taking that oath he may get into a position to subvert it with effect?

If you answer that you cannot and will not give so wicked an advice, I am ready to accept your answer with confidence, and will look for the result with interest in Mr. Lucas's conduct.

If you do not give this open answer (and any other open answer you surely will not venture to give), I can only gather your secret instructions to Mr. Lucas from the public law of your church.

I find it thus laid down in the canon law of the Church of Rome—"An oath taken contrary to the interests of the church does not bind;" and the reason is thus stated—"because those which are attempted contrary to the interests of the church, are not to be called oaths, but rather perjuries."—Decret. Greg. lx. liber ii. Tit. 24, ch. 27. Of course it is the interest of the Church of Rome that is here meant. And you would probably consider it contrary to the interest of the Church of Rome, that Roman Catholic members should swear in parliament that they will not subvert the present Church establishment. So you have the highest authority, even the law of your church, for saying that this oath does not bind.

But what is to be done with a person who takes an oath knowing that the thing which he swears is unlawful? The canon law seems to answer this too—"Juransscienter illicitum, non indiget absolutione, sed tenetur illud non observare;" "he who knowingly swears an unlawful thing does not lack absolution, but is bound not to observe it."—Chap. 18, same title. I suppose this cannot mean that taking an unlawful oath does not need or require absolution, but rather that the person who takes such an oath is not to be left without absolution, but is to be absolved, provided he promise not to be bound by the oath. Thus, although you consider the oath unlawful in itself, yet if Mr. Lucas knowingly takes such an oath, you are to give him absolution, provided he will break it.

This, Sir, appears to be the law of your church upon the subject, and when you send a man to parliament publicly pledged to violate the oath which he is to take there, we must presume, unless you disavow it, that you are prepared to act upon this law.

Let me here remind you that the question is not what is to be done by a man who has taken an unlawful oath, believing it to be lawful. There may be some very few cases, in which such an oath ought not to be kept, when a man discovers that that oath which he believed to be lawful and which he intended to keep at the time he took it, is indeed unlawful. But this is not Mr. Lucas's case. He has not taken the oath yet. He has time enough to consider, and you have time enough to instruct him, whether the oath is lawful or unlawful. If the oath be unlawful, or contrary to the interest of your church then your own canon law says it is a perjury TO TAKE it; but if it be lawful, then, when taken, it would be a perjury to break it. The question is, will you sanction his taking a wicked oath, an oath which your own law says it is a perjury to take—will you sanction his doing this as a means of deceiving heretics, and violating the solemn conditions of the Emancipation Act, or will you sanction his breaking a lawful oath?

If you will not do either the one or the other, I submit that you must instruct him that the pledge which he gave at the meeting at Kells is unlawful and cannot be kept.

If you should give him no direction on the subject, I submit that you are answerable for the sin of allowing him to keep his pledge and violate his oath.

If you should be silent on the subject, it must be supposed that you will not condemn this use of oaths, while you cannot defend it. In that case Roman Catholics may be led to doubt how far they can trust in the religious teaching of those who cannot venture to avow and defend their doctrine on the plainest moral obligations.

I trust you will not suppose that I put forward this subject of the oath, to turn away discussion from the merits of the Irish Church. You will remember that, three years ago, in a published correspondence which I had with the Rev. Mr. Kelly, of Kells, I invited him to discuss with me which church was descended from St. Patrick—which is entitled to the allegiance of the Catholic people of Ireland. The Rev. Mr. Kelly did answer that letter; but on this subject he was silent. I wrote another letter, which I sent to you, in which I invited any priest in your diocess to discuss this subject. No one has since ventured to do so. I still invite you to nominate any of your priests to discuss with me the merits of the Irish Church in the way I then proposed. Until you answer this, you cannot suppose that I wish to avoid discussion on the subject in parliament or anywhere else.

But the subject of this letter is to call on you to declare the doctrine of your church on oaths, and political obligations—to say whether you consider it lawful to take an oath against the interest of your church (the taking of which your own law pronounces to be perjury), with no intention of keeping that oath, but taking it solely as a means of deceiving others.

And let me again remind you of the awful position in which Mr. Lucas stands—pledged to you and to your clergy to do this, and sent by you and your clergy to parliament to do it.

Surely, if ever a bishop was called on to direct any man's conscience, you are called on to direct Mr. Lucas in this.

I have the honour to be, Right Reverend Sir, your obedient servant,

EDWARD A. STOPFORD,
Archdeacon of Meath.

The foregoing letter was probably written before the following was published, which we take from Mr. Lucas's speech at the declaration of the members at the Meath election, as published in the Tablet, July 31, page 494, col. 2, which we add here, as it shows Mr. Lucas's own understanding of the grounds on which he is sent to parliament—"If we remain true to the principles on which we have been sent into parliament—if we keep the principles of Sharman Crawford's Bill, hostility to the Established Church, AND THE ABOLITION of that odious monopoly," &c., &c. This puts the view taken in the foregoing letter, of Mr. Lucas's position, beyond all question.

Correspondence.

IS THE DOCTRINE OF PURGATORY TAUGHT BY THE HOLY FATHERS?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—In my letter on the above subject, which appears in your publication of this month, I did not, as you are pleased to represent, quote the book of Maccabees as SCRIPTURE, but as an authentic historical testimony deposing to a fact which cannot be denied, that the practice of praying for the dead was the same among the ancient Jews as among the early Christians and Roman Catholics of the present day (read fourth paragraph of my letter).

I did not state the Book of Maccabees was any portion of the public worship of the Jews, or that they ever acknowledged that book as Scripture, given by inspiration of God; but I boldly affirmed that prayers for the dead formed part and parcel of the public worship of the Jews; and I now reiterate my inquiry, why such a practice did not meet the censure and condemnation of Christ and his Apostles?

That is the question to which I expect a direct answer, and not whether the Book of Maccabees be apocryphal or otherwise.

With respect to your observations on my quotations from some of the Fathers of the three and four first centuries, I leave your readers to exercise their private judgment and arrive at their own conclusions. I just beg, however, to observe, that you take no notice whatever of some of the early Fathers declaring the practice of praying for the dead to be of APOSTOLICAL TRADITION. St. Chrysostom is decisive on the point (Homil. 3, in Epist. ad Philip), and (in Homil. 21) states the solemn usage to have been ordained by the DIVINE SPIRIT.

WARNER CHRISTIAN SEARCH.

July, 1852.

On the above letter we wish to say, in the first place, that it is our most earnest desire to do the fullest justice, and to act with perfect candour towards those who enter into discussion in our pages. Above all, we desire never to misrepresent their arguments. We should be unworthy of their contributions if we did. We are liable to mistake the point of an argument unintentionally; and in such a case we shall always be ready to acknowledge and correct our error, and thankful for the opportunity of doing so.

In this instance we have mistaken "W. C. Search's" arguments from the Book of Maccabees; and he has given us the opportunity of answering more to the point; and we gladly avail ourselves of it.

The argument is this—"Although we should regard the second Book of Maccabees merely as an account, written by an uninspired historian of fair character and credit, even in that view it is a sufficient testimony that the Jews did actually practise prayers and sacrifice for the repose of departed souls, just as the Roman Catholic Church does now; and that this was part of the public worship of the Jewish Church in our Saviour's time; and, since he did not reprove the Jews for this, his silence must be taken as admitting it to be right." We trust that "W. C. Search" will think the above a candid statement of his argument; and we acknowledge it deserves a better answer than we have yet given it. And we now offer the following answer—

We agree to take the writer of this book as a historian worthy of that credit which is given to historians of fair character; but we do not acknowledge him to be infallible through Divine inspiration, and "W. C. Search" does not require us to admit this.

Before we can rely on this writer's "historical testimony," we must know exactly what his testimony is. We cannot be bound by an erroneous translation; the writer wrote in Greek, and we must look to the Greek which he wrote, to learn his testimony with accuracy.

We look anxiously for the most authentic copy of the Greek, and we have no hesitation in adopting, for this purpose, an ancient manuscript, belonging to the Pope, which is carefully preserved in the Pope's library, in the Vatican. This book is, at least, 1200 years old, if not more. There is no copy that can compare with it in point of authority, except the Alexandrian Manuscript now in the British Museum; and the two copies agree in the place in question, and every other Greek copy of Maccabees agrees with them too; so we have no room to doubt what the writer did really write in the Greek. And we are able to make use of that valuable manuscript in the Pope's library, because an exact copy of it was printed in the year 1587, by the authority of Pope Sixtus the Fifth.

We now give an exact translation from the Greek as then published by Pope Sixtus; and we place beside it the translation in the Douay Bible, that our readers may compare the two. 2 Macc. xii. 43, &c.:—

DOUAY TRANSLATION.	CORRECT TRANSLATION.
43. And making a gathering he sent twelve thousand drachms of silver to Jerusalem, for sacrifice to be offered for the sins of the dead, thinking well and religiously concerning the resurrection.	43. And having made a preparation of two thousand drachms of silver, according to a collection man by man, he sent to Jerusalem to offer a sacrifice on account of sin, acting altogether well and correctly, reasoning concerning the resurrection.
44. (For if he had not hoped that they that were slain should rise again, it would have seemed superfluous and vain to pray for the dead.)	44. For if he did not expect that the slain should rise, it would have been superfluous and trifling to pray for the dead.
45. And because he considered that they who had fallen asleep with godliness had great grace laid up for them.	45. Then seeing that a most excellent reward is reserved for those falling asleep with piety, a holy and pious thought. Wherefore concerning the dead, he made atonement, to be loosed from sin.
46. It is, therefore, a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead, that they may be loosed from sins.

We have printed in Italics the places in which the difference is important; and we give here the corresponding Greek words, that those learned in that language may satisfy themselves which translation is correct. In v. 43, the Greek words are, Προσαγαγειν περι αμαρτιας θυσιαν. In ver. 46, ὁσια και ευσεβης ἡ επινοια. ὁθεν περι των τεθνηκοτων την εξιλασμον εποιησατο, της αμαρτιας απολυθηναι. We appeal to all Greek scholars if we have not translated this correctly.

Observe, now, in v. 43, the historian does not say in the Greek (what the Douay version is thought to say), that Judas Maccabeus offered the sacrifice for the benefit of the dead. He says nothing of the dead; he only says, that it was offered on account of sin.

Observe, next, in v. 46, what the writer says about a holy and pious thought is not spoken of what follows (as the Douay translation makes it appear), but of what goes before. Every Greek scholar will see that it is impossible to connect these words in the Greek with what follows. It was the belief in a reward for those who die the death of the righteous, that the author of this book called a holy and pious thought.

Observe, lastly, that the Douay Bible, in v. 46, again applies the benefit to the dead—"to pray for the dead, that they may be loosed from sins." But the writer in the Greek does not say so. He does not say that the dead might be loosed; he does not say who were to be loosed, but he says that Judas made an atonement concerning, or on account of, the dead; he does not say for the dead, for then he would have written υπερ, whereas he has written περι, concerning the dead; and he does not say that they should be loosed, but "to be loosed," which might be for Judas himself, and for others, if living: for if the sins of the dead had brought the living under sin, an atonement would be required for the living, because of the dead.

We observe here that "W. C. Search" has argued only from v. 43 & 46; he has not referred to v. 44. We, therefore, answer here only from the verses he relies on, and we will consider v. 44 separately.

From verses 43 and 46, rightly translated, our answer is clear. The sacrifice was offered, and the atonement was made, not for the dead, but for the living.

It is a fact that, according to the law of Moses, the sin of those who were slain had brought guilt upon the whole nation of the living, which required to be atoned for by sacrifice, according to the Jewish law.

We have a clear instance of such a case in the Book of Joshua, ch. 7, v. 1—"But the children of Israel transgressed the commandment, and took to their own use of the anathema. For Achan, the son of Charmi, &c., took something of the anathema, and the Lord was angry against the children of Israel." Here observe that one man only committed the sin, and it was unknown to the rest, for he hid the thing in the ground (v. 21), and yet it brought God's anger on the whole people.

Now, the sin on account of which Judas Maccabeus offered sacrifice, was exactly of the same kind. "They found under the coats of the slain some of the donaries of the idols of Jamnia, which the law forbiddeth to the Jews."—2 Macc. xii. 40. This was the anathema, or accursed thing, which they, like Achan, had taken; and in the same way it brought God's anger on the nation.

And the punishment was like in both cases. In Achan's case, the people, after a succession of victories, in which none of them were killed, were put to flight before their enemies, and many of them killed, because of what Achan had done. Just so Judas Maccabeus, after many victories, met with a check, and some of his soldiers were killed; and when they came to bury them, they found the reason, that they had taken of the cursed thing.

There was this difference in the two cases—In Achan's case, the guilty man was not killed. The atonement consisted in putting him to death, by God's command; but there was sacrifice too, for all his sheep and oxen were burned—Joshua vii. 24, 25, 26. But in the case before us, the idolaters were slain. Judas, therefore, could not make atonement for the guilt that had been brought upon the nation, by putting them to death; and it was his duty to look to the law of Moses and see what atonement was directed for such a case. This he would find exactly prescribed in the Book of Leviticus, chapter iv., from verse 13 to 31 inclusive. In those circumstances it was the duty of Judas Maccabeus to have such a sacrifice offered at Jerusalem, not for the benefit of the dead, but that the living might be delivered from the sin or guilt which the wickedness of the slain had brought upon the whole people. And on looking back to the correct translation which we have given of verses 43 and 46, it will be seen that every word is exactly suitable to such a sacrifice: for instance, when Judas provided the sacrifice, by a "collection made man by man," it was evidently that each of the people should contribute to the atonement, which was made for the people as a whole: if the sacrifice had been for the benefit of the dead, it would have been enough to collect from those who desired to give.

This is the true account of what is related in those two verses, because this is what Judas was bound to do, according to the law of Moses, which was the only rule that it was lawful for him to follow in that matter. "W. C. Search" will, no doubt, acknowledge that Jews were strictly bound by the law of Moses, both as to the manner of offering sacrifice and the purpose for which it was to be offered; excepting only in the case of persons inspired and directed by God, which no one supposes was the case with Judas.

Now, we have shown that, according to that law, it was his duty to offer that sacrifice for the living; and we have shown that the two verses on which "W. C. Search" relies, when rightly translated, are most appropriate to that sacrifice which the law required for the living, and that these verses do not say it was for the dead. Now, can "W. C. Search" show us, from the law of Moses, that it was Judas's duty to offer sacrifice for the dead? We urge this upon him. If he cannot (and we know he cannot) will he not agree with us that Judas offered his sacrifice according to the law, and not contrary to the law, seeing that Judas was bound by that law, and was a most strict observer of it?

We have now given a full answer, as respects those two verses which "W. C. S." argues from. We will now go on and consider v. 44, which he has not introduced into his argument.

"W. C. Search" has laid it down most plainly that, for the purpose of this discussion, the writer of that book is to be considered as an uninspired historian of fair character and credit. As such we consider him. It is a rule in judging of all such historians, that a great difference is to be made between the facts which the historian relates and his own reflections upon those facts. The one may be most correct, and the other most erroneous. The difference is greater still between the actions which the historian records, and the historian's guess, for it can be little more than a guess, at the secret thoughts which led the actor to do what he did. "W. C. Search" must surely have observed the importance of this distinction, in reading even historians of the highest character and credit.

The highest praise an historian can obtain is, that he keeps the facts which he records distinct from his own reflections on those facts—that he does not allow his own reflections to influence the account of the facts.

The writer of this book has done it admirably. He evidently connected in his own mind this sacrifice with the dead, rather than with the living; yet where he relates the sacrifice—v. 43 and 46—he does not say it was for the dead; he describes it exactly as it was, in the true translation. Verse 44 is not the relation of the fact, but his own reflection on the fact, which may be right or wrong, without injury to his character for fidelity as an historian.

We are, therefore, to consider this verse not as the relation of a fact, but as the inference which he drew from the fact he relates.

Now, how could the writer of this book know the secret thoughts of Judas's mind? How could he know that Judas was thinking of the resurrection? If the writer was inspired he could know it; but if he was only an uninspired man, it could only be a guess.

Now, we are prepared to affirm that this writer was wrong in supposing that Judas offered this sacrifice with any regard to the resurrection of those who were slain. And, still more, we are prepared to expect that "W. C. Search" himself will, on reflection, agree with us that the writer was wrong in this (though, perhaps, not on exactly the same grounds that we think so). Now, let "W. C. Search" mark this; the men who died on that occasion died in mortal sin. They carried in their clothes the proofs of their idolatry; perhaps in hopes to have the protection of the heathen gods in the battle; but, whatever their motive, their sin was idolatry, which was a mortal sin. "W. C. Search" will not deny this. Even the note on the Douay Bible acknowledges the sin of which they were guilty to be a mortal sin, which cannot be denied, if we look to Deuteronomy vii., 25, 26. That note in the Douay Bible supposed these men might be excused through ignorance; but how could any Jew be ignorant that heathen idolatry was a mortal sin? what Jew could be ignorant that heathen idols were the accursed thing? Let "W. C. Search" mark this; if that sacrifice was offered for the dead, it was offered for those that WERE KNOWN AND PROVED TO HAVE DIED IN MORTAL SIN.

Let "W. C. Search" now look back to this sentence in his letter from above, in which he brings this history as a proof "that the practice of praying for the dead WAS THE SAME among the ancient Jews as among the early Christians, and Roman Catholics of the present day." If that history of the Maccabees prove anything at all of the practice of the Jews about prayer and sacrifice for the dead, it prove that they prayed and sacrificed for those who died in mortal sin, that they might be loosed from their sins. Do "Roman Catholics of the present day" pray and offer sacrifice for those who die in mortal sin, that they may be loosed from their sins? "W. C. Search" will tell us that they do not—that they consider this a wicked and heretical doctrine; and that it is condemned by their church as such. How, then, can he tell us that this history proves that the practice of the Jews was the same as theirs?

We have only to add one word on "W. C. Search's" argument from the silence of Christ. To make the argument of any force it would be necessary that the practice in question should be shown to have been a constant part of the public worship of the Jews—that is to say, that they practised it always and continually as a part of their public worship. If it was a thing done only once, 163 years before Christ, and not repeated from day to day continually, then our Saviour's silence concerning it is no approbation, any more than his silence about any other act of the Jews, in former times, is an approbation of it. Now, the history of it, even as it is given in the Douay translation, does not profess to speak of what was done always and from day to day among the Jews, but only of what was done on that particular occasion. But we need not insist further on this; if the history proves anything of the practice of the Jews in our Saviour's time, it proves that their public worship then comprised prayer and sacrifice for those who died in mortal sin, that they might be loosed from their sins. Will "W. C. Search" say that our Saviour, by his silence, or any other way, approved of this? If He did, why did the Church of Rome condemn it now, as she certainly does?

We now appeal to "W. C. Search" whether this be not conclusive proof that the reflections which the writer of this book of 2nd Maccabees makes on the facts which he records are uninspired, and subject to error? Will he now maintain that the opinion of this writer, contradictory as it is not only to the doctrine of the Gospel, but even to the teaching of the Church of Rome, must needs be inspired? We add nothing to this, but that the writer of this book is allowed to have been a Greek, and, as such, may have had no opportunity of witnessing the public worship of the Jews. See Acts xxi., 28, 29.

The writer of this has been compelled to consider this subject in a brief space of time, and under a great pressure of other business. He now thanks "W. C. Search" for having forced him to do it. He feels it to be practical proof to himself of the value of the discussion and researches which this journal was intended to promote, and which "W. C. Search" has efficiently promoted; and he trusts that "W. C. Search" will now feel that the writers in this journal desire rightly to understand and to do full justice to the arguments of opponents, that they are ready to acknowledge an error when they have committed it, and that they are anxious only for a fair discussion of important questions, with a view to the promotion of truth.

We must be brief on the remainder of this letter. "W. C. Search" says—"With respect to your observations on the quotations from some of the Fathers of the three and four first centuries, I leave your readers to exercise their private judgment, and arrive at their own conclusions." Our answer was this—that quotations from the three first centuries only were applicable to the letter which "W. C. Search" undertook to answer—that he brought only two witnesses from these three centuries for the doctrine of Purgatory—of whom he had to say, "One of them believed it only after he left the Catholic Church; the other, who was always a Catholic, never believed it at all." We refer our readers back to that article for the proofs we gave (July number, pages 81 and 82); and we join with "W. C. Search" "in leaving it to our readers to exercise their private judgment, and arrive at their own conclusions."

"W. C. Search" complains that we did not take notice of all the passages which he quoted. We beg to repeat the reason that we then gave—"We have purposely omitted the proofs which 'W. C. Search' has brought from the fourth century, because they are no answer at all to the question, whether purgatory can be proved from the writings of the first three centuries. Our business in this article is to examine that article by itself. We shall, however, examine them (the proofs from the fourth century) on some other occasion." It was our intention to have done so in this number, but having to insert this reply to his present letter has prevented us; but we hope to perform this promise in our next number.

WHAT IS PURGATORY?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—You have been discussing with some of your correspondents, in the last number, whether the early Fathers believed in a Purgatory; but perhaps it may be well first to come to an agreement what Purgatory is. Your Loughrea correspondent, who signs himself "A Catholic," says, that anything short of absolutely perfect bliss is a punishment or purgation. If this be the test, it is easy to prove not only that the Fathers believed in Purgatory, but that the Church of England believes in it too. For she distinctly teaches in her Burial Service that we cannot have our perfect consummation and bliss until we have it in body and soul, when the soul is re-united to the body. But she also teaches that the souls of the faithful departed are in joy and felicity, and so differs from Romish divines, who teach that the majority of the faithful departed have to suffer torments equal to those of hell in severity, though not in duration. When, therefore, I ask whether the early Fathers believed in a Purgatory, what I want to know is, whether they believed that the souls of the faithful departed were in a state of joy or felicity, or in a state of torment; but I do not ask whether they imagined that the faithful departed are all at once admitted to the highest happiness which they shall ever attain; for I know that they agree with the Church of England in teaching that they are not. Can, therefore, any of your correspondents tell me of any Father, of the first three centuries, who teaches that there is a Purgatory (meaning thereby a state of torment) for the righteous after death? But it will be irrelevant to produce quotations showing that those Fathers prayed for the dead, since this fact only proves that they supposed these souls not yet to have attained to perfect happiness, which is not denied. As long as one's happiness admits of any doubt there is room for prayer. Prayers for the dead, then, only prove a Purgatory in your Loughrea correspondent's sense of the word—namely, a state something short of absolutely perfect happiness; but I want to see the passages produced, if such there be, which prove that either the Apostles or their successors believed in a Purgatory in the sense of a place of torment.

I remain, yours,
A TRUE CATHOLIC.

INDULGENCES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Cape Clear, July 24, 1852.

SIR,—The following respectful letter was addressed, on the 16th of June, to the Right Rev. Dr. KEANE, R. C. Bishop of this diocese (Ross). As I have not yet been favoured with an answer, perhaps you, sir, cannot employ your pen more acceptably or profitably, for the edification of your numerous Roman Catholic readers, than by giving the required information. Your reading appears so extensive, and you seem to have access to so many good authorities, that you will probably not have much difficulty in doing so. As you will, doubtless, state fully and fairly the Roman Catholic notion of such matters, you will be pleased to add something of the grounds on which Protestants refuse to avail themselves of a provision said to be replete with such wonderful blessings. Should the bishop still condescend to answer my humble communication, you and your readers shall have the full benefit of what he says. But if he should not, he may, notwithstanding, deem the learned statements of the editor of so widely circulated a paper as the CATHOLIC LAYMAN not entirely beneath his notice; so I think it would be only fair and respectful to send to his address, at Skibbereen, a copy of the number in which the accompanying letter shall appear with your remarks.

To satisfy him that, in writing to him as I have done, I have been acting in deference to the high authority of a Pope, I beg to call his attention to Pope Leo's Bull for the observance of a jubilee, in the year 1825, in which that pontiff says—"To you, therefore, venerable brethren, patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops, it belongs to explain with perspicuity the power of indulgences." Moreover, the great advantage which the Church of Rome boasts of possessing over other Christian communities is that of having a "living, speaking tribunal" to refer to in every case of uncertainty or doubt. In each diocese I presume that speaking tribunal to be the bishop, no higher (such as councils or Popes) being accessible to ordinary inquirers; and if he, when referred to, refuses to "speak," what good is he, or how does he maintain, on that head, the pretensions of his church?

I am, sir, your very obedient servant,
EDWARD SPRING.

"TO THE RIGHT REV. DR. KEANE, ETC., ETC.

"RIGHT REV. SIR,—A late number of a Roman Catholic newspaper (The Limerick and Clare Examiner), publishes a document 'read aloud by the Rev. Mr Synan, P.P.,' in St. Michael's Chapel, Limerick, on Sunday, the 6th instant, in which it is stated that 'the Pope has granted an indulgence of seven years, and as many forty days, to all the faithful of Christ who, with a contrite heart, shall visit a cross lately erected in the yard of that chapel, and recite seven Ave Marias, in honour of the seven dolours of the Blessed Virgin Mary; and that 'this indulgence may be gained every day.' Also, that the Pope has 'granted PLENARY indulgences' upon the performance of other conditions in connection with a visit to the same cross, 'which indulgences can be applied to the souls in purgatory.'

"As I presume there can be no question about the authenticity of this document, may I take the liberty of seeking to be informed respecting its meaning, by you, right reverend sir, as the chief representative, in this diocese, of the high ecclesiastical personage by whom the specified favours are said to be bestowed? I assure you that, in doing so, I am not actuated by any motive of impertinence, but wish to get, from one whom I can regard as competent authority, information in a matter which I don't understand. Upon the subject of Papal indulgences I have frequently consulted the writings of both Protestants and Roman Catholics, and from none that I have met have I been able entirely to satisfy myself as to all that is contemplated by them, or the precise nature and extent of the benefits which they are designed to confer.

"What, therefore, I now respectfully ask you to tell me is, First—what exactly is meant by 'an indulgence of seven years and as many forty days.' Secondly—whether by the words, 'this indulgence may be gained every day,' I am to understand that the benefits may be multiplied by the number of days (be they many or few) on which the cross is visited, and the other conditions performed. Thirdly—what are the precise benefits designed to be conveyed by a Plenary indulgence. And fourthly—how it is intended we should understand the expression, 'which indulgences can be applied to the souls in Purgatory.' In addition to my other queries, may I ask you what are 'the seven dolours of the Blessed Virgin Mary,' and how are they understood to be honoured by the 'recital' of 'seven Ave Marias?'

"It is right I should inform you that any information you may be kind enough to favour me with, I shall feel at liberty to use as I think proper, and remain, right reverend sir, your very humble servant,

"EDWARD SPRING,
"Curate of Clear."

[We feel obliged to our reverend correspondent for the foregoing communication, and, should the Right Rev. Dr. Keane decline to furnish him with the information he desires, we shall endeavour to do so from authentic sources in our next number.]

FARM OPERATIONS FOR AUGUST.

Barley should be cut when the straw, in its entire length, assumes a bright gold colour, and the ear bends down gently. The grain should be allowed to get firmer than wheat, but not too ripe, as it does not then produce so fine a coloured sample, and will not bring so good a price in the market, for malting purposes. When in a fit state, it should be cut expeditiously, bound in small sheaves, and stooked, as there is no grain so easily damaged by wet. If the weather be fine and dry, the stooks need not be capped or hooded for a day or two; but, after that, capping will be necessary, to preserve the colour.

Turnips, mangels, carrots, and parsnips require great care and attention in the hoeing, thinning, and weeding, with the frequent use of the grubbers and pulverizers till the crop has grown so much as to shut out all further operations.

THE TWO SHIPS.

Some weeks ago an amusing story was told in the newspapers, of a certain traveller who was on his journey in the United States, and who wished to go from New York to Boston. He proceeded to the quay, and embarked on board a steamer which was ready to sail, supposing that it would bring him safely to his journey's end. The next morning he went on deck, and asked one of the sailors when the vessel would arrive at Boston. "Bless you, sir," was the man's reply, "we are going to Liverpool!" The dismay of the unfortunate traveller may easily be conceived; and when he had time to reflect coolly on the cause of his mishap, he could only blame his own folly and carelessness in not making the necessary inquiries before he set out on his voyage.

Let us suppose, however, that the traveller, on proceeding to the quay, found two ships there, each of which professed to be bound for the port he wished to reach. In this case, if he were a prudent man, and the voyage long and difficult, he would naturally make some inquiries of the captains or crew of the two vessels, before deciding in which of them he would embark. And suppose he were informed that the two ships, on leaving the harbour, would pursue directly opposite courses; and that all the statements made to him respecting the nature of the voyage, its dangers, and its probable termination, were entirely different and contradictory—in such a case the perplexity of our friend the traveller would, of course, be very much increased. It would not be a sufficient reason, for example, that he should embark in one of the vessels, because he saw many of his friends and neighbours crowd on board, without any questions or previous inquiry. Nor would he, if a man of sense and firmness, be much influenced by the loud and clamorous assertions of any of the crew, that, if he went on board the rival vessel, he would certainly be lost. But he would endeavour, if possible, to learn for himself how the case really stood. He would inquire, perhaps, if a chart or map of the voyage could be procured; and, with this before him, he would examine which of the conflicting accounts bore the greatest appearance of truth. And if one of the two captains were to call our friend into his cabin, and spread out the chart on the table, and explain to him that he intended to sail his vessel in the course pointed out by the map; while the other captain refused to give him any satisfaction, and told him that he had no business to meddle in such matters—that it was very great presumption in him to ask any questions at all, and that he ought to leave the matter in his hands—that the map was of little or no use, and that, for his part, he went by other rules, and steered by other directions—if this was the manner in which the traveller was treated, it is more than probable that, in the end, he would embark on board of that vessel which the authority of the map, and his own well informed and deliberate judgment, pointed out as the one most likely to arrive safely at her journey's end.*

Our readers will probably have already guessed the application which we are about to make of the foregoing illustration. Our two ships, in short, may serve to exemplify the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches. Both profess to follow a safe and certain course to that happy land that all are anxious to reach at the close of the present life. The choice between them must be made by all, for death will quickly overtake the youngest and strongest; and to live without any religion at all must inevitably lead to hopeless and everlasting ruin. Now, if the Church of Rome and the Church of England both followed the same course, and steered in the same track, it might, perhaps, not be very material to which Church men belonged. But here lies the difficulty. The two Churches, as all our readers are, of course, aware, are at variance upon many of the most important landmarks of the Christian voyage, while upon some their views are diametrically opposed. The Bible is the chart which God has mercifully provided for men's guidance, in order to enable them to shape their course aright among the rocks and quicksands of life. Both Churches acknowledge its authority; but the use which they make of it is very different. The Church of England appeals to it on all occasions, and follows no other guide; the Church of Rome, on the contrary, relies upon tradition, and asserts that she has an infallible pilot at the helm, who cannot possibly go wrong. The Church of England invites all persons to search the Bible for themselves, and compare her doctrines with the revealed Word of God. The Church of Rome condemns the exercise of private judgment, and either forbids her members to read the Scriptures, or tells them that they must interpret it exactly as she commands. In the one Church there are two sacraments, in the other there are seven. The Church of England holds the doctrine of justification by faith only; the Church of Rome teaches works of supererogation. The one Church believes in purgatory and uses prayers for the dead; the other Church rejects both as human inventions, unwarranted by Scripture. The Church of Rome addresses prayers to the Virgin Mary and to the saints, and sanctions the use of images. The Church of England believes, with St. Paul, that "there is but one Mediator between God and man" (1 Tim. ii. 5), and that the Almighty is a jealous God, who "will not give his glory to another, neither his praise to graven images" —Isaiah xlii. 8. It would be endless to specify all the points of difference; but even from this brief sketch it is evident that the two Churches hold doctrines which are not only different, but almost opposite—that the paths which they respectively follow are, in fact, "wide as the poles asunder."

By what principle, therefore, are we to decide? It is plain that both Churches cannot be right. The one steers north, the other south; if the one vessel arrives safely at its destined port, those who embark in the other run great risk of making shipwreck of their faith and hopes. If the point were to be decided by bold and confident assertions, the Church of Rome would probably triumph; for she condemns all those who differ from her to perdition, and declares that out of her pale there is no salvation.* But the controversy is too important to be settled in this way; in a matter of such consequence every prudent man will ask, not what is said on either side, but what can be proved. The question which every Catholic layman, anxious solely for the cause of truth, and his soul's salvation, ought to put himself, therefore, is this—What are the marks of a true Church of Christ? How am I to know whether the Church of England or the Church of Rome is the Church to which I ought to belong, and in which I ought to live and die? In the following remarks we hope to afford our readers some hints which will help them in this inquiry.

In every question, the first thing to be settled is, the meaning of the words we use. Many of the controversies which have arisen upon religious subjects would have been avoided, if men had agreed beforehand upon the precise signification of the terms which they employed in their arguments. Now, the first place in which we find the word "Church" made use of is, of course, the New Testament, where it very frequently occurs: and it is here used in two different senses, which it is important to keep distinct. It is applied, in the first place, to the whole collective body of true Christians, who have existed, or who ever shall exist in the world. Thus, for example, we read that "Christ loved the Church and gave himself for it, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing" (Eph. v. 25.), and St. Paul speaks of "the general assembly and Church of the first-born, which are written in heaven."—Heb. xii. 23. It is applied, in the second place, to a particular congregation of professing Christians, assembling in one place for the purpose of Christian worship; or to a collection of such congregations in a particular city or district. Thus, St. Paul, in his epistles, salutes "Nymphas, and the Church which is in his house."—Col. iv. 15. "Priscilla and Aquila, and the Church that is in their house."—Rom. xvi. 5. "Archippus and the Church in thy house."—Philem. 2. He speaks also, generally, of "the Churches of the Gentiles" (Rom. xvi. 4); "the Churches of God which in Judea are in Christ Jesus" (1 Thess. ii. 14); "the Churches of Macedonia" (2 Cor. viii. 1); and St. John, in like manner, speaks of "the seven Churches in Asia," the Church of Ephesus, the Church of Smyrna, &c.—Rev. i. 11. The collection of these particular local Churches makes up the general Catholic Church, as it exists in the world at any one particular time; and which includes all those persons on the face of the earth who profess to believe in Christ, and who acknowledge him to be the Saviour of mankind. Every particular Church which professes the true faith and worship of Christ, is a true Christian Church, and would be a true Church, though there were no other Church in the world. The Christian Church at Jerusalem, for example, was obviously a true Church before the Church of Rome or any other Church was planted. The Catholic Church embraces all the true Christian Churches in the world, which have all the same nature, and possess the same essential character.

It is plain, therefore, that before we can form any clear idea of the Catholic Church, we must, in the first place, know what it is which makes a Church to be a true, particular Church. We must have some notion of water, for example, before we can form any idea of the sea or the ocean. It is acknowledged, both by Protestants and Roman Catholics, that in the true Church only there is the true faith, true remission of sins, and a true hope of eternal salvation.* But the question is, how are we to know whether any particular Church is a true Church or not? If it be, it belongs to the one Catholic Church of Christ, and its members are in the way of salvation. Now, the answer which the Church of England gives to this question is set forth with much brevity and simplicity in her 19th Article—"The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered, according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." This statement has, at least, the merit of being clear and unambiguous. If the doctrines of any Church be in accordance with the Word of God—if the Scriptures be faithfully read and preached to the people, and the sacraments administered in their integrity, as the Lord appointed them, then the Church of England pronounces such a Church to be a true Church, and to belong to the Catholic Church of Christ. These are points on which the simplest and most unlearned Christian, who has his Bible in his hands, can in some measure judge for himself. The Church of England does not ask him to follow his religious instructor blindly and unInquiringly, or to risk his hopes of future happiness upon the word of any man, or any set of men. She invites him to use the reason which God has given him upon the most important of all subjects—the search for truth.

* We are sensible, also! that our Irish emigrants too often neglect such wise inquiries and precautions; and embark in vessels without any care at all to learn whether they are sea-worthy or properly provided. Many ship-owners are, in consequence, very careless what sort of vessels they provide, and the result is, that thousands of our countrymen perish annually by shipwreck, by disease, and grievous sufferings; all of which might have been avoided, if Irish emigrants to America were as careful and prudent in the choice of a ship as English emigrants are in going to Australia.

* Vide Creed of Pope Pius IV., § 15—"Hanc veram Catholicam fidem extra quam nemo salvus esse potest."

* Vide Bellarmine de Notis Eccl., cap. 1—"Omnes enim confitentur in sola vera Ecclesia esse veram fidem, veram peccatorum remissionem, veram spem salutis æternæ."

She urges him to compare her doctrines with the statements of Scripture; she desires him to examine for himself whether the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered to her people, and then soberly and deliberately to decide whether he can safely commit himself to her guidance.

Very different, however, is the course which the Church of Rome adopts upon this vital subject. She cannot venture to appeal to Scripture, or to admit that men have a right to judge for themselves, and to compare the doctrines of the Church with the Word of God. She avoids as much as possible giving an answer to the question, "What is a true Church?" and substitutes for it a very different inquiry, "Which is the true Church?" And the reason is obvious. The Church of Rome resolves every question by the authority of the Church. Her divines assert that we must receive the Scriptures, and the interpretation of them, and the whole Christian faith and worship, from the Church;* and therefore we can know nothing of religion until we have found the Church—that is, until we have ascertained which is the true Church. According to this mode of proceeding, we must find out the Church before opening the Bible at all; for if Scripture be appealed to, it is a plain acknowledgment that we can know and understand the Scriptures without the authority or interpretation of the Church, which undermines the very foundation of the Roman Catholic system.

It is evident that before we can settle the question, "Which is the true Church?" there are two other questions which must be previously answered—namely, whether there be a true Church or not? and, if there be, what is it? The first inquiry, then, which we may address to Roman Catholics is, how they will prove that there is a Church without the Scriptures? They will reply, perhaps, that the Church is visible, for we see a Christian Church in the world; but we may ask them in turn, what is it which we see? We see a company of men, who call themselves a Church; but surely the fact of men's calling themselves a Church does not make them one. A Christian Church must have a Divine origin and institution, it must have a charter, to which it can appeal in proof of its claims; and this charter can only be found in the Scriptures—the authority of which must be established, and the sense of which must be understood, before we can know what a Church is.

Whether there is such a thing as a Church or not must, therefore, be decided by the Scriptures, and the Scriptures alone. And further, we must judge of a true Church by its holding the true Scripture faith; for this is the only way in which we can find out what a true Church is. It is plain that these questions cannot be settled by the authority of the Church, without the aid of Scripture; for, as we have said, it is Scripture alone which assures us that there is a Church; and it is evident that we cannot rely on the authority of a Church, before we know whether she exists at all, and how she is to be known. In order to be satisfied on these points, we must obviously have recourse to Scripture; and we must examine it for ourselves, in order to learn its sense and meaning. In short, men must judge for themselves in order to find a Church; and when they have done this, the authority of the Church comes too late. If, on the other hand, we must believe the Church before we can believe or understand the Scriptures, we must believe the Church before we can possibly know whether there be a Church or not. This is a fallacy which runs through all the statements of Roman Catholic divines on this question. In order to bring in their favourite principle of Church authority, they always take for granted that there is a Church, which they can never prove without the aid of Scripture; and then they attempt to give some marks whereby to know which is the Church; which, as has been well observed, is like giving marks whereby to know some particular unicorn, before we know whether there be an unicorn in the world or not, or what kind of animal it is.

Roman Catholic writers are fond of dwelling on the obscurity of Scripture, and the difficulty of ascertaining from it alone the chief articles of the Christian faith; and from hence they would infer that the authority of the Church is necessary, in order to decide what is the true faith. But here we must still return the same answer as before, that we cannot have recourse to the authority of the Church, without knowing which is the true Church; and the true Church cannot be known without knowing the true faith; for no Church is a true Church which does not profess the true faith. This is the rule long since laid down by Lactantius, to discern the true Church by the true religion—"That Church alone," saith he, "is Catholic, which retains the true worship of God."† And St. Ambrose makes a remarkable declaration to the same effect—"They do not possess the inheritance of Peter who do not possess the faith of Peter."‡ It is, indeed, a strange and unreasonable course to resolve all our faith into the authority of the Church, as if the Church were to be the first object of our faith in religion; whereas it can be proved that we must know and believe most of the articles of the Christian faith before we can know whether there be any Church or not. The order observed in the Apostles' Creed is a plain evidence of this; for all those articles which are before the Holy Catholic Church must, in order of nature, be known before it. That there is a God, who made the world; that Jesus Christ is the only begotten Son of God, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, was crucified, dead, and buried, and rose again; that there is a Holy Ghost—all this must be believed; and then we may add the Holy Catholic Church, but not till then; for the Church is a society of men for the worship of God, through the faith of Jesus Christ, by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, which unites them into one mystical body; so that we must know God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, before we can know what the Catholic Church means. And is it not strange, therefore, that our faith must be founded on the authority of the Church, when we must first know all the great articles of our faith before we can know anything about a Church? This inverts the order of our creed, which, according to the principles of the Church of Rome, should begin thus:—"I believe in the Holy Catholic Church, and, upon the authority of that Church, I believe in God the Father Almighty, and in Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost." The absurdity of such a principle becomes obvious as soon as it is put into words.

Our readers have already seen the short and explicit answer which the Church of England gives to the inquiry—What are the marks of a true Church of Christ? But when we turn to Roman Catholic divines for a reply to the same question, the answer we receive is indeed curious. Cardinal Bellarmine, who is their greatest writer, takes good care to say nothing about the Scriptures; and no wonder, for, according to him, the Scriptures derive all their authority from the Church's sanction. Nor will he venture to tell us what it is which makes a Church a true Church; for this would have obliged him to say something about the true faith, which, according to his principles, must be learned solely from the Church. But to make amends for these omissions, he enumerates no less than fifteen marks or notes whereby we may discern the true Church.† Our limits will not now permit us to enter upon a full examination of these notes; we must content ourselves with one or two brief remarks. Among Bellarmine's notes are the following:—1. The name Catholic. 2. Antiquity. 3. Long continued duration. 4. Multitude of believers. 5. Confession of adversaries. 6. Temporal felicity. 7. Sanctity of doctrine. If these notes are of any value at all, they ought to be applicable to the true Church at all periods of its history. Now, if ever there was a true Christian Church on earth, it was during the twenty years which elapsed from our Lord's ascension to the death of the Apostle Paul. Let us apply Bellarmine's notes to the Church of that age. Did it bear the name Catholic? No: the word Catholic, as applied to the Christian Church, was not known for some centuries. Again, how could the Church in the Apostles' days possess either antiquity or long continued duration, when it had only been established a few months or years? It is a new idea that truth must live a long time in the world, and, as it were, come of age, before it can be acknowledged and believed. How can a "multitude of believers" be an unfailing mark of the true Church when we are informed in Scripture (Acts i.), that shortly after our Lord's ascension, the number of the disciples was only one hundred and twenty? As to the "confession of adversaries," we know, on the same inspired authority, that the early Christians were "everywhere spoken against" (Acts xxviii. 22), and that their enemies charged them with "turning the world upside down."—Acts xvii. 6. "Temporal felicity" is, perhaps, the very worst note of the true Church that could possibly have been selected; for the early Christians, as every one must be aware, were objects of the bitterest persecution. St. Paul, who partook largely in these sufferings, describes the Christians as being "made a gazing-stock, both by reproaches and afflictions" (Heb. x. 33)—nay, this eminent Apostle writes of himself, that "he was made as the filth of the world, and the offscouring of all things."—1 Cor. iv. 13. As regards "sanctity of doctrine," we readily allow that this is, and ever has been, a most essential mark of the true Church; but how can Bellarmine make any use of this mark, until he has first given us some means of knowing what is, and what is not, pure doctrine, independently of the Church? Whereas, on the contrary, he declares, in the most express terms, that the distinctions between vice and virtue, the very foundation of all morals, can be annulled and altered by the Church's will! Our readers will, perhaps, scarcely believe that such a monstrous assertion could ever have proceeded from the pen of this great champion of Romanism, unless we cited his own words. They are as follows:—"If the Pope, through mistake, should command vice, and forbid virtue, THE CHURCH WOULD BE BOUND TO BELIEVE THAT VICE IS GOOD AND VIRTUE EVIL, UNLESS SHE WOULD SIN AGAINST CONSCIENCE"!!!* According to this maxim, if the Pope were to command a man to steal, or to tell a lie, or to forbid him to honour his parents, the man would be bound, in conscience, to obey! Did Bellarmine, when he wrote the above sentence, ever reflect upon our Blessed Lord's severe reproach to the Jewish teachers of his day—"Ye have made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition?"—Matt. xv. 6.

We hope on a future occasion to return to this subject; meanwhile, we would earnestly commend to our Roman Catholic readers the words of that pious and eminent Father, St. Augustine, when speaking of the Donatists, who claimed to be the only true Church in his time—"Let them show me their church, not in the councils of their bishops, not in the writings of disputers, not in the miracles and prodigies of which they boast, but let them show it me in the ordinances of the Law, in the predictions of the Prophets, in the songs of the Psalms, in the preaching of the Evangelists, and in the canonical authorities of the Sacred Books. This is our foundation, to which we inviolably attach ourselves, reposing only upon this Scripture, which is come from the Prophets and Apostles."†

TALK OF THE ROAD—NO. VII.

PAT and Jem have been so busy reaping they had little time to talk, but we have heard something of them. But before we tell it, we would like to say how they came to be hired, for we think it would be good for every farmer and labourer in Ireland to know.

They went, like the rest of the boys, before five o'clock in the morning to the big tree, in the town near them, and a couple of farmers were going to the big tree too to look for men. One was Mr. Nulty, a fine, free-spoken man, with a pleasant face, and a thriving man he is too. The other was old Mr. Barnes, who ought to be more of a gentleman than Nulty, for he was come of a good family in the country, and he had a property of his own that he farmed; but he was a hard man, and what the Irish called "an ould nigger." And the two fell in on the road; and Mr. Barnes began to grumble, "and its enough to fret a man," says he, "so it is, to be giving them fellows twenty pence a day."

"Why," said Mr. Nulty, "I paid my men twenty-two pence yesterday, and I paid it willing." And so old Mr. Barnes stopped and faced round at Nulty.

"You have paid it willing?" says he.

"Yes, I did," said Mr. Nulty, "and I always do; for I find that willing wages makes willing men."

"Ay," said Mr. Barnes, "that's the way you're always raising the wages on us."

"I find it cheaper, as well as pleasanter," said Mr. Nulty; "and I'll bet you sixpence I had my reaping cheaper yesterday than you had."

So when they came to calculate, they found Mr. Nulty had got his reaping done one-and-sixpence an acre cheaper, at twenty-two pence, than Mr. Barnes had at twenty pence.

"I learned that from a farmer in England," said Mr. Nulty; "he paid his men twelve shillings a week; and when I came to count what his men did, I found he had his work done cheaper than I had here at tenpence a day; and since that, I find that better wages buys labour cheaper. And it stands to reason; for if men find a fair advantage in being good labourers, they will strive to become better still. So I give a penny or twopence more than another, and get the best men; and that makes them better still, and willing men into the bargain."

But Mr. Barnes only grumbled the more, and would not give in; and when they were near the tree, Mr. Nulty stopped to speak to a neighbour, and Mr. Barnes went on to the tree, where Pat and Jem were standing among the boys. So Mr. Barnes said—"Boys, I'll give eighteen pence to-day, though its a deal too much."

"Oh, sir," said Pat, "sure you would not be that hard on poor fellows that's often without work, and has nothing but the big tree to depend to."

"Well," said Mr. Barnes, "try if you can make any more out of the tree." And he went on as if he would not hire them.

"Oh, the hungry beggar," said Tim Reilly, who was standing by.

So Mr. Nulty came on, and "Boys," says he, "I want thirty men, and I'll do what is fair; will you come?"

"That we will, sir," said Pat, "and leave the wages to yourself, and do our best."

And they all said the same, for every man knew

† Other writers have gone beyond Bellarmine in this matter. Socolovius has reckoned up twenty notes of the Church, and Thomas Bozius one hundred! Vide Gerhard, Locor. Theol. tom. v. de ecclesia.

* "Fides Catholica docet, omnem virtutem esse bonam, omne vitium esse malum, si autem Papa erraret præcipiendo vitia, vel prohibendo virtutes, teneretur ecclesia credere vitia esse bona, et virtutes malas, nisi vellet contra conscientiam peccare."—*Bellarm. Mr. Nulty's way; and so Mr. Nulty chose his thirty men, and Pat and Jem among them. And when he got on his horse, he says—

"Now, boys, handle yourselves, and let me see what you'll do, for men are getting mighty scarce in this country; and they will be scarcer yet than ever they were; and we will have to take to the English fashion before long, and every man will have to learn to do double work for double wages, all the year round; and the sooner the better; for that will be better in the end for both master and man."

So he rode off, and his men after him, as fast as they could; and more farmers came in, and wages rose to two shillings; and old Mr. Barnes waited to the last, and had to give two shillings, and got the worst men in the place, and men that would not even be as willing for him as for another.

So Pat and Jem started together, for they had a mile to walk.

"And sure enough," says Jem, "the boys are getting mighty scarce, where there once was plenty; I wonder did the like ever happen in the world before?"

"Well, now," says Pat, "I mind our Saviour Jesus Christ speaking of the labourers being mighty scarce in harvest when he was upon earth."

"Well, I mind that, too," says Jem, "for I read about it; and now I wonder," says he, "what that meant; he said, sure enough, there was a great harvest, and not half people to reap it. And was it the oats he was meaning? For ever since that day we were talking about the stone, and the praty, and the hen, I'm still thinking, when our Saviour talked of the like of them things, he was meaning something else that we ought to learn, and just taking a plain way to teach us."

"Well, I believe that's true, surely," said Pat; "but what could he mean about the harvest, and nobody to cut it?"

"I mind now," says Jem, "that I read that the harvest is the end of the world, and the angels are the reapers. But how could that be, that there were no labourers? Sure it can't mean that God has not angels enough to do what he wanted."

"It couldn't be that," said Pat; "but what can it be?"

So they turned it every way, and could make nothing of the harvest that wanted hands to cut it. And by this time they were at Mr. Nulty's field, for they walked fast.

"So," says Pat, "I wish I had my Bible with me, and we would try and make it out at dinner time."

"Well I have mine," said Jem, "for it is small and handy, and fits in my pocket, so we will try it at dinner time."

And so they turned to, and did their best for Mr. Nulty. And as soon as they got through their dinner, Jem took out his Bible, and they began to look for it.

"I have it here," said Jem, "it's the last two verses of the 9th chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel;" and so he read—"Then saith he unto his disciples, the harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into his harvest."*

"Now try," said Pat, "and find out where he was, and what he was doing, and then maybe we will see the meaning."

So Jem looked back a bit in the chapter. "I have that too," said Jem; "he was preaching the Gospel (v. 35), and when he saw the great crowd of people he had compassion on them, because he saw they were like sheep that had no one to look after them; and then he said it was a fine harvest, only the labourers was very few."

"Surely, then," said Pat, "the people was the harvest. But who were the labourers?"

"Stay now," said Jem, "I see a mark in the side of the page to look to St. Luke (chap. x. ver. 1, 2). And there they found that our Lord sent seventy of his disciples to go before him into every city, and tell the people about the kingdom of God (v. 9); and then he said to them, 'the harvest truly is great, but the labourers are few.'"

"I see it now," said Pat, "the labourers were them that were to tell the people about Christ, and the kingdom of God. Sure isn't it all plain now? Isn't there plenty of people in this field that knows as little about Christ as we did before we took to the reading; and maybe if any one would take the trouble to teach them, they would be as glad as ourselves to learn, for sure there is a deal of the boys that's not satisfied with Father John's ways, and that would be willing to learn better: and would'nt that be the fine harvest? And isn't it the harvest that's losing for want of men to save it?"

"Well, if that isn't true," said Jem; "but where's the labourers? I wonder how it would be if the readers that I hear is about Ballycarny, was to come down this way and try the people here? but sure enough that sort of labourers is few."

"Dead and I think there is many would listen to them ready enough," said Pat, "if they came in to their houses, in a quiet way, of an evening."

"And couldn't we get some of the neighbours to read with ourselves of an evening?" said Jem.

"Why, then, I think we might, easy enough," said Pat, "and a good thing it would be; but, then, wouldn't Father John soon come to hear of that, and wouldn't he destroy us entirely? Why, even Mr. Nulty would hardly dare to employ us, if Father John was to give orders against it on the altar."

"Why, then," said Jem, "if the biggest thistle in Ireland was standing for'nint me to day, I wouldn't stop reaping for fear of pricking my fingers. And if ever we put our hand to Christ's harvest, we will have to face the thistles too; and if we go on reading ourselves, it will come to that sooner or later; and maybe, as Mr. Nulty says of double work, the sooner the better."

"Ay," said Pat, "there's a verse that troubles me often of late, where our Saviour says, that if we are ashamed of him before men, he will be ashamed of us before the angels of God; and, sure, that should make us face thistles and all. But do you think," says Pat, "that we will ever see such a harvest of people in Ireland?"

"It's my opinion," said Jem, "it's coming fast; and, if the readers come down this way, you'll see."

So the bell rang, and they were off to their work; and when evening came, Mr. Nulty paid them two shillings and two pence a man, for he always gave the height of the wages, and a little more; and very thankful his men were, and so was Mr. Nulty, for not a man in the parish had his reaping as cheap by the acre that day.

* As Pat had not his Douay Bible at hand, we have compared all the verses in the two Bibles, and find the sense and meaning the same, only there is a little difference in some of the words.

WHAT SCRIPTURE TELLS US OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

Our readers are familiar with the place which the Blessed Virgin occupies in the theological system of the Church of Rome. She is described as "the gate of heaven," "the queen of angels," "the star of the morning." The late Pope Gregory XVI. declares, that in the midst of the greatest calamities he ever recognised her as his patroness and protectress; that she is our only confidence—nay, the entire ground of our hope; the mother, sovereign, guide, mistress of all men. Or, to quote a still later document—"True Catholics," says the Cardinal De Bonald, "pray no longer, in some sort, to Jesus, except through Mary. For them there are no festivals without her; we might say, that apart from her there is no more hope for them. Her name is found incessantly on their lips, and her image in all their hearts. The church, far from opposing, applauds these bursts of filial piety. From his tempest-tossed bark Peter turns his looks constantly to the star of the sea. It seems that God has given over his omnipotence to his mother." And if our readers call to their recollection the pastoral letters of the present Roman Catholic bishops to their flocks, they will see that the cardinal's statement is perfectly true—"Her name is found incessantly on their lips." We believe that it is impossible to find any such document, of moderate length, in which the Blessed Virgin's name is not mentioned; scarcely one of which a considerable portion is not occupied with expressions of devotion to her, and exhortations to their people to love and reverence her.

Now, we propose to enable our readers to judge whether the Blessed Virgin occupied the same place in the thoughts of the primitive Christians which she holds in the teaching of the Church of Rome. We begin with the writings of our Lord's apostles and evangelists, as they are recorded in the Holy Scriptures. "No doubt," a Roman Catholic will suppose, "the writings of the apostles cannot fail to contain innumerable expressions of their ardent love and devotion to the mother of God; no doubt, in their letters to their flocks, they must repeatedly have taught them the advantages and importance of addressing their prayers to her who is 'our only hope,' and of securing her intercession with her Son." Well, we shall not take upon ourselves to say that there is no such thing in the Bible; but we shall put our readers in a position to judge for themselves. We print from the Douay Testament every passage in which the Blessed Virgin's name is mentioned, after the first accounts in the gospel of the particulars of our Saviour's birth, and we leave it to the reader to say whether the Apostles entertained the same sentiments, with regard to the Blessed Virgin, which are held by modern Romanists, by Gregory XVI., or the Cardinal de Bonald.

If we have inadvertently omitted any passage in the New Testament in which her name is mentioned, we shall be happy to print it in our next number, if any of our readers will point out to us our omission. We believe, however, that our list is complete.

We recommend our readers to begin by reading over the accounts of our Saviour's incarnation and birth, given in the first two chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel, and in the first two of St. Luke's Gospel. It would take up too much space to reprint these chapters here; but any one who reads these chapters (which contain the history of the Virgin, during the early part of our Lord's life), together with the passages we give (which contain all that is told of her afterwards), will, we believe, have read all that Scripture records or teaches concerning her.

Matthew xii. 46, &c. "As Jesus was yet speaking to the multitude, behold his mother and his brethren stood without, seeking to speak to him. And one said to him: Behold thy mother and thy brethren stand without, seeking thee. But he answering him that told him, said: Who is my mother, and who are my brethren? And stretching forth his hand towards his disciples, he said: Behold my mother and my brethren. For whosoever shall do the will of my Father that is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother."

The same story is given, nearly in the same words, Mark iii. 31, Luke viii. 19.

Matthew xiii. 54 tells us that the people who heard our Lord's teaching wondered, and said—"How came this man by this wisdom and these mighty works? Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary, and his brethren James, and Joseph, and Simon, and Jude? And his sisters, are they not all with us? Whence then hath he all these things?"

See also Mark vi. 3, and John vi. 42. "Is not this Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?"

Luke xi. 27. "As Jesus spoke these things a certain woman from the crowd, lifting up her voice, said to him: Blessed is the womb that bore thee, and the paps that gave thee suck. But he said: Yea, rather, blessed are they who hear the Word of God, and keep it."

John ii. 1. "And the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee: and the mother of Jesus was there. And Jesus also was invited and his disciples to the marriage. And the wine failing, the mother of Jesus saith to him: They have no wine. And Jesus saith to her: Woman, what is it to me and to thee? my time is not yet come. His mother saith to the waiters: Whatsoever he shall say to you do ye. Now there were set there six water-pots of stone, according to the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three measures apiece. Jesus saith to them: Fill the water-pots with water. And they filled them up to the brim. And Jesus saith to them: Draw out now and carry to the chief steward of the feast. And they carried it. And when the chief steward had tasted the water made wine and knew not whence it was, but the waiters knew who had drawn the water, the chief steward called the bridegroom, and saith to him: Every man at first setteth forth good wine, and when men have well drank then that which is worse. But thou has kept the good wine until now. This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee: and he manifested his glory, and his disciples believed in him. And after this he went down to Caphernaum, he and his mother, and his brethren, and his disciples; and they remained there not many days."

John xix. 25. "Now there stood by the cross of Jesus, his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene. When Jesus therefore saw his mother and the disciple standing whom he loved, he saith to his mother: Woman, behold thy son. After that he saith to the disciple: Behold thy mother. And from that hour the disciple took her to his own."

These are the only passages which we can find in the Gospels relating to our Lord's mother. The book of the Acts of the Apostles contains all that is known of the history of the Christian Church, for about thirty years after the crucifixion. In this book the only mention we can find of the Blessed Virgin is—

Acts i. 14. "All these [viz., the Apostles] continued with one accord in prayer with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren."

The Douay Testament contains fourteen letters written by the Apostle Paul—viz., one to the Church of Rome, two to that of Corinth, one to the Churches of Galatia, one to the Church of Ephesus, one to that of Philippi, one to that of Colosse, two to the Church of the Thessalonians, two to Timothy, one to Titus, one to Philemon, and one to the Hebrews. In all these fourteen letters we have not been able to discover a single mention or allusion to the Blessed Virgin.

We find next in the Testament the Catholic Epistle of St. James the Apostle. But neither does he make the least mention of the Virgin.

There next occur two Epistles by St. Peter; but this great Apostle not only gives no injunctions to invoke the Virgin Mary, but he does not once mention nor allude to her.

The Testament next contains three Epistles written by St. John the Apostle, to whose special care our Lord had committed his mother: but this Apostle is as silent with respect to her as the rest.

There is also an epistle written by the Apostle Jude, and in this, too, there is not a word concerning the Virgin.

The Roman Catholic must find it singular that in twenty-one letters, some of them long ones, containing all that the providence of God has allowed to be transmitted to us of the instructions given by the Apostles to their flocks, there should be no instructions to invoke the Blessed Virgin—nay, no mention of the name of her who is now described as the only refuge of sinners. The last book of the New Testament is the Apocalypse, supposed to have been written by the Apostle St. John at the close of his life, and in which we ought to expect to find anything necessary to be believed and practised, which had not been recorded in the previous part of the canon of Scripture. In this book, however, we are equally unable to find any mention of the Blessed Virgin.

We have now laid before our readers everything we can find in Scripture on the subject of the Blessed Virgin. We make no comment on these passages, but invite our readers to compare them for themselves with the teaching of the Church of Rome on the same subject. On a future occasion we may, perhaps, give an account, in like manner, of the doctrine of the Fathers of the first three centuries with regard to her.

INFALLIBILITY.

In the early numbers of this paper we reprinted in full an essay on this subject by the present Archbishop of Dublin, and stated our intention of giving the reply in a future number. The press of correspondence and other original matter has hitherto obliged us to postpone that reply, for which (as we have already done) we beg again to apologize to our readers, and proceed now to perform our promise, by giving them, in a condensed form, the substance of by far the ablest answer which has come to our notice—that of the Rev. Patrick Murray, D.D., Professor of Dogmatic and Moral Theology in the Royal College of St. Patrick, Maynooth.*

We think it very satisfactory that an answer to Dr. Whately should have been undertaken by a gentleman of acknowledged ability, and holding so high an official position as an accredited teacher in the church; and we cannot but commend the temperate and courteous tone in which it is written, as well as the tact and ability of the writer. Whether he has succeeded in proving what he professes to have shown—viz., that the Archbishop "has completely failed in his argument against the doctrine of infallibility"—we must leave to our readers to judge, after perusing the arguments which we now lay before them; or, what would be still better, the original essays themselves, which we would strongly recommend to every one interested in this important controversy.

THE ARCHBISHOP'S ARGUMENT.

Such of our readers as are in possession of his grace's essay (for which see our first and second numbers), will remember that its leading argument is substantially as follows:—

St. Paul, in his farewell address to the elders of Ephesus and Miletus (Acts xx. 29-31), gives them a very solemn warning (repeated in several of his epistles) that after his departure false teachers should arise, and even from among themselves (from the bosom of their own Church), who should teach perverted doctrines to draw away the disciples after them, against whom he calls on them to watch, and to remember that, by the space of three years, he ceased not to warn every one, night and day, with tears.

If we had not these accounts in the Bible, the archbishop observes, that it might seem incredible that any such thing should have taken place, or that false teachers should have been permitted to gain a hearing, or have been able to draw away the disciples from the faith; and we might have been disheartened, and felt as if God had forsaken his Church, in leaving Christians to find their safety against such false teachers in watchful, careful, and honest examination of every doctrine taught; but from these passages we see, that from the very first, this care and watchfulness were indispensably necessary to guard against the danger of false teachers introducing corruptions of the true Gospel; and that, even then, Christians were required to be on their guard against the grievous wolves in sheep's clothing, who would enter in, not sparing the flock. "But how does St. Paul," continues the Archbishop, "tell his hearers to provide against this danger?

"Does he promise them that the primitive or early Church shall be safe from it? that no inroads of error will take place for the first three or four hundred years?

"Or, does he tell them that they will find their safety in apostolical succession? that it is miraculously provided that no teacher shall ever mislead them, who has but been regularly ordained by himself, or by those appointed by him to succeed him in the office of ordaining?

"Or, does he tell them that when any point of doubt and difficulty arises, they are to find safety in applying to Peter and to those who shall be divinely appointed from time to time as his successors and representatives for decisions and directions that cannot be wrong? Not a word is said of any Apostle but himself: or of any one who should succeed him in the apostolic office. To himself, during his life, they would naturally apply by letter, if opportunity offered, for directions in any case of doubt that might arise. But not even any Apostle—much less any successor of an Apostle—is mentioned by Paul as the infallible guide, whom, after his own death, they were to consult.

"Or, does he bid them resort to some central Church—whether at Jerusalem, or at Rome, or at Byzantium—and seek there for infallible guidance?

"Or, does he direct them to summon a general council, or assembly of all Christians, and refer every question that may arise to the decision of a majority of its votes; with a full assurance that these should be so supernaturally overruled by the Holy Spirit as to secure them from the possibility of mistake?

"No: he makes no allusion whatever to any other Church or prelate; to any successor of Peter or of the other Apostles; or to any infallible council, as their guide. But he tells them to TAKE HEED TO THEMSELVES and to the flock they are set over; he tells them to 'watch;' and he exhorts them to remember his own earnest warnings to them.

"Now, if there had been provided by the Most High any such safeguard as had been alluded to—if Paul had known of any order of men, any bishop, or archbishop, any particular Church, or general council, designed by Providence as an infallible guide, and as a sure remedy against errors and corruptions, would he not have been sure, on such an occasion as this, to give notice of it? If when he foresaw the peril of the Church, like that of a ship in a dangerous storm, he had known of a safe port, just at hand, and easily entered, is it to be believed that he would never have alluded to it, but have left his hearers exposed to the storms? Would he have been, in that case 'pure'—as he declares he was—'from the blood of all men?' Can any one seriously think, that against the dangers which he had been warning them of, and weeping over, for three years, he knew of a complete safeguard, and yet was so wanting in his duty—so careless of their well-being—as never to make the slightest mention of anything of the kind? To suppose this would be to suppose him destitute not only of all faithfulness in his high office, but of common prudence and good sense. And yet, if any such provision really had been made by the author of our faith, it is utterly inconceivable that the Apostle Paul should have been—and that, too, on such an occasion as this—left in utter ignorance of its existence.

"Whatever may be the precise meaning of our Lord's promise—'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world'—it is, at least, perfectly clear what it could not mean; it could not relate to anything either unknown to Paul, or kept back by him from his hearers. All that he knew, and that it was for their benefit to learn, he had, as he solemnly declares, taught to them, and this was no less than the whole counsel and design of God. 'I take you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men. For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God. Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them. Therefore watch, and remember, that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one, night and day, with tears.' From all this we may learn, among other things, how great is the mistake of those who are satisfied that they can trace up to a very early period—to what they call the primitive Church—some doctrine or practice not found in God's holy Word; and they consider this as showing God's approbation of what may have been, after all, one of the 'perverse things' introduced by false teachers, and against which Paul so earnestly warned the elders."

The archbishop then proceeds to observe "that the exposure of Christians to those dangers, and the call upon them, both ministers and laity, for the continued exercise of watchful caution, is far from appearing to be either what we would wish, or what we would think probable in a revelation from God. It is opposed both to men's feelings and to their expectations.

"To examine again and again—to think and consider—to hesitate and to make up one's mind cautiously—to be always ready to hear anything fair that can be said—and to acknowledge that, after all, we may be mistaken; all this is, on many accounts, contrary to men's natural inclinations. Some have no confidence in their own judgment, and are, therefore, afraid of being left in any way to its guidance; some are so proud that they cannot bear to acknowledge themselves in doubt or uncertainty; some are so indolent that, they do not like the trouble of thinking and deciding; some wish to escape the anxious cares connected with such a state, and cannot bear to be in the least degree of uncertainty. And hence there is a strong prejudice or feeling beforehand, in favour of any system which promises to put an end to the work of inquiry at once and for ever, and to relieve us from all embarrassing doubt and uncomfortable self-distrust. And this is done, either by setting forth the authority of an infallible church, which is to mark out, on every point, what we are to believe and to do; thus relieving us from all trouble and anxiety, and from all necessity of acting on the Apostle's warning to 'take heed to ourselves:' or, again, by putting in place of such a church immediate inspiration from heaven, whether bestowed on each individual who belongs to a certain sect or party, or on some highly-gifted leader, who will communicate to his followers the messages he receives from heaven. Widely different, in many points, as these sects, and parties, and churches are from each other, they all agree in the one fundamental point just noticed. They all address themselves to that powerful principle in human nature already noticed, the craving for infallibility in religious matters.

"It is true, that hardly any one is found who in words claims or expects to be personally infallible; still we may truly say, that there is in human nature a craving for infallibility, which inclines men beforehand to receive the pretensions, either of a supposed infallible church, or of those who claim or who promise immediate inspiration. Accordingly, some persons waver for a time between these two kinds of pretensions, and at last give in to the one or the other. Again, you may find persons changing from the one to the other, and sometimes thus changing more than once: and it might be added, that one may find instances of the same individual, himself unchanged, exposed to severe blame at different times, not only from different persons, but even from the same; first, for refusing to join the one party, and afterwards for refusing to join the other most opposed to it; both parties much as they are opposed to each other, still always clinging to the confident expectation of finding that infallibility above spoken of. They are inquiring only after a way of freeing themselves from the trouble of all further inquiry. Their care is only to relieve themselves, in the end, from all further need of watchful care. They are like men in a ship, searching for a perfectly safe harbour, in which the helm may be abandoned, and the ship left to ride securely, without any need of watching the winds and currents, and of looking out for rocks and shoals. They hope to obtain, in all ages of the Church, that freedom from all need of watchful circumspection, which was not granted even in the ages of the Apostles; for we find that, even when there were these infallible guides on earth, Christians are perpetually warned of the danger of mistaking 'false apostles' for true."

DR. MURRAY'S ARGUMENT.

After some preliminary remarks, and referring to Archbishop Whately's observations upon the craving for infallibility in religious matters as a powerful principle in human nature, and to the Protestant doctrine of the all-sufficiency of Scripture as the sole rule of faith, containing all that is necessary to be believed or followed to make men wise unto salvation, Dr. Murray proceeds thus:—

"Now, if this theory of the sufficiency of Scripture be true, and if the temptation to admit an infallible authority be such as Dr. Whately describes it, then no light presumption would exist that a specific admonition against a danger so imminent—so deeply rooted in human nature—so peculiarly, because of its own nature, permanently, and incurably, fatal to sound doctrine—would have been given by our Lord or his Apostles, and would have been pretty clearly recorded in Scripture. The presumption becomes infinitely stronger when we consider that there is a number of passages in both the Old and New Testaments, which (I take for granted Dr. Whately would admit) seem, at first sight, to imply something very like what we call infallibility. Such are those texts of the prophecies in which the Church of the New Law is represented as for ever so pure and glorious, ever finally triumphant over all her enemies, ever beloved of God and protected by him. Still more distinct and emphatic are the passages of the New Testament, wherein it is said that the invisible enemies of the Church should never prevail against her (Matt. xvi. 18); where our Lord promises to be with his Church

* Published by Gerald Bellew, 79, Grafton street; Dublin, 1852; in the third volume of a series of essays, chiefly theological, originally entitled the Irish Annual Miscellany.

It was our intention to have reprinted this essay verbatim, as we had done that of Archbishop Whately; but on application for permission to do so, were referred by Dr. Murray to his publisher, Mr. Bellew, who refused such permission in terms less courteous than we should have expected, giving us, at the same time, unlimited power to abuse Dr. Murray's essay (which, we suppose, was without Dr. Murray's authority, and are not likely to avail ourselves of), and cautioning us against giving, even by way of extract, more than one-fourth of the essay in question. It is not, therefore, our fault, which we hope our readers will observe, that we do not give the whole of Dr. Murray's reply in his own words.

all days—that is, permanently, without ever deserting her for a single moment—even to the end of the world (Ibid. xxviii. 20); where he promises that the Paraclete, the Spirit of truth, shall be given to the Apostles, and be with them, and abide in them for ever, and teach them all things and recall to their memory all things which he had revealed (John xiv. 16, 26—xvi. 13); where the inspired Apostle calls the Church the pillar and the prop of truth.—1 Tim. iii. 15, &c.

"I am not now asserting (though I firmly believe) that these texts prove the infallibility. All I assert is, that they furnish some very plausible grounds for that doctrine. Taking this, therefore, into account, together with the danger arising from 'the craving after infallibility,' a very strong presumption arises, that, according to the Protestant doctrine on the sufficiency of Scripture, some corrective should have been furnished in some parts of the Sacred Volume. As the texts of the Old Testament, which seem to promise a temporal king in the Messias are sufficiently explained by the many striking passages which clearly foretell a suffering Messias, and which, therefore (especially when joined with the evidences furnished by the Gospel), compel us to interpret the pictures of temporal glory and power as but types, sensible and earthly images of the spiritual kingdom which is not of this world.

"Of course, I do not insist on the preceding as if it proved anything decisively: only as Dr. Whately is so very much given to this sort of presumptive a priori reasoning (I mean a priori in reference to dogmatic proof), it is not useless to show that we, too, are not wanting in presumptive arguments."

After these preliminary remarks, Dr. Murray thus proceeds:—

"But I am delaying too long from the examination of Dr. Whately's argument on the text of St. Paul—a text which, I suppose, he would say, furnishes the required corrective. Let us see.

"I. The argument may, for facility of examination, be put in the following form:—

"If Christ had established any infallible authority on earth for defining articles of faith and settling controversies, St. Paul (to whom, of course, such an institution would have been known) would surely have referred thereto as a means, or the means, of overcoming the dangers which he warns against. Nor would he have confined himself to exhorting the elders to watch over themselves and their flock, to remember his own earnest warnings, &c., as if these were their only means of safety. But St. Paul does not say one word about such authority; on the contrary, he confines himself to the exhortations just stated. Therefore no such infallible authority was established.

"ANSWER.

"I deny the two first propositions; and, in direct and absolute contradiction to them, assert that, supposing an infallible authority to have been established, in the first place, St. Paul was in no way called upon to refer to it as a security against the evils described by him, and that he did point out the only real means of security; that, in the second place, it would have been idle and beside his purpose to refer to it; and that, in the third place, such reference would have been in the highest degree inexpedient and pernicious.

"First. The object of the Apostle's address in no way required that he should make any reference whatever to the infallible teaching of the Church.

It is plain from the repeated assertions of St. Paul that those whom he was addressing had received from him full instruction in the whole body of the Christian doctrine, and in the economy of the Christian dispensation. They, therefore, had no need to recur to an infallible tribunal to learn for the first time what they had already known before, or to learn more fully and distinctly what they had previously received but partially and obscurely. St. Paul had taught every one of them—taught them night and day, through their houses, for three years—had taught them the whole counsel of God; withheld nothing that was profitable. The instruction was perfect; their knowledge was complete; they needed no further teaching from any tribunal, fallible or infallible.

"The case, then, which St. Paul contemplates, was not that of danger from their ignorance or want of information, still less from 'any point of doubt or difficulty arising' as to what was or was not taught by him—that is, as to what was, or was not revealed doctrine.

"This is made, if possible, still plainer by the words in which he describes the very case, and the only case, he contemplates. Their danger was from 'ravening wolves,' from men 'not sparing the flock,' from men 'speaking perverse things,' and trying thereby 'to draw disciples after them.' Mark his words—'Take heed therefore to yourselves and to the whole flock wherein the Holy Ghost has placed you bishops, to rule the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. For I know this, that after my departure ravening wolves will enter in among you, not sparing the flock. And of your own selves shall rise men speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them. Therefore watch,' &c. (v. 28, &c.)

"That is to say, the danger was from undisguised heretics and schismatics, endeavouring to corrupt their faith ['speaking perverse things'], and to break the unity of the Church ['to draw disciples after them'].

"This was the enemy they had to combat. How, then, were they to meet and defeat him? By flying to an infallible church, an infallible council, or an infallible see? For what purpose? To learn the true doctrine, to learn whether they were to embrace the perverse teaching? But all this they had already learned, and learned from an infallible Apostle. They had received the whole counsel of God, each one of them; nothing had been withheld.

"They already possessed the treasure of sound doctrine. The danger to which they were afterwards to be exposed, and of which the Apostle forewarns them, was the danger of losing this treasure. Their duty was to preserve it. And now I assert, that the means pointed out by St. Paul were the means and the sole means of fulfilling this duty: the means whereby Christian bishops and other pastors through all time are to protect themselves and their flocks against the assaults of heresy and schism. Another infallible authority could only repeat and evolve the instructions here laid down. Listen:—

"'I have not spared to declare unto you all the counsel of God.' You have now the whole body of Christian doctrine from a divinely commissioned and infallible authority: you require not now to seek any more, to be taught over again.

"'Ravening wolves will enter in among you,' &c. When I am gone, the unity and faith of the Church will be assailed among you. I warn you of the danger. As the homely proverb has it—Forewarned, forearmed.

"'Take heed to yourselves—watch.' What mean these weighty words? What means Christian watching against the snares and attacks of the devil and his ministers? It is not as the watching for an indifferent event, as for an eclipse of the moon, or the arrival of a pageant. It is watching for the coming of an enemy, who, if he finds you unprepared to resist him, will capture and slay you. It is a practical watching; a watching with your spiritual armour on; a watching in faith, and humility, and prayer, and the practice of all virtues—for by such weapons only are these 'ravening wolves' defeated. You need not run here or run there to look for the truth of Christ: you have received it from me: it is within you: keep it, and these are the means of keeping it: Take heed to yourselves—watch.

"'I commend you to God and to the word of his grace, who is able to bind up,' &c. God's grace will strengthen you to overcome the dangers I foretell: ask it: adopt the means of securing it: trust in it.

"'Keeping in memory,' &c. For three years have I laboured among you, teaching every one of you, teaching all the counsel of God. Forget not my labours and instructions: keep them before your minds: in the recollection thereof you will see the deformity of perverse teaching, and fly from it.

"'Take heed.....to the whole flock, wherein the Holy Ghost hath appointed you bishops to rule the Church.' You are the pastors of the people. It is the duty of pastors to watch over the flock, to protect them. Your pastoral vigilance is a divinely appointed means of saving them from the inroads of heresy and from all sin.

"'If, in our own day, St. Paul were to come down on earth to warn the bishops of any country against approaching trials—e.g., against a new heresy on the Divinity of our Lord, what fuller and more apposite instruction could he give them than he gave at Ephesus—even in the hypothesis of a permanent infallible authority? Should he direct them to direct themselves to that authority? For what purpose? To teach them more clearly and surely the Divinity of Christ? But this they, by the hypothesis of the case, already know and believe most firmly; as the ancients at Ephesus knew and believed most firmly all the counsel of God. To settle a controversy? But, by the hypothesis, there is no controversy except the deadly controversy between the Church and heresy; as the controversy foretold by St. Paul was to be only between the Church on one hand and the ravening wolves on the other. To teach them how to preserve the orthodox faith in themselves and their flocks? But no infallible church need be consulted to learn this, St. Paul has given the lesson once for all. Not he alone, nor he on this occasion only. It is written in the plainest characters on every page of the Gospel—'Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation.' It is in every catechism: it is one of the simple elements of Christian morals: it is a Christian 'household word:' children learn it with the first rudiments of faith. No new appeal to infallible authority is necessary for Christian bishops to learn it. Yet it is all that is necessary for them to know, and for all to know, in order to overcome the dangers foretold by St. Paul.

"'In a word, the function of infallible authority, as such, is to 'PRESERVE,' define, propose, teach sound doctrine, and proscribe erroneous doctrine. They already possessed the whole of the sound doctrine in its purity. The danger to which they were to be exposed was that of falling away from the truth, of losing the grace of faith. That grace is to be preserved, like every other by avoiding the occasion of sin, by watching and prayer, and pastoral supervision. These are the means established by God, and no other.

"This is enough. It is, therefore, evident, in the first place, that, supposing a perpetual infallible tribunal to have been established, St. Paul was in no way called upon to refer those whom he was addressing to such tribunal, or to any tribunal whatever, as a preservative against the perils described by him.

"Secondly. From what has been said, it is equally evident that it would have been idle and impertinent in St. Paul to have made any such reference. For recourse to an infallible tribunal is not the means, nor in any way a part of the means, of overcoming the dangers in question.

"Thirdly. Such reference would have been not only useless, but positively pernicious.

"For 1°. As recourse to a NEW judgment of the infallible tribunal is not a means of overcoming the danger, to refer thereto, for such a purpose, would have been to turn men's attention from the true means of meeting and subduing temptation, to false and inefficient means. It would be like recommending the officers of a beleaguered garrison to send a deputation to the Queen in parliament assembled, to know whether they should desert to the enemy. They require no authority to tell them that their duty is to fight the enemy and beat him back, but in no case to desert to him. Or it would be as if one, after telling a traveller that there are wolves in the quarter he is entering, and after describing the animals' appearance so minutely that there is no possibility of mistaking it, should conclude by saying—'You will surely meet "ravening wolves" on your journey; and when you do meet them, I would counsel you to send your servant to a competent judge in the next village, to know whether the animal is really a wolf and really mischievous.' Meantime the wolves pour down and kill all before them. The true advice would be—'Keep a sharp look out over yourself and your attendants, and trust to the accuracy of your aim and the goodness of your rifle'—Take heed: watch.

"2°. Such reference would imply that a new sentence or definition of the infallible authority was needed. That is, it would imply a direct contradiction to St. Paul's own repeated assertions, that he had communicated to them the fulness of divine truth.

["It may be said that, although the generation of ancients addressed by St. Paul had been fully instructed, and, inasmuch as the sure means of preserving the knowledge thus communicated were pointed out to them, they could not, without grievously sinful neglect, ever after lose any part of the deposit of faith; yet, in after times, under the pressure of persecution or from other causes, the knowledge of men might become imperfect, and doubts and difficulties might arise, that would require the intervention of an infallible tribunal to settle, if such tribunal existed.

"To this I answer, 1°. Though the warnings and instructions of the Apostle are in their general sense applicable to all times and places, yet the specific danger which he here foretels is manifestly one that was to occur not long after. For he says, 'after my departure ravening wolves will enter in;' a form of words which could not with propriety be used to designate a far distant event. And he immediately adds, as if to impress on them more strongly the proximity of the evil—'And of your own selves shall arise men speaking perverse things.' We learn accordingly from his epistles to Timothy, who was at the time Bishop of Ephesus, that these 'ravening wolves' did actually appear during that generation and very soon after his own departure. 'Having faith and a good conscience, which some rejecting have made shipwreck concerning the faith. Of whom is Hymeneus and Alexander,' &c.—1. Tim. i. 19, 20. 'Thou knowest this that all they who are in Asia, are turned away from me; of whom are Phigellus and Hermogenes.'—2 Tim. i. 15. St. Paul might have contemplated a general case, the general fortunes of the Church in after ages; but he did not contemplate except a particular case, and shaped his admonitions accordingly.

"From the fact just established, a fresh, distinct, unanswerable argument presents itself against Dr. Whately's proof, which may be thus briefly stated.]

"An infallible authority—namely, that of St. Paul and the other Apostles—was actually living, speaking, teaching, defining, at the very time when the dangers foretold by St. Paul were to occur and did occur. But St. Paul does not refer to this infallible authority as a means of providing against those dangers. Therefore he did not think it necessary to refer to an infallible authority, though existing, as a means of providing against those dangers.

"2°. St. Paul, as I have already shown, is not contemplating the case of bona fide doubts and disputes within the Church. He was, therefore, in no way called upon to prescribe what was to be done in such case. The case before him was altogether different; his instructions are confined to it.

"More might be said, but let this suffice. Dr. Whately's palmary argument, therefore, from the silence of the Apostle, so far from being 'alone fully sufficient to establish' the fallibility of the Church, leaves that dogma quite untouched, has no force whatever against it, of any kind, in any degree."

EDITORIAL REMARKS.

In presenting to our readers, side by side, the arguments of his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin and the Rev. Professor of Theology at Maynooth, and making some remarks upon the latter, it is of course right to hold in mind that neither his Grace nor Dr. Murray purport to give all the arguments on their respective sides of the much controverted but most important question, whether God has given to mankind, in addition to a Divine revelation of his will, a living infallible tribunal, to guide them to the right interpretation of it. Neither of the essays have gone into the general question in the way of proof or reply; and it is but fair to the Rev. Dr. Murray to observe, that he expressly guards against the supposition that he proposes to go into the general question, which, however, in p. 82, he holds out a hope that he will hereafter do, by entering fully into what he calls the Catholic proof; a task which we should gladly see well executed, and which we doubt not—if executed by Dr. Murray—would prove as interesting to every sincere inquirer after truth, as it would be important to the Church at large, if any such proof could be given as to deserve the name suggested by the learned professor.

Dr. Murray, for the present, however, expressly confines himself to an examination of Dr. Whately's proof against infallibility, or at least "what is entirely new therein, or put forward in a new form."

In order to appreciate the real weight of either the attack or the defence, it will be proper to invite the attention of our inquiring readers a little more minutely to the interesting passage in the Acts of the Apostles, ch. xx., out of which this controversy originated.—St. Paul was at Miletus, in Asia, on his way from Macedonia to Jerusalem, where he was anxious to be, if possible, on the day of Pentecost, and, therefore, not having leisure to revisit Ephesus (which was then the most important church in that part of Asia), but being anxious to take a final leave of the Ephesian Church, knowing "that they should see his face no more," he from Miletus sent to Ephesus and called the elders of that church, whom, in v. 28, he states had been made by the Holy Ghost overseers (i. e., bishops) of the flock, to feed the Church of God, and addressed to them the solemn exhortation and warning from which Archbishop Whately selected the text on which he bases his argument. We shall give the passage in full from the Douay Bible.

ACTS xx. 15.

15. And the day following we came to Miletus.

16. For Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus, lest he should be stayed any time in Asia. For he hasted, if it were possible for him, to keep the day of Pentecost at Jerusalem.

17. And sending from Miletus to Ephesus, he called the ancients of the church.

18. And when they were come to him, and were together, he said to them; You know from the first day that I came into Asia, in what manner I have been with you for all the time.

19. Serving the Lord with all humility and with tears, and temptations which befell me by the conspiracies of the Jews;

20. How I have kept back nothing that was profitable to you, but have preached it to you, and taught you publicly, and from house to house.

21. Testifying both to Jews and Gentiles penance ("repentance," English version) towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.

22. And now behold, being bound in the spirit, I go to Jerusalem, not knowing the things which shall befal me there.

23. Save that the Holy Ghost in every city witnesseth to me, saying: that bonds and afflictions wait for me at Jerusalem.

24. But I fear none of these things, neither do I count my life more precious than myself, so that I may consummate my course, and the ministry of the word which I received from the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God.

25. And, now, behold I know that all you, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, should see my face no more.

26. Wherefore I take you to witness this day, that I am clear from the blood of all men.

27. For I have not spared to declare unto you all the course (English version, "counsel") of God.

28. Take heed to yourselves, and to the whole flock, wherein the Holy Ghost hath placed you bishops (English version, "overseers"), to rule the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood.

29. I know that after my departure ravening wolves will enter soon among you, not sparing the flock,

30. And of your own selves shall arise men speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them.

31. Therefore watch, keeping in memory that for three years, I ceased not with tears to admonish every one of you night and day.

32. And now I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, who is able to build up, and to give an inheritance among all the sanctified.

33. I have not coveted any man's silver, gold, or apparel, as

34. You yourselves know: for such things as were needful for me and them that were with me, these hands have furnished.

35. I have showed you all things, how that so labouring you ought to support the weak, and to remember the word of the Lord Jesus, how he said, "It is a more blessed thing to give rather than to receive."

36. And when he had said these things, kneeling down he prayed with them all.

37. And there was much weeping among them all; and falling on the neck of Paul, they kissed him.

38. Being grieved most of all for the word which he said, that they should see his face no more. And they brought him on his way to the ship.

Now.

1. We think it must be plain to any candid reader of the Apostle's address, that the thing which chiefly moved him to these earnest exhortations to "watch and remember," was a sense of the dangers to which the Church at Ephesus would be exposed upon his removal from them. It was the prospect of the approaching withdrawal of him—a living infallible guide—which moved him to make such a pathetic appeal to the fallible pastors, to whom he was now as he supposed, for the last time, committing the flock which he had gathered. It is not reasonable, therefore, to suppose that, upon such an occasion, he was thinking merely of the danger to which the pastors would have been exposed under all circumstances, and whether he was present or absent. He could not have been thinking merely of temptations under which they might lie to a wilful rejection of what they knew to be his doctrine—a wilful separation from what they knew to be the Catholic Church—a wilful setting at nought of what they knew to be Apostolic authority. Nor, indeed, would the remedy which he prescribes for the dangers which he did foresee have been any remedy against such dangers as we have just alluded to, and which seem to be the only ones thought of by Professor M. To REMEMBER the Apostle's doctrine would, it is manifest, be no safeguard against wilfully and knowingly rejecting or falsifying that doctrine. On the contrary, that doctrine could not have been wilfully and knowingly rejected or falsified except it had been remembered.

But there was plainly a danger perceived by him to which (1) the pastors here addressed would be peculiarly liable in the Apostle's absence, and (2) against which the remedy prescribed by St. Paul would be an appropriate remedy—namely, the danger of, through heedlessness, forgetting some part of those large expositions of the whole counsel of God which the Apostle had made to them. There manifestly was in his view a danger that, after the Apostle's departure, his doctrine might be first partially forgotten and then misrepresented; and such a danger could only be guarded against either (1) by the pastors diligently remembering every point of his doctrine in its true sense; or (2) by their having, when any question arose, recourse to some infallible guide who could assure them what the Apostle's doctrine really had been.

Even in the Apostles' lifetime, upon occasion of their temporary absence from churches they had founded, we find that several doubts arose about the meaning of their doctrine, and that several points of it were forgotten and misrepresented. See particularly 2 Thess. ii. 1, 2, 3, 5; 1 Cor. vii. 1; and compare John xxi. 23, and 2 Peter i. 12—15; Jude 3. And in such cases it appears that the Apostles themselves interposed by writing, to set the churches right. And, indeed, we find the Apostle Paul, after this very address, writing an epistle to this same Church of Ephesus, to remind them of his doctrine; but as time went on, and the absence of the Apostles was not merely temporary but perpetual, it is plain that such dangers would be vastly increased.

Now, according to Roman Catholics, there was a remedy provided for the dangers thus likely to arise from that infirmity or remissness on the part of the pastors which St. Paul, in this passage, looks forward to with so much apprehension—namely, a living infallible guide, maintained constantly in the Church, to supply their deficiencies. And the difficulty which Dr. M. has to meet—and which we humbly conceive he has not met, but only shuts his eyes to—is, why, under such circumstances, St. Paul did not mention or allude to that remedy.

2. And this will be still more evident if we consider that the warning of the Apostle is addressed to these elders, not in their personal capacities, but as officers of the Church. The danger which the Apostle is contemplating is not so much guilt that might be contracted by these men individually, through a breach of their duty, as the damage which might accrue to others by their remissness: that so "grievous wolves might enter in, not sparing the flock;" and that "of their own selves should men arise speaking perverse things—i.e., giving a distorted statement of the Gospel—to draw away the disciples after them." What he was mainly anxious about, therefore, must have been, maintaining the orthodox faith among the people over whom the Holy Ghost had made these men bishops.

Now, he had, as we have seen, before his mind the thought of the possibility of these very bishops losing, through remissness, the memory of some of the things which he had taught them, since, otherwise, it would have been puerile to exhort them so pathetically to "WATCH AND REMEMBER." He had, therefore, fully before his mind the very case in which a living infallible guide would be most necessary, and in which an appeal to that guide would be most advisable; and yet he says not a word of such a guide, or of any reference to him.

These elders, in short, are supposed by Dr. M. to have been fallible men, placed in circumstances of imminent danger, and having on one side fallible means of preserving the Apostle's doctrine in their own private memories of his words, and their own private judgment of the meaning of those words, and of the just references to be drawn from it; but, on the other, an infallible guide at hand, by consulting whom they might at all times be set right. And the apostle is represented as distinctly recognising their infallibility, and the fallibility of the means which they had of themselves for preserving the tradition of his doctrine; and yet spending his whole time in exhorting them to a diligent use of those fallible means, without dropping a hint of the infallible guide, who could at any time rectify their mistakes or supply what they had forgotten; and all this, while his great subject of anxiety was the preservation of the knowledge of the true faith in the flock committed to their care!

The Apostle is, in fact, represented by Dr. Murray as saying—"Hitherto I have been able to give you guidance and direction; but hereafter, though there will still be continued to the Church at all times the same infallible guidance, so that even, if all the Apostles were now scattered and slain (which is a thing likely enough), yet still the infallible director would continue. Notwithstanding all this, you, in dealing with the errors which are likely to be introduced, even by bishops themselves, however mischievous or however subtle, do you trust to your own fallible private recollection of my teaching, and to your own fallible private judgment of its meaning, for it would be 'idle and pernicious' to think of consulting, in such cases, the infallible guide, who is, however, quite necessary for the Church, and will be perpetually maintained in it." Now, can any one suppose that this is a rational account of the Apostle's conduct?

3. Again, the elders whom the Apostle was addressing, were what the law would call a kind of body corporate, a body having a succession. They were an order of teachers intended to subsist, as an order, to the end of the world. Now, in a solemn charge to such a body of men, one's thoughts are naturally carried on from the present individuals to their successors. And not unreasonably; because we commonly hope that the principles and rules of acting, once fixed in such a body, will be carried on and transmitted through its whole succession. There is seldom a total sudden change in the members of such a body. But the old members fall off, and new ones come on gradually, one by one; so that the whole line has an appearance of continuity; and the new members may be expected to be influenced by the old ones, and to inherit, as it were, the instruction which they received.

Hence the Apostle would naturally feel that, in addressing these elders, on their duty after his removal, he was laying down maxims to regulate both them and their successors. It was, we know, the duty of these bishops not only to teach the laity, but to continue their own order; and he must have hoped that the solemn charge, which he was then delivering to them, would be fondly cherished in their recollections, and repeated by them to those who should come after. He was now leaving his last legacy of warning to a permanent body of teachers, for their direction, under very dangerous circumstances, and in a time of persecution, when some changes in the members of that body might speedily be looked for. It would be strange, therefore, if his mind were not carried on to view them under this aspect, and address, in them, their successors also; and, therefore, very strange that, speaking under such circumstances, to such a body, he should say nothing of the infallible guide, supposing such to exist.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have been obliged by press of matter to postpone the insertion of several volued contributions, already in type, and beg to apologize to our Celbridge correspondent for our delay in noticing his communication.

Mr. Power's letter reached us too late for our present number, but shall be inserted in our next.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER, 1852.

We have on several occasions directed the attention of our readers to the mighty movement that is now agitating the minds of men, on the subject of religion. It was natural that we should do so, for it was this which called our journal into existence, and it is this which gives it any interest that it possesses. We have looked at the great movement of religious opinion, candidly and dispassionately. We have not attempted to conceal the real facts, but rather have aimed at showing them just as they really are. We have not pretended that the changes in religion which thus arise, are all upon one side; on the contrary, we have repeatedly called attention to the remarkable fact, that each side succeeds in making converts from the other—converts remarkable either for their number or their importance.

In the introductory article in our first number we said:—

"It is a notorious fact, that a convulsive movement of religious opinion is in progress, such as these countries have not witnessed for three hundred years. It does not exist merely in one locality, nor is it confined to a particular class of men; on the contrary, it has spread, like an electric current, to the remotest corners of the empire, and has pervaded all ranks of society. The Premier Duke of England in his ancestral castle, the learned professor in the time-honoured University of Oxford, the peasant in the lonely wilds of Connemara and Kerry, have alike felt its influence, and bent beneath its power. . . . We are daily informed that some fresh individuals, few or many, have relinquished their old religious belief—that a Roman Catholic has become a Protestant, or a Protestant has become a Roman Catholic."

In the article on "Conversions and Perversions," in our third number (March), we put it in the same light:—

"The wonder is, that these conversions take place on both sides; Protestants have become Romanists, and Romanists have become Protestants."

And if we have thus fairly stated the facts, with perfect impartiality, we trust we have also dealt with those facts in a calm and Christian spirit. Immediately after the passage above quoted, we went on thus:—

"Now, we do not mean to dispute the sincerity of either party in their change. The spirit in which this journal is conducted, does not allow us to impute unworthy motives, nor are we at all disposed to do so. . . . Let others act as they will, we, in this journal, are determined not to seek for truth in abusing our opponents instead of arguing with them; for the sincerity of their motives, we know that they must give an account to God. All we are concerned with is, what reason each can give for his change of religion."

We trust we have never, in any instance, lost sight of this rule of conduct which we then proposed to ourselves.

It was this great stirring of the opinions and minds of men that brought our journal into being; and, feeling that our undertaking is the child of such a mighty movement of opinions, it is natural that we should call attention to its facts.

Here we must necessarily, though unwillingly, take a more partial view (in the present article) of this movement. While hundreds in England, chiefly from the clergy and the higher classes of society, have joined themselves to the Roman Church, in Ireland it has been wholly different. We have already, in the article on "Conversions and Perversions," in number 3, considered the comparative importance of the conversions which have taken place in the two countries; and our present object is to direct attention to the facts as they exist in Ireland.

That there is a great stir going on, and that thousands, and tens of thousands, are actually changing their religion in Ireland is a notorious fact. And here we may repeat an observation we have made before, that where there are so many changers in religion, there must be a vast multitude more who are thinking about religion.

This striking fact is now admitted on all hands. The Dublin Evening Post, a paper no way favourable to Protestantism, thus spoke of it November 11, 1851:—

"We learn from UNQUESTIONABLE CATHOLIC AUTHORITY, that the success of the proselytizers, in almost every part of the country, and we are told in the metropolis, is beyond all that the worst misgivings could have dreamt of. There is not only no use in denying these statements, but it would be an act of treachery to the best interests of the Catholic Church to conceal them, or even to pass the matter over as a thing of no great moment."

The Tablet is the newspaper of Dr. Cullen and the Roman Catholic priests and clergy; and the Tablet of Nov. 8, 1851, thus speaks:—

"We repeat that it is not Tuam, nor Cashel, nor Armagh, that are the chief seats of successful proselytism, but this very city (Dublin) in which we live."

The fact must have been very notorious and undeniable, when it is thus confessed by the leading Roman Catholic newspapers. Of course they would deny such a thing if they could.

We have lately learned a fact, upon good authority, which shows how this movement is extending. Dr. Plunket, the Bishop of Tuam, has held confirmations through the diocese of Tuam, in each of the years 1849, 1851, 1852. In those three years he has confirmed in the faith of the Church of England and Ireland, in that one diocese alone, no less than TWO THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED AND FOURTEEN converts from the Church of Rome! and this is steadily increasing; for the number confirmed by him this year is larger than in either of the former years, being eight hundred and forty-one.

This gives us some idea of the work that is going on. The number of converts is, of course, much larger than the number of converts confirmed; and the number who are thinking and inquiring about religion must be vastly greater than the number of converts.

We hear two opposite accounts of the nature and extent of this movement. Some say that all these persons are bribed: and that only for the bribes there would be no converts at all. Others say that only for the fear that the people are in, at the consequences of changing—the fear of losing employment, and becoming "marked men" among the people—the number of converts would be tenfold greater.

We confess we have no faith in accounting for all this by bribery. We know of no funds for the purpose; and we do not think so ill of the Irish Roman Catholics, as to believe that thousands of them could be found in a single diocese to sell their religion and their souls for paltry bribes. We think this story of the bribes an unjustifiable slander on the people of Ireland. We know that the penal laws did not get the Irish Roman Catholics to change their religion; and we do not believe that money will be any more successful. Surely no Roman Catholic will be offended at our expressing such an opinion!

It appears to us that the plain and practical way of testing the different reasons which are given for these conversions is, to inquire what the Irish Roman Catholics do, when they go to a place where they are at liberty to do as they please, and where it is not pretended that any bribery is used.

Our readers will at once remember how many Irish Roman Catholics have gone to America; and we are sure will be anxious to learn whether they continue Roman Catholics there. And it so happens that we can answer this by the testimony of a witness whose testimony nobody can question. The Rev. Mr. Mullen, Roman Catholic Curate of Clonmellon, in Westmeath, is known as a man of great ability, and great zeal for his Church. This Roman Catholic clergyman was sent by the bishop of his church to America, on a special mission, about a year since. While there his natural activity and love of Ireland led him to examine closely into the condition of the Irish Roman Catholics who have gone to America. He wrote home a letter telling how he found things; and this letter was published in the Freeman's Journal, a Roman Catholic newspaper, about the end of last April. No one can suppose that such a man would give a worse account of Irish Roman Catholics in America than truth required him to give. We, therefore, may rely upon his testimony; and we give his statement as he gives it himself:—

"Is there to be no voice raised that will keep the people at home, and thus save millions from spiritual destruction? I say millions; here are my facts:—

"The present population of the United States is about 15,000,000, and of these the Catholic Church claims only 1,980,000.

"From the year 1825 to 1844, 1,250,000 left Ireland, one million of whom came to America; the proportion of Catholics among them may be fairly estimated at 800,000. Since that period to the present, the numbers who emigrated here from Ireland, at the lowest calculation, were 1,500,000; and, taking the Catholics as above, we will have in nine years 1,200,000.

"A large number (say half a million) came from Germany, some from Italy, France, Belgium, and other countries, during the last ten years, half of whom were Catholics, say 250,000.

"Twelve years ago America had a Catholic population (according to Dr. England, Bishop of Charleston) of 1,200,000. Calculating the increase of this number by births, at the very small number of 500,000 and adding for converts in the larger cities and towns 20,000, we will have the following total:—

"Catholic emigrants from the year 1825 to 1844	800,000
"Catholic emigrants from the year 1844 to 1852	1,200,000
"Catholic emigrants from other countries	250,000
"American Catholic population 12 years ago	1,200,000
"Increase by births since ...	500,000
"Number of converts	20,000
"Number who ought to be Catholics ..	3,970,000
"Number who are Catholics ...	1,980,000
"Number lost to the Catholic Church	1,990,000

"Say, in round numbers, TWO MILLIONS!"

Incredible as this statement may seem, it is impossible to doubt its correctness; for surely nothing but the clearest evidence could bring such a statement from a priest in whom the Irish Roman Catholic bishops place such confidence, as to intrust him with so important a mission.

It is clear, from this statement, that three-fourths of the Irish Roman Catholics, who have gone to America in the last twelve years, have ceased to be Roman Catholics there.

There is no charge of bribery there. Such a charge would, indeed, be absurd; for the whole public revenue of the United States, if applied in bribing converts, would not be sufficient to bribe such numbers. No such wholesale system of bribery could be practised without being discovered; if discovered, or even suspected, the Rev. Mr. Mullen would not have failed to have held it up to the righteous execration of the civilized world. Mr. Mullen makes no charge of the kind; and, therefore, we may be satisfied that no shadow of ground exists for saying that all these changes are effected by bribery.

Here we see what Irish Roman Catholics do where no bribes are offered to them, but where they are simply at liberty to do as they please.

Why should we be surprised if some thousands, or tens of thousands, are doing the same thing at home? Why should we say that it must be bribery here, when so many more do it there, where there is no bribery at all?

Let us refrain from slandering our fellow-countrymen; and let us consider what other reason can be given for it.

We have found, in the Tablet newspaper of the 31st of last July, a letter, written by a Roman Catholic missionary priest, employed among the Irish Roman Catholics in America, during those very twelve years of which Mr. Mullen speaks; and this missionary thus undertakes to account for it:—

"I declare it as my own experience of twelve years in the western missions, and I appeal for its truth to every missionary, of longer or shorter experience, the fact that apostasies from the faith of St. Patrick is owing, with scarcely an exception, to the want of religious instruction in which these unfortunate people were literally raised. . . My humble advice, therefore, to those whom it may concern, IN IRELAND, is, teach all the children, and many, very many of the adults, the Christian doctrine."

We think this explanation is not far from the truth; but we do not think that it is the truth.

We never heard of a multitude of men changing their religion while they continued in stupid ignorance. It is when men's minds begin to work, that these things happen. When men attain to the first and hardest step in the path of knowledge—namely, the knowledge of their own ignorance—then they will take some active step in the search for truth. We met with a remarkable instance of this not long since. WE SAW an address, signed by 243 Roman Catholic heads of families, in a parish in the west of Ireland, and presented by them to the Protestant clergyman of that parish. We shall never forget the simple and forcible statement it contained —"We find that we have lived in ignorance, and that we are like to die in the same." And they asked him to build them a church, and to give them instruction. Their request was complied with, and they now learn from him the Word of God.

It was not their ignorance that led them to this, but the DISCOVERY they had made of their ignorance.

We have now shown, from unquestionable testimony, what is going on in Ireland and in America. In such a state of things discussion and inquiry is essential and inevitable. Our journal was established to afford a means of this discussion; and the manner in which Roman Catholic laymen have come forward for such discussion in our pages, is not the least remarkable sign of the times.

It has been our endeavour heretofore, and will be for the time to come, to conduct this discussion as sincere lovers of truth, and in a spirit of Christian love towards all our fellow-countrymen.

THE TOUCHSTONE.

OBJECTION 9.—Protestants to justify their revolt from the Old Church, affirm, that she had revolted from God, and that God Almighty had cast her off.

Their own Bible assures them that God Almighty has made a solemn oath, that this should never be (Isaiah liv. 9, 10)—As I have sworn, that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth; so I have sworn that I would not be wroth with thee (the Church) nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee. Where it is worthy our notice, that this whole chapter is acknowledged, by the contents prefixed to it in the Protestant Bible, to have been spoken of the Gentile Church, to which St. Paul himself applies the first verse of it—Gal. iv. 27.

OBJECTION 10.—Protestants, to justify their revolt from the Church, pretend that God Almighty's covenant of peace with his Church was not everlasting, and that he did not promise that his sanctuary should be in the midst of his Church for evermore.

Their Bible, in plain terms, contradicts both parts of this their assertion (Ezek. xxxvii. 26), where God Almighty, after having promised by his prophet the coming of Christ, and the establishment of his kingdom —that is, of his Church—tells us, Moreover I will make a COVENANT OF PEACE with them. It shall be an EVERLASTING COVENANT with them: And I will place them, and multiply them, and will SET MY SANCTUARY IN THE MIDST OF THEM FOR EVERMORE.

REPLY TO 9 AND 10.—Protestants do not affirm these things. They hold that, though the Christian Church had fallen into grievous and damnable errors, it had never wholly revolted from God; nor do they believe that the Almighty had ever cast her off. On the contrary, they believe that God's Spirit never abandoned his Church since the fundamental points of Christianity were maintained, and the means of knowing God's will were preserved among Christians. Otherwise, the Reformation—which was not any new revelation, but merely an assertion of the doctrine contained in the acknowledged Scriptures—could not have taken place. Just so God had not deserted the Church of Israel, amidst all its corruptions, as long as the means of salvation were preserved, and there was ever so obscure a remnant who used them. This abiding of God's Spirit, then, is the "covenant of peace" which he promised by his prophet to make with his Church—this is the "sanctuary" which he has set in the midst of them for evermore."

OBJECTION 11.—Protestants deny that Christ's Church upon earth is always visible; because they will have it, that for many ages, before their religion came in, there was no true visible Church upon earth.

Their Bible, in many places, expressly assures us, that Christ's Church is always visible; comparing it to a mountain upon the top of mountains, exposed to the view of all nations flowing unto it—Is. ii. 1, 2, 3, &c., and Micah iv. 1, 2. To a great mountain filling the whole earth.—Dan. ii. 35. To a city set on a hill which cannot be hid.—St. Matt. v. 14.

REPLY.—Protestants do not deny that Christ's Church is, and always has been visible (see reply 10), but they hold that this visible church consists, and has always consisted, of various communities or churches, acknowledging one and the same invisible Governor, and called one in reference to him—the Lord Jesus Christ—whose "body," this collective assembly, is called in Scripture, and concerning which the prophet said—"All nations shall flow into it." And accordingly they find Paul addressing epistles to several distinct churches, without giving any hint of their being all subject to Rome. He says nothing of the kind either in his Epistle to the Romans, or in his epistles to other churches. And the Apostle John, in the Book of Revelations, addresses seven churches in Asia as distinct communities, subject only to their Divine Master.

OBJECTION 12.—Protestants maintain, that the whole Church of Christ is not in one only society or religion; but that many different sects, divided from each other in faith and communion, may nevertheless all belong to the Church of Christ.

Their Bible plainly teaches the contrary, in which our Saviour tells us (St. John x. 16)—Other sheep I have which are not of this fold (viz., the Gentiles, who were then separated from the Jews), them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be ONE FOLD AND ONE SHEPHERD. And St. Paul (Ephes. iv. 4, 5)—There is ONE BODY, and ONE SPIRIT, as you are called in one hope of your calling, one Lord, ONE FAITH, one baptism. Nor, indeed, is it possible, according to the Scripture, that the Church of Christ should subsist, if she were split into many sects, divided from each other in faith and communion: For every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand.—Matt. xii. 25.

REPLY.—Protestants do indeed maintain (see reply 11 and 7), that the Church of Christ is made up of different churches divided in respect of ordinances, but united in all fundamental points of faith, and therefore belonging to the "one fold," under "one Shepherd—Jesus Christ.

The quotation from Matt. xii. 25, 26, seems to have nothing at all to do with the subject of divisions in the Christian Church. It was an answer to those persons who were attributing the miracles of Christ—especially the casting out of devils—to Satan. If Satan allows his ministers (our Lord argued) to do the things belonging to the kingdom of God—"if Satan cast out Satan," he is divided against himself, "how shall then his kingdom stand?" for (v. 25) "every city or house divided against itself shall not stand."

It may possibly appear somewhat startling to our readers, that so eminent a Roman Catholic theologian as the Professor of Theology at Maynooth, should have declared, in the passages we have quoted in extenso from his essay in another column, page 101, that watchfulness and prayer are the means and the sole means, of "preserving the treasure of sound doctrine, when once possessed; and consequently, that the silence of St. Paul, with respect to the existence of an infallible authority, as a preservative against the evils of heresy and apostasy, arose simply from the fact, that to have referred to an infallible authority, as a security against the evils described and apprehended by St. Paul, would have been not only idle and impertinent, but actually pernicious.

"It is written," says Dr. M., "in the plainest characters, in every page of the Gospel, 'Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.' This is one of the simple elements of Christian morals; no new appeal to infallible authority is necessary for Christian bishops to learn it. The danger to which they [i.e., those who already possessed the whole of sound doctrine in its purity] were to be exposed, was that of falling away from the truth—of losing the grace of faith; and that grace is to be preserved, like every other, by avoiding the occasion of sin, by watching and prayer, and pastoral supervision. These are the means established by God, and no other," therefore, "it would have been idle and impertinent in St. Paul to have made any reference to a perpetual infallible tribunal, for recourse to a perpetual infallible tribunal is not the means, nor in any way a part of the means of overcoming the dangers in question."—pp. 37, 38.

With every word of this we can agree with Dr. M., and have no doubt but Archbishop Whately and all sound Protestant divines would do so too; and if this be sound Roman Catholic theology, and consistent with the doctrine of infallibility, as held by the Roman Catholic Church, we must admit that Archbishop Whately's argument from the silence of St. Paul is greatly (so far as it is designed against the Church of Rome) weakened, if not answered, by Dr. Murray's reasoning. It is, however, we think, something new to find an accredited teacher of the Church of Rome asserting that prayer and watchfulness are the means and the sole means of preserving and transmitting in their integrity the doctrines of religion, when once they have been delivered in their fulness; in other words, that, for the prevention and avoiding of heresy or schism, an appeal to a living infallible guide on earth is not only useless, but injurious; the chief boast and pride of the Church of Rome having hitherto been that by its infallibility, and that alone, unity can be secured to the Church or schism prevented; and however the authorities of the Irish Roman Catholic Church may be induced to wink at Dr. Murray's argument, as a convenient mode of reply to a difficult Protestant objection, we are disposed to believe that the Roman Catholic Church will never consent, in real truth, to allow her members to treat her boasted infallible authority as superseded or needless, and to substitute for it the mere exercise of watchfulness and prayer (which every one can practise for himself); nor is it likely, we think, that the Roman Catholic laity will consider that they derive much benefit or relief from risk and anxiety in following the teaching of an infallible guide, if they are once convinced by Dr. Murray that they must, after all, still rely exclusively upon watchfulness and prayer as the sole means of continuing in the true faith (just as if they were Protestants and had no such infallible guide to trust to as a preservative against error).

That Dr. Murray, himself, does not, however, feel quite sure of the Catholicity of such a doctrine, and is anxious to leave himself a loophole to escape by, if needful, is evident from the same page (38) of his essay, in which it will be observed that he defines the function of infallible authority to include preserving sound doctrine, as well as defining, proposing, and teaching it. These are his words—"The function of infallible authority, as such, is to preserve, define, propose, teach sound doctrine, and proscribe erroneous doctrine." To be consistent with his argument, his sentence ought to have run thus—"The function of infallible authority, as such, is not to preserve but to define, propose, teach," &c. The passage as it stands is, in fact, contradictory of his whole argument; for if one of the functions of an infallible authority, as such, be to preserve sound doctrine, recourse to it would at least be a part (and, if so, surely a most important part) of the means of overcoming the danger of falling away from the truth, and losing the grace of faith, which Dr. Murray, in the very same page, expressly denies to be the case. Is it not, therefore, plain, that Dr. Murray is obliged either to exclude "preserving sound doctrine" from the functions of an infallible church, as he virtually does in this argument, or to admit that his reply to Archbishop Whately is wholly inconclusive and illogical? And before going further, we call on Dr. Murray to answer this plain question, suggested by his own inconsistent statements—does the function of an infallible authority, as such, include or exclude the preserving sound doctrine? And upon what authority does he so define it either in one way or the other? We confess, however, at the same time, that we do not see that Dr. Murray would get over the difficulty, even by correcting his definition, and excluding from it the word "preserving," for it is also part of his definition of the functions of infallible authority, as such, to "proscribe erroneous doctrine," and how it will be possible to hold that, while at the same time asserting that it is not any part of its functions to "preserve sound doctrine," and still more, how it can be part of its functions to "teach," and no part of its functions to "preserve" sound doctrine, exceeds our powers to conceive; and if there be any such infallible tribunal authorized to teach sound doctrine, and proscribe erroneous doctrines, such a tribunal would obviously be the most effectual, as we believe the majority of Roman Catholics believe it actually to be the only effectual preservative against "falling away from the truth," and, therefore, would be such a means of preserving truth as St. Paul could not have been silent about when warning the Ephesians against the perils he described, and which Dr. Murray calls the "danger of falling away from the truth, and losing the grace of faith."

We don't accuse Dr. Murray here of intentionally resorting to ambiguity of language (an expedient too commonly and sometimes successfully resorted to by controversialists), but we think he has here unintentionally fallen into it. What are we to understand by the words "the grace of faith" in the passage we have just quoted? Does he mean a personal grace existing in an individual? It is, indeed, true that this grace, the personal Christian grace of faith, is to be preserved by prayer and watchfulness. But what has this to do with the present question? The Apostle was not speaking of "faith" as a grace or state of mind, but of "faith" in the objective sense, as the truth to be believed; and if Dr. Murray uses the word "faith" as it is a grace or state of mind, his argument is irrelevant—but if he uses it as meaning the "whole" body of "Christian doctrine," the "whole counsel of God" of which St. Paul was speaking, and which he so emphatically had just stated "that he had not spared to declare it to them," then Dr. Murray is reduced to assert that an infallible tribunal is of no value whatever in preserving "the whole body of Christian doctrine" or else to admit that St. Paul either was ignorant of it, or designedly but unaccountably omitted to mention the most complete safeguard and preservative against error, a divinely commissioned infallible Church, which if any such existed would be, as Archbishop Whately argues, "to suppose St. Paul destitute not only of all faithfulness in his high office, but of common prudence and rationality."

But Dr. Murray attempts to get out of the difficulty by making an assertion of which he seems to us to have given no semblance of proof. He says (p. 34) the danger was from undisguised heresies and schismatics, endeavouring to corrupt their faith ("speaking perverse things"), and to break the unity of the church ("to draw disciples after them").

This, surely, is a grave error in Dr. Murray's reasoning. What ground has he for limiting the danger to that from undisguised heretics? Was not that from disguised heretics far greater? Can Dr. Murray really think the "ravening wolves" here spoken of by St. Paul to be different from the "false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into apostles of Christ and ministers of righteousness," whom he speaks of in 2 Cor. x. 13—even as "Satan himself transforms himself into an angel of light"—or different from those "wolves in sheep's clothing" against whom our Lord warns his hearers. Were these, too, undisguised heretics? In what age of the world, we would ask, did undisguised heretics appear, and who were they, and how was it that they succeeded? Was it of undisguised heresies and schismatics St. Paul was speaking when he exhorted the same Ephesians (4 ch., v. 14) in these words—"That we be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive?" Can we possibly suppose any false teacher undisguisedly avowing himself to be a heretic, and openly speaking "perverse things," and trying thereby to induce men to become his disciples? Was it from teachers who should come in the open way, as "undisguised heretics," that St. Paul apprehended so great danger, as to have warned the Ephesians night and day with tears to watch and take heed unto themselves? Was it not obviously against disguised and unsuspected heretics that they were not only to combat but to watch? Has not the principal danger in all ages been from these? and was it not in order to detect and unmask those disguised and deceitful false teachers of perverse things, who were "to arise among themselves," that St. Paul was warning them so earnestly—men who would gloss over and misinterpret Holy Scripture and apostolical teaching, and attribute to the Apostles what they never said or wrote as part of their Divine teaching, and against whose subtle craftiness it would ever require the greatest watchfulness to guard themselves? It was not merely against ravening wolves from without, but against wolves in sheep's clothing within that the Ephesians were to guard; and what means could be so proper to detect those disguised heretics as that same infallible tribunal, whose function it is, according to Dr. Murray himself, to "proscribe" erroneous doctrine, and expose and punish heresy? And yet St. Paul is wholly silent concerning it.

Dr. Murray represents the Apostle as anxiously warning the elders against palpable and open dangers, which any one could see, and saying nothing of those subtle ones which are always the most dangerous. He represents this skilful and honest pilot of the church as warning the crew, whom he was forced to leave in the hour of peril, to take care of the cliffs and promontories which they could plainly see with their own eyes, and yet saying nothing of the sunken rocks and hidden shoals which lay in their course, and which might easily escape their notice. Is this natural or credible?

And when Dr. M. specifies in particular the denial of Christ's divinity as one of the errors which fallible pastors are quite competent to deal with effectually, is it not odd he should not have remembered that this was the very point which the first General Council was assembled to decide upon?

But Dr. Murray, after basing his whole argument on the assumption that the ancients of the Churches of Miletus and Ephesus (who had enjoyed the benefit of St. Paul's personal teaching, and learned the whole counsel of God, each one of them, from him as an infallible Apostle) were the persons exclusively addressed by St. Paul on this remarkable occasion (a position which, we think, we have already disproved), was too acute not to perceive that this was not a point likely to be conceded without proof, and he therefore thinks it prudent to show that he had not altogether overlooked it; and alludes to it, in p. 40, as if it were a matter, however, of trifling moment, and easily disposed of. See the paragraph marked with brackets in p. 101.

Here we join issue with Dr. Murray, and beg to dissent from what he calls "the fact just established" as a fact not established at all; for though we agree with him that "the warnings and instructions of the Apostle are in their general sense applicable to all times and places," we think he has altogether failed in establishing that the specific danger which he here foretells is manifestly one that was to occur not long after. What is his argument to establish this? The whole of it is this—"For he says, after my departure ravening wolves shall enter in," "and of your own selves shall arise men speaking perverse things." Now, observe, St. Paul does not say, "immediately or shortly after my departure," nor allude to any particular time or event, but uses words which, with perfect propriety, might be used to designate either an event or a series of events which were not to happen until after his death—events quite as likely to happen fifty years after his death as a few years after it. What is it but this—"While I remained with you, to teach and warn you day and night with tears, you had me, of course, to refer to on all occasions of difficulty, but after I am gone, as you can no longer refer to me, keep an anxious watch against false teachers, who will try to mislead you"—a practical exhortation, which would surely be as applicable, if not more applicable, to their successors than to themselves. Were the exhortations of uninspired philosophers, such as Socrates or Aristotle, ever considered as addressed to their immediate disciples alone, and not understood as equally applicable to all their followers? And how much more the words of an inspired Apostle, who had the acknowledged power of working miracles in confirmation of everything he taught? And which of his hearers could have limited the caution of St. Paul as applying exclusively to the natural lives of those to whom he spoke, merely because, in addressing such a class as the ordained pastors of the Church, he used the phrase "of your own selves," instead of the synonymous one "of your own body?" The fact that during the life of Timothy, who was then Bishop of Ephesus, Hymeneus and Alexander, Phigellus and Hermogenes "made shipwreck concerning the faith"—i. e., apostatized from Christianity—assuredly affords no additional proof that St. Paul exclusively confined his warning to those who actually heard him; and until some better proofs than those given by Dr. Murray shall be produced, we cannot consent to treat it as "a fact established" that though St. Paul might have "contemplated a general case (the general fortunes of the Church in after ages), he did not contemplate any except a particular case, and, therefore, shaped his admonitions accordingly." On the contrary, we must continue to hold that St. Paul selected this occasion for addressing truths of general importance to the whole Church of God, especially when we see that his companion, St. Luke, writing under Divine guidance, thought this address was a suitable one to form a part of what was to be delivered down, for the benefit of all after ages, in the Holy Scriptures, and be received as an authoritative part of the Gospel of the grace of God, which St. Paul "received of the Lord Jesus," and was commissioned "to testify," not to the Ephesians only, but to the whole Gentile world. If this be the fact, and his words be admitted to be applicable also to the Church in after times, when (to use Dr. Murray's own words), "under the pressure of persecution or from other causes, the knowledge of men might become imperfect, and doubts and difficulties might arise that would require the intervention of an infallible tribunal to settle, if such tribunal existed," the silence of St. Paul as to the existence of any such tribunal, is not only unexplained by Dr. Murray, but the Archbishop's primary argument, as Dr. Murray calls it, is, we think, left quite untouched and unanswered. It appears, indeed, to us that Dr. Whately so shaped his objection, that no other reply was possible, except that which Dr. Murray has attempted to give, but which has led him unavoidably into an admission at variance with the doctrines of his Church—an admission which, if it means anything, amounts to this—that an infallible authority is unnecessary for the transmission of Divine truth, inasmuch as when Divine truth has been once fully given to a church, infallibility is no longer requisite, even as a means for the prevention of disputes, or detection of heresy; the sole means of preserving the treasure of sound doctrine being, "watching and prayer, and pastoral supervision," which are obviously as open to the members of the Church of England which denies, as to those of the Church of Rome which asserts the existence of an infallible guide and judge of controversies. On the whole, however we may admire the ingenuity and boldness of Dr. Murray, and appreciate his temper and courtesy as a controversial writer, we think his attempt at replying to Archbishop Whately's essay has not only failed, but is one of the most distinct and explicit abandonments of the necessity for an infallible Church which we have yet met with in any Roman Catholic writer.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I am really much surprised you should assert, in page 78 of your July number, middle of second column, that I make the decrees of General Councils the sole interpreter of Scriptures; that I mention this alone, (!) and, of course, that I believe in no other.

How can you reconcile such a proposition with the 7th paragraph of my letter, top of page 69, and 3rd column of June number, wherein I expressly affirm that the clergy are to be regarded as the judges appointed by God to expound the law, and their expositions to be considered binding? Ezekiel xliv. 24; Mal. ii. 7; Acts viii. 26, and subsequent verses; 2 Cor. iii. 6.

I certainly do say that the sense in which the CATHOLIC CHURCH has held, and does hold, the Holy Scriptures, can be best ascertained—in fact, is embodied—in the decrees of her General Councils, which were convened at different periods to condemn various heresies; and, in doing so, have necessarily given, and set forth in detail, the Church's sense and interpretation of such portions of Scripture as from time to time were heretically relied upon, and advanced against Catholic doctrine.

That I deem perfectly satisfactory and consistent, in reply to the oft-repeated question of where the true sense of the Holy Scriptures is to be found, which the Roman Church professes to enjoy, but which, it is alleged, she has never published.

Your commentary, in this particular, resembles very much the wailing of a man under the discipline of a drummer. You are neither pleased with the interpretation of priests nor councils, and wish to be left all to yourself.

Will you give me leave to ask, by what authority you next proceed to excommunicate from the Protestant fold Socinians and some others (?) whom you do not look upon as Christians, though they call themselves Protestants? Have they not as clear a right to exercise their private judgment, and protest as you? How can you write that you know of no difference among any Protestant bodies about articles of faith, when there are essential differences between the United Church of England and Ireland, and what, by Act of Parliament, is styled the Protestant Presbyterian Church of Scotland? You state that your church law of divorce does not allow the separated parties to marry; if so, why are such married by clergymen of the Church of England, not only as ministers, but likewise as principals?

You make a distinction between religious observances &c., &c., and articles of faith, to which I readily accede, and am most happy to have elicited; I only pray you to extend the same indulgence to Roman Catholics, and not everlastingly be calling on them for Scripture proof of such and such religious practices and observances, which are matters of individual predilection, and not of general or Catholic belief.

You conclude by observing, that if the Church of Rome had not been guilty of serious errors, you would not have been justified in leaving her communion. Whether the Church of Rome has erred in its teaching is but a matter of opinion; whether it is the church founded by Christ and his Apostles, and, in despite of powers and principles, enjoys a perpetuity, is a matter of fact. The living Church, in direct descent, is the test and confutation of all false churches.

For a moment, and for the sake of argument—admitted it has become corrupt, what justification is that for your separation from her fold? I challenge you to produce a Scriptural authority for dissent. Dissent is nowhere recommended in the New Testament; quite the contrary. The Church of Galatia was corrupt; St. Paul, nevertheless, did not exhort its members to separate from, or come out of it, but to remedy its abuses. The Church of Corinth was corrupt; the Apostle acted in the same way with respect to it. The Jewish Church was corrupt, exceedingly corrupt in our Saviour's time, yet he, whom if we follow we walk in the fulness of light, so far from separating from it, attended on its ministrations, paid its charges, inculcated obedience to its ministers; in a word, exhibited the example of a scrupulous regard to its ecclesiastical authority. When the Corinthians had a mind to introduce something like schism and dissent into Christianity, St. Paul thus rebukes them—"Is Christ divided?"—1 Cor. i. 13. Nor should Christ's fold be so; but one, under one shepherd.

I remain, sir,

Your very obedient,

M. V. AYLMER.

July 31, 1852.

We would be most unwilling to misrepresent Mr. Aylmer's opinions, and most anxious to correct any mistake, if we have made one. We are not yet sensible that we have done so; but if Mr. Aylmer can show us that we have, we will make the fullest amends.

It is true we did say "Mr. Aylmer makes the decrees of General Councils the interpreter of Scripture; he mentions this alone, and, of course, he believes in no other." Mr. Aylmer asks us did we not observe that he had said before, "the priests are to be regarded as the judges appointed by God to expound the law, and their expositions to be considered binding?" We did certainly observe this; but, then, we know that Roman Catholics differ very much about the sense to be put upon these words; some very ignorant men speak as if everything that any one priest may say, is to be received as gospel, infallibly true. Other Roman Catholics, who have more knowledge, treat this doctrine with as much contempt as Protestants do, and admit it to be clearly false; these say that when we speak of the expositions of priests as binding, it can mean only what all priests agree in teaching, and not what each individual priest may say. And when we come to ask how we are to know what teaching all priests do agree in, we find two different answers; one party tells us that we are to read what priests have written, to search all their books, to find out all their opinions, and then to form our judgment, of what they agree in. Now, we confess that our experience makes this the most impossible task that ever was imposed upon mankind. Suppose that we even could find out, in this way, what all the priests in the world at the present day do agree in, it would not only cut out much which Mr. Aylmer would keep in, but we should not even then be at the end of the question; for, what if we should find, as we certainly should in many cases, that the priests of a former age thought differently? Truth must be the same in all ages. Let us take an example to illustrate this method. Does the discourse of St. John's Gospel, chapter 6, apply to the Holy Sacrament or not? There is no question concerning the interpretation of Scripture, of greater practical importance in the controversies of this day. Will Mr. Aylmer show us how we are to ascertain the general sense of all the priests of the present day upon this? We ask him just to try and tell us how we can ascertain this? Will he try? And if he could, what if we should be able to show that the greatest and most learned priests of his own church, in ages not long past, taught the very opposite?

It is the absolute impossibility of finding out the general agreement of all priests in this way, that has led the wisest and most learned men of his own church to say, that we are to look for the authoritative exposition of priests only in the decrees of General Councils.

There are three different senses in which the judgment of priests is held binding:—

1st. What any priest may say.

2nd. The general agreement of priests, gathered in some vague way, no one can tell exactly how.

3rd. The solemn judgment of priests laid down in General Councils, so that the world may have some chance of finding out exactly what it is.

Those who hold that the judgment of priests is binding, consider themselves at liberty to hold any of these three opinions. If we should, at any time, mistake the sense in which any individual holds the judgment of priests binding, some allowance ought to be made for us, seeing that Roman Catholics differ so much among themselves about the sense of these words.

We gave Mr. Aylmer credit for the last of these opinions, as being the least opposed to common sense, and that which is most commonly adopted by learned and wise men in his own church; and if we have erred in supposing that this was the sense in which he used the words, we do not think this should be any ground of offence to him.

We think his own words led us naturally to think that this was his meaning. Here is what he said:—"You have inquired where the true sense of the Holy Scriptures is to be found, which the Roman Church professes to enjoy, but which you assert she has never published. To which I reply, that the sense in which the Catholic Church has held, and does hold, the Holy Scriptures, can be best ascertained—in fact, is embodied—in the decrees of her General Councils." Now, if he had only said—"Can be best ascertained," we should have understood him to imply that there might be other binding expositions, which were not contained in the decrees of Councils; but when he adds that the church's sense of Scripture is "embodied" in those decrees, we understood him to say that the whole authoritative exposition which priests have to give, is all contained in the decrees of Councils. If we have mistaken his meaning, it was this led us astray.

If he will now say that there are other expositions of priests, which are not contained in the decrees of General Councils, but which are yet to be considered binding, we beg that he will tell us 1st, what they are; 2nd, where they are to be found; 3rd, how we are to know them; 4th, where they have been published. We would beg of him, and of every one else who may read this paper, to try and produce SOME ONE INSTANCE of an exposition of priests, of any one passage of Scripture, which exposition is not depending on the decree of a Council, and yet is binding; and to tell us on what principles it is binding.

Can any one give us such an instance?

We suspect that when Mr. Aylmer considers this more carefully, he may be content to fall back on the sense we put on his words, and to grant that there really is no possible way of ascertaining the binding exposition of priests but by their formal decree in a Council.

This is certainly the most plausible sense to put on the binding authority of priestly expositions. Yet even this Mr. Aylmer may find too large to be maintained.

For instance, will he accept all the decrees of the General Councils of Constance and Basil? Are they all binding? Can he venture to answer this?

Or will he be bound by all the decrees of the four first General Councils? Can he venture to answer this—yes, or no?

Or will he be bound by all the decrees of the second Council of Nice? All these are difficult questions for him; but we must leave them for the present. If he will now tell us in what sense, and to what extent he considers the expositions of priests binding, and how we are to ascertain those which are binding, we will take care not to misrepresent his opinion.

Mr. Aylmer next asks—"By what authority you next proceed to excommunicate from the Protestant fold Socinians and some others whom you do not look upon as Christians, though they call themselves Protestants?"

We reply—1st. Socinians deny the essential doctrines of the Gospel, as they are plainly laid down in Holy Scripture.

2nd. They deny those doctrines as laid down in the Catholic creeds, which certainly contain the faith of the Catholic Church.

We, therefore, cannot acknowledge Socinians as our brethren in the faith of Christ, and in his Church.

Will Mr. Aylmer deny that these reasons are sufficient? If he will deny it, can he show any reason for rejecting Socinians that will be plainer, simpler, and more sufficient?

Mr. Aylmer says—"That there are essential differences in articles of faith between the Church of England and Ireland, and the Presbyterians in Scotland." If this were so, it would be no part of our business to defend those who differ from us in articles of faith. But we are not at all aware that it is so; and we must ask Mr. Aylmer to explain in what articles of faith they differ from us.

The prohibition against marrying a woman who is put away (Matthew v. 32), evidently applies to one who is put away contrary to Christ's command. No marriage with one so put away has ever been sanctioned, that we know of, by English law. Can Mr. Aylmer venture to say that no marriage with one put away contrary to Christ's command, has ever been sanctioned by the Roman Church?

Mr. Aylmer admits our distinction between articles of faith and religious observances, &c.; and says—"I only pray you to extend the same indulgence to Roman Catholics, and not everlastingly be calling on them for Scripture proof of such and such religious practices and observances," &c. We think Mr. Aylmer is under a mistake; it is true we call for Scripture proof of the creed of Pope Pius—that is, of the articles of faith of the Roman Catholic Church. With respect to religious practices and observances, which are not of general or Catholic belief, we only require that they shall not be contrary to Scripture. Let Mr. Aylmer look back through our journal from the beginning, and see if we have not limited our demands to this. He himself has called for Scripture proof of the calendar of the English Prayer-book! Why should he charge us with everlastingly doing what we have not done, and he has done?

Mr. Aylmer relies upon the mere fact of the succession of the Roman Church, as sufficient to condemn those who leave her, because her doctrine is corrupt. Does Mr. Aylmer not know, that the succession of the Greek Church from the Apostles is a fact quite as undeniable as the succession of the Roman Church? Does Mr. Aylmer think that the succession of the Greek Church is sufficient to prevent any one leaving her communion on account of corrupt doctrine? The succession of the Church of England and Ireland is as clear as either the Roman or the Greek.

Mr. Aylmer says—"You conclude by observing, that if the Church of Rome had not been guilty of serious errors, you would not have been justified in leaving her communion." We acknowledge that we used an incorrect expression. The Church of England and Ireland has not refused to hold communion with the Church of Rome; we have always professed our readiness, and our desire, to hold communion with her in all things lawful by the Word of God, the Catholic creeds, and the decrees of the General Councils of the universal church. The Church of Rome has refused to hold communion with us, unless we will do things which God forbids, and profess things which he denies; and, on our declining to do these things, the Church of Rome has withdrawn her communion from us. We wish it could be otherwise; but the guilt of separation rests with her, not with us.

Mr. Aylmer maintains, that a church becoming corrupt is no justification for separation from her. He illustrates and proves it thus—"The Church of Galatia was corrupt; St. Paul, nevertheless, did not exhort its members to separate from, or come out of it, but to remedy its abuses." We submit that this is precisely what has been done in the Church of England and Ireland.

But does that instance of the Church of Galatia prove that separation from a Church can never be lawful? Was not this said to the Galatians—"Though we or an angel from heaven preach a gospel to you, besides that which we have preached to you, let him be anathema."—Gal. i. 8, Douay Bible. The Church of Galatia was at that time preaching "another gospel."—Verse 6. Of course the Apostle's desire and command was to reform the Church of Galatia, by correcting its abuses and removing its corruptions; and happily this was done. But if the Church of Galatia had refused to be reformed, and had persisted in preaching another gospel, were not all faithful Christians in that church bound, by the Apostle's command, to count that Church of Galatia, anathema, or accursed?

We trust Mr. Aylmer will find nothing objectionable in the temper in which we have replied to him. It is our earnest desire to understand his arguments, and to give them the fairest consideration.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

2 MACCABEES xii. 43, 44, 45, 46.

SIR—Notwithstanding that you are justly esteemed one of the most erudite Celtic paleographers of the present day, yet I must object to your translation, from the original Greek, of the above verses from the 12th chapter of the 2nd Book of Maccabees.

As every Greek copy of the Book of Maccabees agrees with that valuable and ancient manuscript in the Vatican library, as well as with the Alexandrian manuscript now in the British Museum, to both of which you have referred, I am happy to find we can have no controversy about the original; but the "correct translation" with which you have favoured your readers, in this month's number of the LAYMAN, is not exactly in accordance with that generally received by Protestants, and totally at variance with the reading and interpretation of a scholar and divine whose works stand high among those of British theologians.

Within the last day or two I have had the satisfaction of finding my view and argument on 2nd Maccabees confirmed by no less an authority than Bishop JEREMY TAYLOR, who was not only an Irish prelate of great renown, but likewise one of the early Vice-chancellors of our University. This learned doctor, in his Lib. of Proph. i. 1, sec. 20, n. 11, p. 345, thus expresses himself:—

"We find, by the Maccabees, that the Jews did pray and make offerings for the dead, which appears by other testimonies, and by their form of prayer, still extant, which they used in the captivity. Now, it is very considerable, that since our Blessed Saviour did reprove all the evil doctrines and traditions of the Scribes and Pharisees, and did argue concerning the dead and the resurrection, yet he spoke no word against this public practice, but left it as he found it, which HE who came to declare to us all the will of his Father, would not have done if it had not been innocent, pious, and full of charity."

Now, on referring to my former writing, your readers will perceive that this is precisely what I advanced, and the force of which you endeavoured to avoid by a translation which I can in no way admit to be correct.

Judas Maccabeus, be it recollected, was not only the chief, but the most virtuous and zealous high priest of all the priests and doctors attached to the service of the Temple and of the whole Jewish nation, and would certainly have neither introduced nor directed any such offering for the dead, if contrary to the Mosaic law. Judas Maccabeus it was who instituted and celebrated the festival of the restoration of all the sacrifices at the Temple for eight days; and the learned translator of Josephus's works (the late Rev. Wm. Whiston, A.M., Cambridge) is of opinion, with many others, that this is the festival commemorated in the gospel, John ii. 23, to which our blessed Saviour, we are told, came up to Jerusalem on purpose to bear a part in the solemnization of it.

In conclusion, I re-assert, and upon scriptural authority (Ecclesiasticus vii. 37; 1 Cor. xv. 29), that prayers for the dead formed a constant part of the public worship of the Jews; and that the baptisms or legal purifications, which the Jews likewise used for the dead, demonstrate their belief that the dead receive spiritual aid from the devotion of the living.

WARNER CHRISTIAN SEARCH.

August 28, 1852.

In the above letter, "W. C. Search" denies the accuracy of our translation of the Greek copy of the Book of Maccabees. "W. C. Search" does not point out in what our translation is wrong. We presume that he would have done so if he could. To leave him no excuse for not doing so, we give here the Greek of the whole passage, and the translation of it, as given in our last number:—

43. ποιησαμενος τε κατ' ανδρολογιαν κατασκευασματα εις αργυριου δραχμας δισχιλιας, απεστειλεν εις Ιεροσολυμα προσαγαγειν περι αμαρτιας θυσιαν, καλως και ασταιως πραττων, υπερ αναστασεως διαλογιζομενος.

44. ει γαρ μη τους προπεπτωκοτας αναστηναι προσεδοκα, περισσον αν και ληρωδες υπερ νεκρων προσευχεσθαι

45. ειτ' εμβλεπων τοις μετ' ευσεβειας κοιμωμενοις καλλιστον αποκειμενον χαρισητριον, οσια και ενσεβης η επινοια. οθεν περι των τεθνηκοτων του εξιλασμον εποιησατο, της αμαρτιας απολυθηναι.

43. And having made a preparation of two thousand drachms of silver, accordiog to a collection man by man, he sent to Jerusalem to offer a sacrifice on account of sin, acting altogether well and correctly, reasoning concerning the resurrection.

44. For if he did not expect that the slain should rise, it would have been superfluous and trifling to pray for the dead.

45. Then seeing that a most excellent reward is reserved for those falling asleep with piety, a holy and pious thought. Wherefore concerning the dead, he made atonement, to be loosed from sin.

Now, let "W. C. Search," or any one else, show us what Greek word in the above passage we have translated wrong, and how it ought to have been translated. If no one can do this (as we know they cannot) what use is there in saying that our translation is wrong?*

What reason does "W. C. Search" give for denying the correctness of our translation? Nothing but this, that (as he says) Bishop Jeremy Taylor has quoted and explained the passage as "W. C. Search" does. Now, suppose that Bishop Taylor had quoted the Douay translation, without even looking at the Greek, will that prove that we have translated the Greek wrong?

But we have more to say upon this quotation from Bishop Taylor. "W. C. Search" thus introduces it:—"Within the last day or two I have had the satisfaction of finding my view and argument on 2nd Maccabees confirmed by no less an authority than Bishop Jeremy Taylor. . . . This learned doctor, in his Liberty of Prophesying, sec. 20, n. 11, p. 345, thus expresses HIMSELF."

Now, it is quite true that the passage which "W. C. Search" thus introduces and quotes is found in that work of Bishop Taylor to which "W. C. Search" refers; and it is quite true that this passage agrees with "W. C. Search's" argument; but it is quite false that this argument is confirmed by Bishop Taylor's authority, or that Bishop Taylor "thus expresses HIMSELF."

"W. C. Search" has left out certain words of that passage, as it stands in Bishop Taylor's "Liberty of Prophesying" (the book which "W. C. Search" refers to for it). Bishop Taylor put in a parenthesis of three words, and "W. C. Search" left them out! It is for us to supply them; thus—"We find (SAYS THE ROMANIST) in the history of the Maccabees;" so Bishop Taylor wrote it; but on looking back to "W. C. Search's" letter, our readers will see that "W. C. Search" left out the words, "says the Romanist," and instead of them he asserts, "this learned doctor thus expresses HIMSELF."

Thus Bishop Taylor expressly states that he is only reporting to us what the Romanists say for themselves, and "W. C. Search" LEAVES OUT this express notification, and gives us the passage as Bishop Taylor's own judgment in the matter!

What can we say to such dealing as this? All we can say to it is this, that we find in the writings of the leading Roman Catholic controversialists, what appears to us very like a systematic employment of falsehood and fraud, to make authorities appear to be for them which are directly against them. We shall give in our next number some other instances of the way in which the principal Roman Catholic controversialists have quoted the authority of Bishop Taylor with similar unfairness.

In dealing with such a system we have no argument but to expose its falsehood, and to leave it to the consciences of Roman Catholics who sincerely seek for truth to consider for themselves, as they regard the salvation of their own souls, whether they can expect to be guided into truth by those who seek to lead them by such means.

We beg "W. C. Search" distinctly to understand that we do not at present charge him with falsehood or fraud. He may be able to show that he has only been deceived, and not a deceiver in this matter. We know that most Roman Catholics take their authorities, not from the authors themselves, but from extracts given in modern Roman Catholic books of controversy, and thus they are often deceived. If "W. C. Search" did really consult Bishop Taylor's own book, and did himself cut out the words, "says the Romanist," he is without excuse, and must bear the blame himself; but if he took his quotations from any modern Roman Catholic book which had already left out the words, we must hold him excused from any intention of falsehood, and will only ask him to mark in future how apt such books are to deceive him. Or if he can tell us of any modern edition of Bishop Taylor's "Liberty of Prophesying" in which those words are omitted (telling the date of that edition, and where it was printed), we shall also hold him excused; though this will not support his argument, because those words are in all the editions published by Bishop Taylor himself during his lifetime. We do not know of any such modern edition, nor do we suppose that such a one exists.

But we remind "W. C. Search" that, in order to have the benefit of this excuse, he must tell us from what book he took his quotation; and we now call upon him, in justice to his own character, to tell us the name of the book from which he took this quotation. If he do not answer this, he must bear the blame himself.

The other arguments in his letter require but little notice. He tells us that the festival for which our Saviour is said to have gone up to Jerusalem, in the Gospel of St. John, ch. 2, v. 23, was a feast established by Judas Maccabeus. We cannot believe this, for this simple reason, that the Apostle himself, in the very verse to which "W. C. Search" refers, tells us expressly that that feast to which our Saviour went up was the feast of the passover or pasch; and we suppose that "W. C. Search" will not ask us to believe that the passover was instituted by Judas Maccabeus. "W. C. Search" probably intended to refer to 1 Macc., ch. 4, v. 59, and to John, ch. 10, v. 22. But this festival had nothing whatever to do with sacrifice or prayer for the dead.

"W. C. Search," in the above letter, quotes the Book of Ecclesiasticus as Scripture. Now, in "W. C. Search's" letter, in our last number, he took us to task for saying that he had quoted the Book of Maccabees as Scripture, and affirmed that he had quoted it only as a historical testimony, and required us to meet his argument on this ground. Surely he must know that the Book of Ecclesiasticus has no more claim than the Book of Maccabees to be inspired Scripture.

"W. C. Search" also quotes 1 Cor. chap. 15, verse 29. We ask him does the Church of Rome now practise "baptism for the dead," in the sense which he now seeks to put upon that verse? Would not the Church of Rome now say that to practise what he thinks to be the true sense of that verse, would be an impious blasphemy? How comes it that they, who profess to have an infallible guide to the true sense of Scripture, so often quote Scripture in a sense directly opposed to their own infallible guide?

We shall give in our next number the instances we have promised of the fraudulent appeal to Bishop Taylor's authority, which the chief Roman Catholic controversialists are so fond of making. In the meantime, we call on "W. C. Search" to clear himself from this imputation, by telling us the name of the book from which he quoted the passage, which he gives from Bishop Taylor's "Liberty of Prophesying."

* We have but one trifling correction to make ourselves; the word ειτ' at the beginning of verse 45, which we have translated "then," might be better translated "farther," or "besides," which would improve the sense. (For this use of the word see Heb. xii. 9, where it is translated furthermore in the authorized, and moreover in the Douay translation.) Verse 44 being a parenthesis, and marked as such in the Douay Bible, verses 43 and 45 are thus connected so as to give the Notes and Queries.

Can any one explain why, in the Roman Catholic creed, the creed of Pope Pius the Fourth, the word "AMEN" is put in the middle and not in the end? Or is there any other instance in the Catholic Church, since it began, of this word Amen being put in the middle of either a profession of faith or a prayer, and not at the end of it?

"A Friend to Truth" wishes to know if he be correct in saying that the Church of Rome does not allow the sacrament of Extreme Unction to a criminal that is to be executed?

FARM OPERATIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

HARVEST operations will be the chief employment during the month; and notwithstanding the previous inclement weather, the present has turned out very propitious, the change has come in time to save much corn that was in a very doubtful and hazardous way; and from all we can see or learn, the present harvest promises to be, if anything, over an average one, if the present fine weather continues.

Harvesting.—Proceed vigorously in cutting the corn crops, as they get matured. Avoid cutting while the crop is wet with rain, in this state it will not be fit to bind, particularly if there be much grass or weeds amongst it, and it will be hazardous to leave it in ledge on the ground. Seize, therefore, every opportunity to cut at once. The stooks will be the better of not being capped, if the weather holds dry; but on the approach of rain, lose no time in doing so. When thoroughly seasoned carry to the haggard, stack and thatch without delay. Field-stacking should be avoided as much as possible, much waste attends it, and much loss of time; the frequent handling of the sheaves shed the grain; if wet weather comes on, many of the stacks will take the wet and be much injured, and brought into the haggard in a bad state, besides being attended with much expense. We would, therefore, strongly recommend carrying the corn out of the stook to the haggard. Any sheaves not fit to bring home to-day will be fit to-morrow or the next day. The days are longer, the weather finer than further on in the season, and all things conspire to make this mode the most economical in every way

Ploughing.—As soon as the corn is reaped, it should be stooked in rows, at wide intervals, to allow of the stubbles being ploughed up at once. If the stubbles are weedy, the land should be pared with the skim plough, or horse-hoe, harrowed well, the weeds gathered and burned, and the ashes scattered before ploughing; this, if timely executed, will save much after labour, cost, and trouble.

Wheat should be sown this month on the fallow lands, where the system is practised, or on potato land when the crop has been taken out; this, however, greatly depends on the state of the land, which should be neither too wet nor too dry; if in either extreme, time must be given till, by the timely fall of some rain, the land possesses the proper degree of consistency, if too dry; and, on the other hand, to dry off sufficiently, if too wet.

Rye should be sown early in the month, whether intended for a grain crop for soiling, or for supplying the ewes with an early bite; it is a most valuable crop for the two latter purposes, it supplies a bite before anything else, and gives the earliest soiling crop.

Winter Vetches may be sown any time in the month, and is a most valuable succulent soiling crop; though sown at the same time it does not come into use as early as the rye; the rye is past use for soiling when it shoots, but the vetches are not in their prime till they begin to pod, they are then most nutritious; from their trailing habit it is necessary to sow a little rye with them, or, better still, some winter oats, which help to support the vetches, and add considerably to the bulk of the provender.

Bere should also be sown early in the month, it is a most useful grain, ripening before any other, and giving a supply for bread at the most critical time of the year, between the old and new: it makes an excellent household bread.

Winter and Russian Beans may be sown between the middle of this and the middle of next month. The land should be clean, in good tilth, and well manured; the beans may be sown either broadcast and harrowed in, or in drills from 2½ to three feet apart. When the land is clean the broadcast sowing is allowed to produce the heaviest crop; but if the land be dirty, drilling gives a great facility for summer cleaning, and in this case it is truly a useful and profitable fallow crop.

Winter Dun Oats.—This grain has now got universally into repute and has proved itself an excellent and remunerative crop, having, in many instances, superseded wheat. It should be sown early in the month; in fact, as soon as harvest operations will allow. It should be sown in dry weather, never in wet. That sown in dry weather will be several barrels more productive per acre, than that sown in wet.

Winter or Black Barley may be sown any time between the middle of this and the middle of next month. It is a very productive crop; but its malting properties have not been sufficiently tested.

Cabbage sown in July will be fit to plant out this month, the land should be both deeply tilled and well manured; in field culture any of the modes proposed for planting rape will be found suitable.

Parsnips may be sown any time during this or the succeeding month; the land should be deeply tilled, well pulverized, and well manured with rich compost, which should be well incorporated with the soil, to produce fleshy, clean roots.

Sheep.—Breeding ewes should now be selected, and by the end of the month some of them admitted to the tup. Lambs, and the culled ewes, should be kept on the best and most nutritious pastures, so as to promote the growth of the lambs, and fat the ewes for market.

Pigs.—Stores should now be put up to fatten: food of all sorts and offal being abundant. They will be the better of being let to roam about the haggard and corn fields, to eat up the fallen grain, which may otherwise be wasted, unless there be a plenteous stock of poultry to let out for that purpose. Let them out in the day time, but house them early in the evening, giving a good evening meal, and good dry bedding.

Odds and Ends.—Plash and lay hedges, scour out dykes and water-courses; repair roads; cart home dry bog-stuff to litter the byres and stables with, and as a base to build manure-heaps on; cart home turf for fuel, and limestone to the kilns to burn for manure; turn

RULE OF FAITH.

In our June number we stated some of the arguments on which the United Church of England and Ireland relies in support of her Rule of Faith. We showed in the first place, that, from the very nature and design of Holy Scripture, it is in the highest degree probable that it contains all, and not merely some, of the truths necessary to salvation. We adduced, in the second place, a few of the numerous passages in which the Bible bears testimony to its own sufficiency. The third head of our proof related to the inadequacy of oral tradition as a vehicle for the unimpaired transmission of doctrinal truths. So obvious and indisputable, indeed, is this last point, that Bellarmine, and, after him, many of the ablest Roman Catholic controversialists maintain, that by the unwritten word of God it is not meant that the word is written nowhere, but that it was not committed to writing by the Apostles and other inspired men who first preached it; that, although not recorded by inspired penmen, it is to be found deposited in the writings of the early Fathers of the Church, and embodied in the acts and definitions of General Councils. It soon however, became apparent that this basis of Tradition was not sufficiently large and stable for the vast superstructure which it was made to sustain. With respect to the ancient Fathers it was undeniable that, upon the one hand, some even of the most eminent of them had put forward assertions clearly at variance with fact and Scripture (1), so that any dogma resting on their authority alone must necessarily be attended with some degree of uncertainty: whilst, upon the other hand, the closest examination of their writings failed to detect any clear recognition upon their part of the characteristic doctrines of the modern Church of Rome. Again, in reference to General Councils, it was equally incontrovertible, in the first place, that, "forasmuch as they be an assembly of men, whereof all be not governed by the Spirit and Word of God, they may err, and sometimes have erred even in things pertaining to God" (2): and, in the second place, that the acts of the universally-acknowledged Œcumenical Councils are utterly silent about any essential doctrines, the proofs of which are not to be found in Scripture. The written evidence of Christian antiquity being thus found to furnish insufficient proof of such doctrines, it became absolutely necessary to call in the aid of the great "living witness," the infallible Church, by whose interposition every embarrassing difficulty is easily conjured away. Thus, then, in addition to, or rather instead of, the troublesome realities of documents which cannot be tortured into yielding a sense that their authors never intended them to convey, we are presented, whenever it is convenient to do so, with the pleasing vision of an ever-flowing stream of Church tradition, traversing with unsullied purity the foul corruptions of many a century of darkness, ignorance, and crime (3): of a sacred deposit transmitted unimpaired, from age to age, by an undefined and abstract community, the individual members of which are admitted to have been subject to the ordinary infirmities of humanity. The most eminent Fathers, the holiest Popes, the greatest and most pious Bishops assembled in the most legitimate Councils, have all confessedly erred in matters of greater or less moment, but this, we are called upon to believe, does not, in the least, invalidate the authority of the Divine Traditions which have been transmitted through them, and other less distinguished members of the Catholic Church. Nay, we are told, it is not even necessary that the Church of any particular age should be conscious of the inestimable value of the verities committed to her keeping. It is quite competent to the Church or its equally infallible Head upon earth, whenever a fitting occasion occurs, to elevate to the rank of an article of faith any of the truths of which she was before the unconscious depositary (4). Truly, the infallibility of the Church has many an arduous duty imposed upon it; but we question if, in the whole range of its Herculean labours, it has a more difficult task to sustain than this, scil. to impart to dogmas, which, if judged by the ordinary rules of evidence, are either wholly unconnected with Christian antiquity, or, at best, have a very questionable parentage there, the character of Divine truths, communicated by the lips of our Lord himself or his inspired messengers: especially when these dogmas are not only (as is supposed) independent of Scripture, but actually opposed either to its letter or its spirit. If, then, doctrines of faith concern a man's eternal welfare, and if with respect to them mistake no less than wilful error may be fraught with infinite danger, it is surely the solemn duty of every Roman Catholic to pause and satisfy himself that in resting his faith in dogmas, not proveable by Scripture, upon the assumed infallibility of the Church, he may not in reality be building, like the foolish man in our Saviour's parable, his house upon the sand—"The rain fell, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and they beat upon that house, and it fell, and great was the fall thereof."—Matt. vii. 27 (5).

The fourth class of arguments by which we proposed to establish the grand principle of the sufficiency of Holy Scripture for salvation, is the recorded testimony of the Fathers and Doctors of the Catholic Church. The consent of so many of the most distinguished ornaments of the

(1) One or two well-known examples of this may not be uninteresting. Irenæus, the famous Bishop of Lyons, towards the close of the second century, states, as a positive fact, that our Lord's public ministry took place between the fortieth and fiftieth year of his age. This assertion he defends, partly by inferences from John viii. 57, 58, but chiefly by an appeal to the testimony of the elders who had met John in Asia, and had heard the fact from him and from others of the Apostles.—Contr. Hær. ii. 22. But if this assertion, vouched for by what seems to be such unimpeachable testimony, be true, then the whole Christian world, of earlier and later ages alike, is mistaken, and the chronology of the New Testament becomes involved in inextricable difficulties. Can Roman Catholics adduce any dogma, not contained expressly or by implication in Scripture, which is supported by an appeal to Apostolic authority more positive and more circumstantial than that by which this false assertion of one of the earliest of the Fathers is sustained? Again, it is well known that most of the early traditions preserved by Irenæus were contained in a lost work of Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, who had seen and heard the Apostle John, and who, as he himself tells us (Euseb. E. H. iii. 39), took particular pains to inform himself of the authenticity of what he reports. The following is a specimen of the discourses of our Lord, concerning His kingdom, which that work contains:—"The days shall come in which vines shall grow, each vine with ten thousand boughs, each bough with ten thousand branches, each branch with ten thousand twigs, each twig with ten thousand grapes, each grape containing twenty-five measures of wine. And when any of the saints shall take a bunch, another [bunch] shall cry out—'I am a better bunch, take me, through me bless the Lord.'"—Irenæ. Contr. Hær. v. 33. If it be little short of blasphemy to ascribe such words to Him who spake as never man spake, is it not equally plain that we are bound to feel deeply grateful to God for having provided us with a written standard of truth, by which the traditions extant even in the immediately post-apostolic age may be tested? The last instance, in illustration of this subject, to which we shall read, is the Epistle attributed to the Apostle Barnabas. If, as several of the early Fathers—including Origen, Clem. Alex, Eusebius, and Jerome—believed, Barnabas were the author of this work, no stronger evidence can be adduced of the danger of admitting any addition, from whatever source, to the written oracles of truth; because it contains so much at variance with sober reason and the acknowledged Word of God, that we cannot, upon any sound principles of criticism, admit its inspiration. On the other hand, if it be a forgery, it yet imposed on some of the most learned and critical of the Fathers; and what presumption is there that some or all of the (non-Scriptural) traditions, or traditional interpretations of Scripture, for which Apostolic authority is claimed, may not be derived from sources just as little entitled to credit as this pretended Epistle of Barnabas?

(2) Art. xxi. of the Church of England.

(3) Baronius gives a fearful description of the darkness and wickedness of the tenth century, of which the following passages may serve as a specimen:—"A new age begins, which, from its asperity and barrenness of good, has been wont to be called the iron age; from the deformity of its overflowing wickedness, the leaden age; and from its poverty of writers, the dark age. Standing on the threshold of which we have deemed it necessary to premise something, lest the weak-minded should be at all scandalized if he should at any time happen to behold the abomination of desolation in the Temple. . . . . The case is plainly such, that scarcely any one can believe—nay, scarcely ever shall believe—except he see it with his own eyes and handle it with his own hands, what unworthy, foul, and deformed—yea, moreover, execrable, and abominable things the sacred Apostolic See, upon whose hinge the universal Catholic Church turns, has been compelled to suffer. . . . . Oh, shame! oh, grief! how many monsters, horrible to be seen, were intruded by them [secular princes] into that seat which is to be reverenced by angels? How many tragedies were consummated? With what filth was it her fate to be besprinkled, who was herself without spot or wrinkle? With what stench to be infected, with what loathsome impurities to be defiled, and by these to be blackened with perpetual infamy?" (Novum inchoatur æculum, quod sua asperitate, et boni sterilitate ferreum, malique exundantis deformitate plumbeum, atque inopiâ Scriptorum appellari consuevit obscurum. In cujus limine constituti, præfari aliquid necessarium duximus, ne quid scandali pusillus animo patiatur, si quando videre contigerit abominationem desolationis in templo. . . . . Est plane ut vix aliquis credat, immo nec vix quidem sit creditarus, nisi suis ipse inspicist oculis manibusque contrectet, quam indigna, quamque turpia atque deformia, execranda insuper et abominanda sit cocta dati, sacrosancta, apostolica sedes, in cujus cardine universa Ecclesia Catholica vertitur. . . . . Quot tunc ab eis, proh pudor! proh dolor! in eandem sedem angelis reverendam, visu horrenda intrusa sint monstra? Quot consummatæ sint tragediæ? Quibus tunc ipsam sine maculâ et sine rugâ contigit aspergi sordibus, pntoribus infici, inquinari spurcitiis, ex his perpetuâ infamiâ denigrari?"—An. Eccles. An. 900. And, again, the same historian writes—"What was then the face of the holy Roman Church? How most foul! when harlots, at once most powerful and most base, ruled at Rome; at whose will sees were changed, bishops were presented, and—what is horrid to hear, and unutterable—pseudo-Pontiffs, their paramours, were intruded into the See of Peter, who are enrolled in the catalogue of Roman Pontiffs only for the sake of marking the times." (Quæ tunc facies sanctæ ecclesiæ Romanæ! quam fœdissima! cum Romæ dominarentur potentissimæ æque ac sordidissimæ meretrices, quarum arbitrio mutarentur sedes, darentur episcopi, et quod auditu horrendum et infandum est, intruderentur in sedem Petri earum amasii, pseudo-Pontifices, qui non sint nisi ad consignanda tantum tempora in catalogo Romanorum Pontificum scripti.—Ann. Eccles. An. 912.) When so eminent a Roman Catholic historian as Baronius was compelled to make such admissions as the above, we may well give thanks to the great Head of the Church that the faith once delivered to the saints has not been left to the safe custody of Church Tradition.

(4) A remarkable instance of this is furnished by the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, which is, at length, about to be declared by the successor of St. Peter an Article of Faith.—Vide CATHOLIC LAYMAN, No. ii., p. 10. So difficult, indeed, is it to discover many of the peculiar tenets of the Roman Catholic religion in the writings or traditions of the earlier ages of the Church, that recourse was had, so early as the time of the Council of Florence (1438), to the theory of development in order to escape from the charge of introducing novelties into the dogmatic teaching of the Church. This theory was revived in more modern times, by the Jesuit Petavius, and in our own day has been advocated by the celebrated Bavarian professor, Möhler; and still more elaborately and boldly by Mr. Newman. How far Mr. Newman's doctrine is received by the Church to which he now belongs is uncertain. Dr. Wiseman and the Dublin Review warmly espouse it: whilst, on the other hand, the highest authorities of the Roman Catholic Church in America denounce it as subversive of the Catholic faith, and of revelation itself. Peter himself has not yet spoken.

(5) The general question of the infallibility of the Church is one into which we cannot, of course, enter here. That important controversy which has already been touched on, will be hereafter discussed at length in this Journal.

Church during a long succession of ages, beginning with the immediately post-apostolic times, is regarded by us, Protestants, as a valuable corroboration of the conclusion which, however, we deem sufficiently established by the testimony of Scripture itself, and by the reason of the case.* But to Roman Catholics, who professedly rest much of their belief on the authority of the Fathers, the argument now under consideration ought to be conclusive. We say, then, that a chain of evidence, bearing on the supreme importance and sufficiency of the written Word of God, can be drawn out from the works of the great Church-Fathers, proving incontestably that the doctrine of the modern Church of Rome, regarding the insufficiency of Scripture, and the co-ordinate authority of an independent Tradition, was utterly unknown to the ancient Church either of the East or West. To exhibit all these testimonies in detail would far transcend our limits; we shall, therefore, content ourselves with adducing a few of them as specimens of the whole.

We begin with IRENÆUS, the Bishop of Lyons, and the disciple and friend of Polycarp, who again had been the companion and disciple of the Apostle John. This Father represents the opinion of both the Eastern and Western Churches towards the end of the second century. Disputing against the Gnostic heretics, who denied the perfection and sufficiency of Scripture, and maintained that the truth could not be discovered from it by those who were ignorant of Tradition (6), Irenæus says—"We ought to leave such things as these to God, who also made us, most rightly knowing that the Scriptures indeed are perfect, as having been dictated by the word of God and his Spirit" (7). Again—"For we have become acquainted with the dipensation of our salvation through no others than those through whom the Gospel has come to us; which they then indeed preached, but afterwards, by the will of God, delivered to us in the Scriptures, to be the foundation and pillar of our faith" (8). The last phrase, it will be remembered, is the very one applied by St. Paul to the Church—1 Tim. iii. 15. Irenæus, accordingly, here distinctly implies, that it was by the custody of the Sacred Scriptures that the Church was to sustain her office as "the pillar and ground of the truth." Once more—"Read diligently the Gospel given unto us by the Apostles, and read diligently the prophets, and ye shall find the general mode of action, and the whole doctrine, and the whole passion of our Lord predicted in them" (9).

We come next to TERTULLIAN, who flourished a few years later than Irenæus—that is to say, about the end of the second century. This great writer, whom Vincentius of Lerins pronounces (Commonit., c. 24) to be, "apud Latinos facile princeps," thus expresses himself regarding Scripture, when arguing against the heretic Hermogenes, who maintained the eternity of matter—"I adore the fulness of Scripture, which manifests to me the Creator and his works. . . . But whether all things were made of some pre-existent matter, I have as yet nowhere read. Let the shop of Hermogenes show that it is written. If it is not written, let them fear that woe which is destined for them that add or take away" (10). Again, when disputing against the heretic Marcion, he says—"I do not admit what you bring forward of your own, extraneous to Scripture" (11).

The next witness whom we shall cite is AMBROSE, the famous Bishop of Milan, who flourished cir. A.D. 374. This eminent Father recognised no authority as co-ordinate with and independent of Scripture—"How," he says, "can we use those things which we find not in Scripture?" (12) And again—"I read [in Scripture] that he [Christ] is the first, I read that he is not the second; let those who say he is the second, prove it by reading" (13).

Contemporaneously with Ambrose lived JEROME, unquestionably the most learned theologian of the Western Church. He thus expresses himself respecting the grounds upon which his belief was founded—"As we deny not those things that are written, so we reject those things that are not written" (14). The instance which he gives is peculiarly worthy of attention, when taken in connection with the various purely traditional notions entertained by the Church of Rome of the Virgin Mary—"That God was born of a virgin we believe, because we read it. That Mary married after she gave birth to Him, we do not believe, because we read it not" (15).

A few years later—that is, towards the close of the fourth century—we come to AUGUSTINE. The writings of this Father have been always held in the highest esteem in the Western Church, and the Church of Rome, in particular, has ever regarded them with especial reverence. What then is Augustine's opinion on the point under discussion? "In those things," he says, "which are plainly laid down in Scripture, all things are found which embrace faith and morals" (16). Again—"Whatsoever ye shall hear thence—i. e., from Scripture—let this savour well with you: whatever is extraneous to it reject, lest ye wander in a cloud" (17). Again—"Wherefore if, concerning Christ, or his Church, or anything else whatsoever pertaining to your faith and living, I do not say we (who are not to be compared to him, who said—'Although we,' &c. —Gal. i. 8), but even, as St. Paul adds, 'an angel from heaven were to preach to you aught besides (præterquam) what you have received in the legal and evangelical Scriptures [the Old and the New Testamenta], let him be accursed" (18). It should be particularly observed, that Augustine is here not condemning the inculcation of doctrine contrary to Scripture, but in addition to it ("præterquam quod in Scripturis accepistis") (19). Will any candid Roman Catholic say, that the above is the language of one who believed, as the Council of Trent teaches (20), that there are Church-traditions, respecting faith and morals, not contained in Scripture, and which are to be received with the same sentiments of piety and virtue as the Scriptures themselves? If more evidence be required, the same Father elsewhere says—"Those things, however, which appertain to the investigation and preserving of true religion, Divine Scripture is not silent about" (21). Again, speaking of the confutation of heresy, he says—"There can be no proof of true Christianity, nor can there be any other refuge of Christians wishing to know the truth of the faith, except the Divine Scriptures."* And to quote no more, writing against the Donatists, he says—"Let them demonstrate their Church, if they can, not by discourses and rumours of the Africans, not by Councils of their own bishops, not by the writings of any disputants whatsoever, not by deceitful signs and wonders, against which we have been prepared and warned by the Word of the Lord, but by the words of the one Shepherd himself, and all the canonical authorities of the Sacred Books" (22). This remarkable passage is deserving of all attention from Roman Catholics.

Such are a few of the testimonies of the early Latin Fathers in favour of the Rule of Faith for which Protestants contend. When we turn to the Eastern Church we find, if possible, even stronger statements upon the point.

CLEMENT of Alexandria, celebrated as one of the founders of the famous school of Alexandria, and the master of the renowned Origen, thus writes towards the close of the 2nd century—"They who are ready to labour for what is most excellent, will not desist in their search after truth till they obtain demonstration from the Scriptures themselves" (23).

ORIGEN, the successor of Clement, in the beginning of the 3rd century, says—"In the two Testaments every word that appertaineth unto God may be sought and discussed, and out of them all knowledge of things may be derived. But if anything remains which Divine Scripture does not determine, no other third Scripture ought to be received to authorize knowledge . . . but let us commit to the fire what remains—that is, let us reserve it for God. For God has not willed that we should know all things in the present life" (24). Could Origen have written thus if he had entertained the opinions put forward by Bellarmine respecting Tradition, which obviously represent it as a third Scripture? Again, —"Wherefore it is necessary for us to call the Sacred Scriptures to give evidence: for our meanings and interpretations, without these witnesses, have no credit" (25).

HIPPOLYTUS, the martyr, a contemporary and friend of Origen, and a disciple of Irenæus, thus writes—"As he who would desire to exercise the wisdom of this world cannot otherwise attain it, unless he read the dogmas of the philosophers: so whosoever of us will exercise piety towards God can learn it from no other source than from the Divine Scriptures" (26).

ATHANASIUS, the famous Bishop of Alexandria, in the beginning of the fourth century, expresses himself as follows:—"The holy and divinely-inspired Scriptures are sufficient for the enunciation of truth" (27). Again—"These [canonical books] are the fountains of salvation, so that he who thirsts may be satisfied with the oracles contained in them; in these alone the school of religion preaches the gospel; let no man add to or take from them" (28). These are the words of the man who spent his life in controversy with the Arians, and who was the great head of the Catholic party at the Œcumenical Synod of Nice. He obviously knew nothing of Traditions which were at the same time necessary to salvation and not contained in Scripture.

* Augustine thought as we do on this subject of patristic authority. "Other authors," he says, "however excellent their sanctity and learning, I read so as not to credit their assertions merely because they say thus: but because they have been able to persuade me, either by means of those Canonical authors, or by probable reasons, that their statements are not repugnant to truth."—August. ad. Hieron. t. ii. 15. Ed. Bened.

(6) "When they [the heretics] are confuted out of the Scriptures they turn round and accuse the Scriptures themselves, as if they were not accurate, nor of authority, and because they are ambiguous, and because the truth cannot be discovered from them by those who are ignorant of Tradition: for that the truth was not delivered in writing but orally.". (Cum enim ex Scripturis arguuntur, in accusationem convertuntur ipsarum Scripturarum, quasi non recte habeant, neque sint ex auctoritate, et quia varie sint dicta, et quia non possit ex his inveniri veritas ab his qui nesciant Traditionem: non enim per literas traditam illam, sed per vivam vocem.—Cont. Hær. Lib. iii. c. 2). It is scarcely necessary to direct attention to the truly remarkable resemblance here exhibited between the respective positions taken up by the Gnostic heretics and Irenæus upon the one hand, and those occupied by Roman Catholics and the Church of England on the other.

The meaning obviously is, that in the Gospel the general tenor of our Lord's actions and the whole of his doctrines were exhibited; whilst the prophets predicted all the circumstances connected with his passion.

(19) The Rhemish translators correctly render the Greek παρ' ὃ in the 8th and 9th verses by "besides." But whilst they felt themselves constrained to follow the Vulgate version (præterquam quod, præter id quod) they take care to inform their readers, in their note, that, according to St. Augustine, what St. Paul here condemns is "such teaching as is contrary and dissagreeing to the rule of faith." Now, this remark is not only at variance with the words of Augustine above cited, but even to the very passage of that Father, to which they themselves refer, where he says—"qui autem prætergreditur fidei regulam, non accedit in via, sed recedit de via."—August. Tract. in Johan. xcviii. 7. We may add, that Theophylact and Œcumenius, in their commentaries on this passage of the Galatians, are also directly opposed to this Rhemish gloss. With respect to the Greek παρ' ὃ there seems to be no doubt that the correct translation is besides or more than, as the Rhemish translators themselves render it again in Rom. xii. 3,

Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem, in the middle of the fourth century, after having given a summary of the doctrine concerning the Holy Spirit, says, that he will now prove it in detail from Scripture—"For," he adds, "concerning the divine and holy mysteries of the faith, even the most casual remark ought not to be delivered without the Sacred Scriptures. Do not implicitly believe me saying these things to you unless you receive proof of the statements from the Sacred Scriptures"(29). Again, speaking of the mode of the divine generation not being revealed in Scripture, he says—"Why, then, do you busy yourself about what the Holy Spirit has not written in the Scriptures?"(30)

Basil the Great, Bishop of Cæsarea, and one of the most profound theologians of his age (cir. A.D. 370), thus writes—"Believe those things that are written; the things which are not written, seek not"(31). And again—"It is a manifest falling away from the faith, and a charge of arrogance either to reject anything of what is written, or to introduce anything of what is not written"(32). We shall quote one passage more, as Basil is one of the authorities on whom Roman Catholic divines rely most, in support of Tradition. "Let, therefore, the inspired Scripture arbitrate between us; and the sentence of truth shall be adjudged to those with whom are found doctrines consonant to the Divine oracles"(33). From these words it appears, that according to Basil, Scripture and the Divine Oracles are one and the same thing; and that in every question their authority is supreme.

Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, towards the close of the fourth century, believed it to be "an instinct of the devil to follow the sophisms of human minds, and to think anything Divine without the authority of the Scriptures"(34). Roman Catholics will, of course, assent to the first clause of this sentence; but could the Tridentine Fathers, who asserted the existence of Divine traditions not contained in Scripture, fairly subscribe to the second?

Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa, and brother of Basil, declares—"Forasmuch as this is supported by no testimony of Scripture, we will reject it as false"(35).

Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, in the beginning of the fifth century, to the very same effect asks—"That which Holy Scripture hath not said, by what means, pray, shall we receive and reckon it among those things that are true?"(36) The force of the last two passages cannot be evaded by saying that they relate to things with which Tradition had nothing to do (37). The writers would scarcely have expressed themselves so absolutely, had they been aware of the existence in their own day of a source of proof equally certain and authoritative as Scripture, and yet independent of it.

Chrysostom, the famous Bishop of Constantinople, towards the close of the fifth century, thus speaks of the Holy Scripture—"Look for no other teacher; thou hast the oracles of God, none teaches thee like these"(38). Is there any doubt here as to the sufficiency of Scripture? And again—"He who useth not the Scriptures, but climbeth up some other way—that is, cutteth out for himself another and an unlawful way—he is a thief"(39). Roman Catholics think it enough to reply, that Chrysostom is here speaking of Antichrists and heretics. Certainly; but speaking of Antichrists for is not adhering solely to Scripture condemns them heard of the existence in the Church. Had he or they tions not contained in Scripture, would Divine traditured thus to apply the words "ἀναβαίνων ἀλλαχόθεν?" have ven-Once more—"Wherefore, I exhort and beseech you all, leaving aside what this man or that man thinks concerning these things, to learn all these things from the Scriptures"(40).

The above passages, taken from some of the most eminent writers of the first five centuries, may serve to convey a general idea of the light in which Holy Scripture, as the ultimate and sufficient basis of all essential truth, was regarded by the early Church. The ingenuity of controversialists has, in various ways, endeavoured to elude the direct force of some of those statements; but the general impression which they leave upon every unbiassed mind, no sophistry or special pleading can efface. Nor will that impression be impaired even after we have brought forward (as we shall do, when stating the Roman Catholic side of the argument) other passages from the same or different Fathers, in which the use and authority of Tradition are dwelt on. For it will, we trust, appear perfectly obvious, first that the Tridentine notion of Tradition, as an authoritative source of essential truths not contained in Scripture, was utterly unknown to the ancient Church; and, secondly, that even with respect to inhesive truths (i.e., doctrines either expressly or implicitly contained in Scripture), the first and last appeal was made to the written Word, the evidence of Church-Tradition being referred to either as subordinate and simply corroborative; or else in controversy with heretics, who questioned the authenticity of the orthodox Scriptures; or, finally, under other very special circumstances.

But the chain of evidence in favour of the Protestant rule of faith does not terminate with the fifth, or indeed with any, century of the Church's history. We have upon our side the testimony of some of the greatest theologians of every age. For instance, Johannes Damascenus, the great oracle of the Eastern Church in the eighth century, thus writes—"All things that are delivered to us by the Law, the Prophets, the Apostles, and the Evangelists, we receive, acknowledge, and reverence, seeking for nothing beyond these" (41). In the beginning of the 15th century, the famous Gerson, Chancellor of the University of Paris, and the most learned man of his time, thus expresses himself—"In the examination of doctrines, the first and chief thing to be attended to is if the doctrine be conformable to Holy Scripture, since Scripture has been delivered to us, as a sufficient and infallible rule, for the government of the whole ecclesiastical body and its members, to the end of the world. It is, therefore, such an art, such a rule or exemplar, that any other doctrine which is not conformable to it is either to be rejected as heretical, or is to be accounted altogether suspicious, or not appertaining to religion"(42). This is precisely the doctrine of the Church of England in her sixth article.

Nay, more, it is an unquestionable fact, that in the Council of Trent itself, the opinions of the prelates were not unanimous respecting the famous decree, so often referred to, which placed Tradition on an equality with Scripture. The Bishops of Fano and Chioggia especially protested against this decree; and the latter went so far as to exclaim that it was impious to elevate Tradition to the level of Scripture(43). Even in that very assembly, whose avowed object was to condemn the so-called heresies of the Reformers, there were found men honest and bold enough to proclaim and defend what had been the unquestioned doctrine of the Catholic Church during many ages, and had never ceased to be held by many of its greatest ornaments. Roman Catholics, and even Protestants themselves, seem to take it for granted, as a matter of course, that the decrees of the Council of Trent were passed with the full concurrence of all its members, and that the characteristic dogmas of the modern Church of Rome were then regarded as established verities, which only needed the authority of the Church to sanction them as essential to salvation. The fact, however, is far otherwise: many of those dogmas were then open questions, about which great diversity of opinion existed. But as any appearance of such diversity, in the formal decisions of the Council, would have furnished the "heretics" with a powerful argument against what they maintained to be innovations on the doctrines of the Primitive Church, it was arranged that, before each session, general "Congregations" should be held, in which the decrees to be proposed should be discussed, and the opinions of the prelates taken upon them; it being understood that whatever was decided upon by the majority, in those preliminary meetings, should be passed in the following session, with the unanimous consent of the Council, the dissentient minority tacitly acquiescing in the previous decision (44). Such was the mode in which Tradition was placed upon a level with the written Word of God by the unanimous consent of the Catholic Church, as represented by the "Sacred, Œcumenical, Synod of Trent."

We have now closed the case on the part of the United Church of England and Ireland. We have given a very brief, and, we are fully conscious, a very imperfect sketch of some of the arguments by which the sixth article of that Church may be vindicated. We have endeavoured to state the case with all fairness, not as mere advocates, but as honest and earnest inquirers after the truth. In the same spirit we shall proceed, in a future number, to exhibit the Roman Catholic side of the question, and to adduce our reasons for excepting to the proofs which the ablest divines of that communion have alleged in support of the Tridentine "Decree concerning the Canonical Scriptures."

A FEW WORDS ON THE JUBILEE.

It has lately been made public in the newspapers, that "a jubilee" was granted last November, by the present Pope, and has commenced in Dublin on the first of this month. To understand fully the nature of the benefits supposed to be conveyed by a jubilee, it is necessary to be acquainted with the doctrine of indulgences. On this subject we purpose elsewhere to give some explanation (see p. 115); but it may also be interesting to our readers if we give a short historical account of the jubilees that have already taken place.

Whatever be the benefits conferred by a jubilee, it appears that the church did without them for thirteen centuries, since the first jubilee of which we have any authentic account was granted by Pope Boniface VIII. in the year 1300. In that year a report got into circulation, whose authority could not be ascertained, but which was soon extensively believed, that it was an ancient law of the church that those who devoutly visited St. Peter's church, in the years which terminate centuries, merited thereby indulgences for a hundred years. So many strangers came to Rome, we are told, in consequence of this rumour, that the Pope was moved to inquire into the matter. He obtained the testimony of four aged persons to the truth of the report; one of whom, being of the age of 107, testified that when he was a child, in the year 1200, his father had gone up to Rome, and lived there as long as his means permitted, and that on his return he had told him, if he lived to the year 1300, to be sure also to go up to Rome, to enjoy the same spiritual advantages. By this evidence the Pope professed himself convinced, and published an epistle deciding that in every centennial year those who should

(43) "This equality [ac. of Scripture and Tradition] was not approved of by some, and especially by Bertano (Bishop of Fano). For, he argued, although both might proceed from God, from whom all truths are ultimately derived, yet it did not follow that everything true should be regarded with the same veneration as the Sacred Scriptures. That, inasmuch as some traditions had failed, it was obvious that God was unwilling that so much stability, and, consequently, so much veneration, should be attributed to them as to Scripture. Nachianti, Bishop of Chioggia, foreigned still more bitterly against an equality of this kind, Traditions being considered by him not as Divine revelations but as [human] laws, the weight of which he deemed inapportable. He exclaimed, when the question of their universal adoption was proposed, that that equality between the Sacred Writings and Traditions appeared to him impious." Pallavicino Istoria del Concil. di Trento. Lib. vi. cap. 3, 4. The other bishops, more true to the principles of their Church, heard this protest, we are told, with wonder and horror; and, accordingly, he who had dared to vindicate the supremacy authority of Holy Scripture was compelled to acquiesce in the decree which directly denied it.

(44) "The 8th of February, Cardinal del Monte [afterwards Pope Julius III.], held a congregation, wherein he desired the Fathers of the Council to remember the prayer he had formerly made to them, not to give their opinions anew in the sessions, upon the decrees that were published there; since those decrees, having been passed in the congregations by a majority of voices, this would only serve, as he had formerly told them, to give the heretics an occasion of talking, when they should see that the decrees that were published in the sessions were contradicted by the Fathers of the Council themselves."—Du Pin. Eccles. Hist. 16th cent. Vol. III. Lib. iii. ch. 1. In the discussions which took place in the subsequent congregations respecting the four articles that were extracted from Luther's writings, Antonio Marinari, a Carmelite, with reference to the first of these articles expressed himself of opinion that Traditions should not be spoken of at all, and that "it would be better to imitate the ancient Fathers, who had always made use of Scripture alone, except in cases of necessity, without ever daring to put Tradition in competition with it."—P. Sarpi. Hist. du Conc. de Trente Liv. ii. ch. 46. Edit. Courayer. Cardinal Pallavicino attempts to throw discredit on this statement of Sarpi, but there seems to be no just ground for calling it in question.

confess and lament their sins, and should devoutly visit the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Rome, should receive a plenary indulgence.

An unfortunate circumstance, however, for the credit of the story is, that no mention is made of these centennial indulgences by any writer previous to 1300. Now, the influx of strangers which in those days a jubilee brought to Rome, was far beyond that which the Crystal Palace brought to London last year, with this difference, that the ordinary population of London, at present being many times the ordinary population of Rome in those days, the effect produced by the concourse of strangers at Rome would be far more noticeable. It is incredible, therefore, that if, in the year 1300, such an event had taken place as the proclamation of a plenary indulgence (and, as a necessary consequence, an immense throng of visitors to Rome), no mention should have been made of the fact by any writer of the time—just as incredible as that no writer of the year 1851 should make any mention of the great Exhibition. Accordingly we find Roman Catholic writers now very cautious about positively ascribing an earlier date to the first jubilee (although they are glad to insinuate that there were jubilees before 1300), and rather treat all inquiry into the date of the first jubilee as more curious than important. (See Introduction to the Instructions and Devotions for the Forty Hours' Adoration, published last month, with the approbation of Dr. Cullen.)

And yet it suggests some useful reflections, if we suppose that Pope Boniface was mistaken in the belief which he yielded to the story of the old gentleman, whose father had had the forethought to advise him how he should act if he lived a hundred years more. Such a mistake is not inconsistent with the received theory of the infallibility of the Pope; for even those who hold that he is infallible as to doctrine do not hold that he is always infallible, or that he is free from danger of error as to facts. It is true that the doctrines of the Christian religion all relate to matter of fact, and to such facts, too, as our natural powers cannot discover. But, however, it is supposed that when a Pope undertakes to decide, for example, whether the Blessed Virgin was conceived without sin many centuries ago, then he is free from danger of error; but that if he ventures to pronounce on what took place in his own city, only a hundred years before, then he is liable to mistake. Perhaps the truth is, that his mistakes are more easily exposed in the latter case than in the former. If he makes a mistake as to an event 100 years ago, many can contradict him; but if he pronounce wrong on an abstruse point of doctrine, he is tolerably free from all chance of detection.

This story may also give us an idea what dependence can be placed on oral tradition. Some people find it hard to conceive that the tradition of the church, in matters of doctrine, could ever alter, or that people could ever be persuaded to receive any new doctrine as if handed down to them from their fathers. But if people could be imposed on as to a fact that occurred in their own city a hundred years before, and made to believe (contrary to fact) that a remarkable assemblage had then been held among them, how much easier would it be to deceive them as to the antiquity of an abstruse point of doctrine, concerning which few of them, probably, had ever troubled their heads?

To return to the history of the jubilee. We have seen that Pope Boniface VIII. appointed the next recurrence of the jubilee at a distance of 100 years. People, however, were too impatient to wait so long. Doubtless the lodging-house keepers and shop-keepers of Rome were not disinclined to reap such another golden harvest as they had done in the year 1300. Accordingly, a little before the year 1350, very specious arguments were urged on the then Pope, Clement VI. He was reminded, that if jubilees were held only every 100 years, the shortness of human life is such, that numbers would be born after the end of one jubilee and die before the commencement of another, without having ever participated in the benefits of one. Convinced by this argument, and also by the fact that the jubilees were held among the Jews at intervals of every 50 years, Clement ordained that jubilees should be held in future every fifty years, and that the first, under the new rule, should be in 1350.

"The proclamation was diligently published in every part of Christendom, and excited an incredible ardour for the pilgrimage. During a winter of unusual inclemency the roads were thronged with devout travellers, many of whom were compelled to pass the night without shelter or nourishment, in the fear of robbery and the certainty of extortion. The streets of Rome presented, for some months, the spectacle of a vast moving multitude continually flowing through them, and inexhaustibly renovated. The three appointed churches were thronged with successive crowds, eager to throw off the burden of their sins, and also prepared to deposit some pious offering at every visit.

"The streets were perpetually full, so that every one was obliged, whether on foot or on horseback, to follow the crowd, and this made the progress very slow and disagreeable. The holy napkin of Christ was shown at St. Peter's, every Sunday and solemn festival for the consolation of the pilgrims. The press then was great and indiscreet; so it happened that sometimes two, sometimes four or six, even twelve, were found there crushed or trampled to death.

"It is affirmed, that from Christmas to Easter, not fewer than one hundred thousand strangers were added to the population of the pontifical city; for as many as returned home after the comfort of the prescribed ceremonies were replaced by pilgrim bands, and those again by others, in such perennial abundance that, even during the late and unwholesome season of the year, the number was never reduced below two hundred thousand. Every house was converted into an inn, and the object of every Roman was to extort the utmost possible profit from the occasion; neither shame nor fear restrained the eagerness of their avarice. While the neighbouring districts abounded with provisions, the citizens refused to admit a greater supply than was scarcely sufficient to satisfy, at the highest expense, the simplest demands of the pilgrims. And thus those devotees, after surmounting all other difficulties, were at length delivered over to be starved as well as plundered by the inhabitants of the holy city."

We have given these details that the reader may have an idea what kind of a thing a jubilee was in those days, and that he may be able to judge whether it is likely that such an event would leave no trace on contemporary records.

It may be imagined that the return of an event which brought such temporal advantages to the people of Rome, and such spiritual blessings to its visitors, should be anxiously looked for, and that even fifty years should be thought too long to wait for it. Accordingly, Pope Urban VI. ordained that jubilees should be held in future, three times, instead of only twice in a century. The first under the new rule was proclaimed for the year 1390. Urban VI. did not live to preside over it, but it was held under his successor, Boniface IX. Again great multitudes presented themselves at Rome, unmoved by distance and expense, and even by the personal dangers which awaited them from the bandits of the mountains, or from the partizans of the rival Pope; for it must be told that at this time, and for many years after, the world beheld the strange spectacle of two Popes dividing the allegiance of Christendom, and each anathematizing the other and his adherents. Such a schism must have greatly affected the numbers of pilgrims to Rome, and made them much fewer than they would have been, had Boniface been acknowledged by the whole Christian world; but Boniface found a remedy for this. It was he who invented the secondary jubilee—such, namely, as that which is now offered to the citizens of Dublin. Hitherto the benefits of the plenary indulgence could not be obtained without a visit to Rome; Boniface first sent his emissaries among all the nations by whom he was acknowledged, with commission to sell the plenary indulgence to all indiscriminately for the same sum which the journey to Rome would have cost them. The change is ascribed, even by respectable Roman Catholic writers, to the avarice of the Pope, who became so prodigal of his indulgences, refusing them to none who paid for them, that he brought the article into contempt. But, notwithstanding, we can see a good reason for the change, for why should the benefits of plenary pardon of sin be confined to those who had it in their power to visit Rome? Why might not other Christians, whose strength, or means, or circumstances did not allow them to take a long journey, be admitted to the same privilege?

We have not space to tell how the jubilee was held again in Rome ten years after, in the year 1400, with larger concourse than before; how some of those who attended it perished miserably by the pestilence which then laid waste the holy city; and how others, whose resources were exhausted through their devotions and their sufferings, when they applied for aid to the apostolic coffers, were dismissed them with a cold and contemptuous refusal. Nor shall we tell how the interval between the times of its celebration was finally reduced, by Paul II., to period of twenty-five years.

Why it may not be held still oftener it is not easy to say; for if the treasure of the church be inexhaustible, the Pope need have no scruple to throw it freely open at all times. We have seen that all the changes which have been yet made, have tended to reduce the intervals at which jubilees have been held. Boniface VIII. thought it enough to throw the treasures of the church unreservedly open once every hundred years; but his successors found that they might safely exercise the same indulgence, first every fifty years, then every thirty-three years, then every twenty-five years. Boniface VIII. only granted these privileges to those who would visit Rome; his successors, to those of other nations—at first, who could afford to pay; but, at present, without any direct payment for the indulgence, to those who give alms, according to their means, and subscribe, besides, to the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. Still, even at an interval of twenty-five years, how many there are who, being of too tender years to profit by one jubilee, die before the announcement of the next? Or how many there are who, having even profited by one jubilee, run up afterwards a new account of sins, which never find a similar opportunity of remission? As long as man is liable to daily sin, the remedy he requires for the pardon of sin is one which must be applicable at all places and in all times.

Perhaps some future Pope may discover, that God has been more merciful than man in this matter, and that, not at intervals of 100, or 50, or 33, or 25 years, not at Jerusalem exclusively, or at Rome, but everywhere, and at all time, the blood of Jesus Christ our Lord cleanseth from all sin.

DOCTOR BRICCONE'S VISIT TO BALLINTUBBER.

PERHAPS some of you may remember a story I told you a couple of months ago, about two farmers of Ballintubber, and may care to hear something more of your friends, Pat Callaghan and Dan Kelly. What I have now to tell happened a few years after the things I told you of in my last story, and about ten years after the Ballintubber property had come into Lord Kilmarty's hands. If any one who had known the place in Mr. Sherwin's time, could see it now, he could hardly believe it to be the same place. I called it a little village in my last story; but now it had come almost to deserve to be called a small town. Where there had been before but a couple of lines of miserable cabins, ornamented with immense dung heaps, and separated by a road broken up with dirty puddles, through which you could hardly step your way, there was now a clean, well-paved street, with a number of slated houses, looking as neat as possible. Among them were some handsome shops, which showed that the ideas of the people of Ballintubber had become much more lofty, and their wants more numerous since we last heard of them. There was Mr. Martin the grocer, who sold, not only tea, and coffee, and sugar, but soap, and candles, and rope, and cordage, and paper, and pens, and ink, and gunpowder, and brushes, and tin kettles, and all manner of odds and ends you can think of. Then, if you wanted to clothe yourself from head to foot, you might do it at Mr. O'Carroll's, and your wife, too, in the bargain. Very handsome things Mr. O'Carroll had to sell; and he boasted that Lady Kilmarty confessed that she could not get better in Dublin (for I should not forget to tell you that there was now a young Lady Kilmarty; Lord Kilmarty had brought her home with him, about three years before, and a very good lady she was). Well, and there was Mr. Jones the apothecary, who had found it worth his while to set up a shop in Ballintubber; and, people said, was doing a very good business. It was not that the place was more unhealthy than it used to be; quite the contrary. Since Lord Kilmarty had had it better drained and kept more clean, there had been much less of agues and fever, with which they had formerly been a good deal troubled. Still it seems that there was work enough, not only for old Dr. Brady, who had lived at Ballintubber since Mr. Sherwin's time, but also for the young dispensary doctor, Dr. Farrell, who had come since. And, besides, there were many who, like Dan Kelly, when there was sickness in their families, seldom troubled either of these doctors; but just got some doctor's stuff from Mr. Jones.

However, at the time I am now talking of, Mr. Jones was nearly relieved, on a sudden, of all his customers, by a great Italian doctor, who one day unexpectedly made his appearance at Ballintubber. An immense sensation was made in the little town by the singularity of his appearance, and the manner of his entry. I don't know that I have ever seen any one like him in this country, though I have abroad. He was dressed in a splendid black robe, enriched with ornaments, of which Mr. O'Reilly himself could not tell the meaning. He came in a kind of caravan, or close carriage, such as travelling showmen carry their shows about in; and he was attended by three servants, dressed in a style of such magnificence as had never been seen before in Ballintubber. They had always thought Lord Kilmarty's liveries the height of grandeur; but they thought his lordship's livery looked no better than a workhouse uniform compared with the brilliancy of the new comers. The caravan took up its station in the fair-green quietly enough; but then the doctor sent his servants about the town, performing on instruments of music, and halting from time to time, while the leader of them addressed the people on the wonderful powers of his master, and circulated handbills among them. They had soon a crowd after them. First came the children, attracted by the music; for they had seldom heard anything finer than a stray barrel organ, which occasionally, at long intervals, made its way down there; so that you may imagine such a military band as made its appearance now was something to be wondered at. And the grown people were soon not ashamed also to follow the procession. And their curiosity was still more strongly excited when they heard the speeches of the chief servant, and read the handbills which he distributed. These bills ran somewhat as follows:—

GOOD NEWS FOR BALLINTUBBER, ARRIVAL OF THE CELEBRATED ITALIAN PHYSICIAN,

THE WORLD-RENOWNED
SIGNOR BRICCONE,
THE INFALLIBLE DOCTOR;
WHOSE MEDICINES ARE INVARIABLY ATTENDED WITH NEVER-FAILING SUCCESS!!!

Abandon the poisons with which ignorant quacks have been dosing you: those who take their so-called medicines must inevitably, sooner or later, perish from the pernicious consequences, for Doctor Briccone is in possession of .

THE ONLY SURE ROAD TO HEALTH!!!

Then followed a list of marvellous cures performed by the doctor, of which I may have more to tell you presently. Such tempting announcements as these could hardly fail of being successful. The people ran together from all sides; the crowd swelled like a snowball, and by the time that the procession had made the circuit of the place there was hardly a soul left in Ballintubber, and there was such an assembly before the doctor, on the fair green, as you could hardly match at the busiest hour of the fair day. It was a fine summer evening when our two friends, Dan Kelly and Pat Callaghan, had finished their work, and they didn't pretend to be wiser than their neighbours; so there they were on the fair green, too, and, what's more, their wives and children also, from Tim Callaghan, who was a fine, likely lad, able to do a good day's work himself, to little Mary Kelly, who was so young that she wanted to lay violent hands on one of the brass instruments, when the men had stopped playing, and cried because her mother would not allow her to keep it. So when the doctor had got all the people together, he made a speech to them to something like the following effect:—"I am glad to see so many of you assembled here this evening, my good people. It makes me think that you will be grateful to me for the trouble I have taken on your account. Here I am, after having travelled thousands of miles, and all for your good. I wished that the people of this country should share in the benefits which I have conferred on Italy, and France, and Spain. My heart bleeds when I think how many of you must have suffered from cruel diseases; how many a family must have struggled with hunger while its poor father has been laid on a bed of sickness ("That was our case this time five years, Pat, acushla," said Biddy Callaghan to her husband), how many an unfortunate creature is now lying in its cold grave that might have been saved, if I had been able to come sooner among you. And what help have you had in your troubles? A set of ignorant impostors, who call themselves physicians, who don't know how to cure you, and who give you, when you are sick, poisons which must be fatal to you in the long run."

The doctor was going on with much violent abuse of the regular physicians of the place, but Pat Callaghan, who never wanted for pluck, spoke out:—

"I will not hear Mr. Jones run down in that manner, for I know him to be a very knowledgeable man, and very good he has been to me." And then others of the people took courage, and Dr. Farrell and Dr. Brady had friends to speak in their favour. But Dr. Briccone was not in the least disconcerted. "Listen to me, good people," cried he. "I don't in the least blame you for speaking up for those whom, in your ignorance, you think your friends. But if you will stay awhile I will prove to you, and make it quite clear to you, that you have been mistaken, and that these doctors of yours have been going on a system which cannot possibly be right. Tell me now, do you suppose that God Almighty intended that people should always be racked with pain and plagued with diseases, without any hope of recovery from them? or do you think that he has been merciful enough to provide medicines by which men may be cured of their sicknesses?"

"Oh," said Pat, "no doubt he has, glory to his name. It would be a bad world all out if, when one got sick, he could never get cured again."

"Very good," said the doctor; "you see that if God sends us diseases, he sends us cures too; and there's not a disease in the world that he has not provided a remedy for. But answer me this, what good would his providing a remedy be if he did not put us in the way of knowing what it was? Suppose now that you," said he, singling out Dan Kelly, "were on the flat of your back, with a bad sickness; and suppose there was an herb that would cure you in five minutes, what would you be the better of it, if you did not know what it was or where it was to be found?"

"Sorra much," said Dan.

"Or suppose that your friends went by guess-work, trying first one medicine and then another, on the chance that maybe they might hit on the right one?"

"They might be trying a long time," said Dan.

"Don't you see then," said the doctor, "it stands to reason that God would not put cures for all your complaints in the world, without also providing some one able always to tell you what the right cure is? If the world was full of excellent medicines they would be of no use to you, unless you had some one able to point them out to you; you see, then, that it is necessary that there should be some one always at hand to be consulted and ready to tell you, without the possibility of mistake, what the right cure for your sickness is—not one who should go by guess-work (like your doctors here, who, for the most part, guess wrong), but one who should always know with certainty how to make you well."

"I don't think the doctors here are so bad," said Pat Callaghan. "I'll always say that my little Julia owed her life, under God, to Mr. Jones's care, last autumn."

"I don't say," said Mr. Briccone, "that they might not make one cure now and then. The fact is, that they have got one or two of my medicines, and as far as that goes they are all right; but the greater part of my cures they know nothing about, and they give you poison instead, which will be sure to bring all that trust in them to the grave. However, to come back to what I was saying—I have showed you that what you want is not a doctor who should be groping in the dark, even if he were right, now and then, by accident, but one who should know with certainty what he was doing, and who should be always able to tell how to cure you. Now, can you tell me are your doctors here always in the right, and are they able to tell how to cure every disease that comes among you?"

"Well," said Pat, "I must own they can't; for when the cholera was here, scores died in spite of them, and I remember it was said that the doctors were at their wits' end, and could not tell what to make of it."

"Exactly," said the doctor. "There now you see the difference. Now, the reason I am called the infallible doctor is, that I always know the right cure. I am never puzzled. I never have any doubt or hesitation. The moment I see a patient, if God's time has not come to take him, I can tell what will make him well again."

"Well, sir," said Pat, "you have made it plain enough that this is the kind of doctor we want; and I believe you are right in saying that it is not to be supposed God would give us medicine without sending us some one who could show us how to use it. But how are we to know that you are the right person, that you are the real infallible doctor?"

To this question the doctor began by telling them a story of a celebrated physician long ago, whom every one acknowledged to be always right then, and who, he said, lived in the same town from which Dr. Briccone came; and, consequently, that it was plain he must be his genuine successor, and be in possession of all his cures. I cannot repeat to you exactly what he said, for he did not seem to make out his case very clearly, and I suppose he thought so himself, for he soon tried a new tack:—

"If I am not the infallible doctor," said he, "I defy you to say who is. Did you ever hear of any one claiming to be so but myself? Does Dr. Brady pretend to be always right? or Dr. Farrell? or Mr. Jones? You know very well they dare not say so. Then, as I have made it plain to you that there must be an infallible doctor somewhere, and as no one but myself ventures to say he is the person, you cannot have any doubt in trusting to me. I am known all over the world. I sell 700 millions of my pills every year. I have agents in every place you can think of. And will you go and prefer to me creatures like Mr. Jones, that no one ever heard of outside the town of Ballintubber? Another point I wish you to mind is, that my medicines are the same everywhere. Wherever you are, at Paris or Madrid, or at Rome or Lisbon, if you tell your complaint to one of my agents, they will always give you the same medicine. They never differ with each other. Dr. Briccone's medicines are always the same. Now, tell me honestly, can you say the same for your doctors? Even in your little town, do your doctors agree among themselves?"

"In troth they don't," said Dan Kelly, "for when Mr. Jones could not cure my Kitty, this time two years, he advised me to call in Dr. Farrell, and Dr. Farrell said that what Mr. Jones had been doing was quite wrong, and he prescribed quite a different set of medicines. And I have heard that Dr. Brady and Dr. Farrell are dreadfully jealous of each other, and that Dr. Farrell says Dr. Brady's method of practice is out of date, and that Dr. Brady says there is more harm than good in Dr. Farrell's new-fangled remedies."

"Out of date!" said Dr. Briccone. "No wonder; they are always changing. I never change; I sell the same pills now my father and my grandfather sold before me. But here, you see, even in this little place, where you have only three medical men, they cannot agree together; and what would you say if you could know the varieties in the medicines used by all the different physicians in England and Ireland? and, much more, if you could know how totally different the medicines used on the Continent are? Why, half the medicines they use abroad they never hear of here; and if you were to take a prescription, written by a physician here, to an apothecary abroad, he could not tell how to make it up, and the chances are that he might never have heard of some of the medicines mentioned in it. The fact is, truth is one, errors are numberless; and when once people abandon Dr. Briccone's infallible pills, there is no knowing what quackeries they will take up with; they fall into the hands of a set of impostors, each of whom has his own nostrum, but no two of whom agree with each other. There is no end to the absurdities people fall into when they forsake my infallible medicines. There are parts of England where people expect to be cured by being breathed on by a piebald horse, or by eating fried mice, or drinking toad broth, or by using charms made of hanged men's bones; while others lose their faith in doctors altogether, and imagine there is no use in medicine at all."

"This doctor seems a very sensible man," said Dan Kelly to Pat Callaghan. "I wonder is it safe to take his medicines?"

"Safe!" cried Dr. Briccone, who overheard him; "I will show you that it is far safer to trust to me than to any one else. I defy any of the doctors here to say that my medicines will be certain to do you injury."

"Why, as I was running here," said Pat Callaghan, "I was stopped by Mr. Jones, who asked me where I was going; and when I told him, he said I was a fool to go listen to a quack who wanted to sell me bread pills at a shilling a dozen."

"Listen to that, good people," said Dr. Briccone. "There you hear what the utmost malignity of my enemies ventures to say of me. Even Mr. Jones, whose interest it is to cry me down as much as possible, does not venture to charge me with selling anything worse than bread pills; he does not venture to say my medicines are unwholesome. Now, I tell you his medicines are poisons. So now judge which is the safest to trust to. I tell you, if you take his medicines, you will undoubtedly be poisoned. He does not dare to say that if you take my medicines you will be the worse of them. So it is quite clear that it is safer for you to come to me than to go to him. Now, it does not become me to speak but my servant there will tell you what wonderful cures I have performed."

So then Dr. Briccone sat down, and the servant began his history of his master's miraculous remedies. First his stories, though marvellous enough, were not altogether out of the way; but when he found the people swallow these readily, he told them some such tremendous whoppers as I hardly know how to repeat. I should tell you that Dr. Briccone did not appear to listen to what his servant was saying; and if he was asked whether any particular story, told by the servant, was true, he would answer in a dignified way:—"I cannot be expected to remember every cure I perform. My servant is a very honest man; I would keep no one about me that was not, and I dare say you can trust him. And if I did not perform the particular cure you ask about, you may be sure of this, that I have performed others just as wonderful." However, as the stories, of which I will give you a specimen or two, were printed on the doctor's handbills, and circulated with his approval, I suppose it is fair to consider him answerable for them.

"Look at these pills," said he; "these are what the doctor uses in all cases of palsy. If a person has lost the use of his limbs for years, one box of these pills is sure to make him walk as well as ever."

After telling some cases of the cures of men who had been bedridden for years, he went on to say:—

"Some years ago, in France, there was a man, named Denis Parry, who had been formerly cured by our pills, but in the time of the troubles there, he was condemned to death, and his head was cut off. Well, his wife put two or three of my master's pills into his mouth, and up he got, and walked as well with his head in his hand as ever he had done with it between his shoulders. And, for all I know, he might be walking to this day; but when he had gone a mile, or perhaps it might be a little more, the pills were shaken out, and fell down through the hole in his neck; then he lay down in the place where he was, and there you may see his tomb to this day."

At this story there was a general exclamation.

"Don't be surprised at this," said the servant; "I have other stories to tell you far more surprising than this. You must know that my master had a great magazine of these pills in a house in the same country where Jerusalem is. Since that time he has learned never to keep so many of them together in the same place, but then he did not know there was any danger. Well, these pills have so much virtue in conferring the power of motion, and there were so many of them together, that the whole house where they were, moved off. It took its flight across the seas, and it did not fix itself until several of the pills were shaken out; then it settled down in Italy, where it is to this day."

"Thunder and turf," cried Pat Callaghan; "did mortal ever hear the like of that? That's more than ever I could believe."

"You need not believe it if you don't like," said the servant. "My master's pills will cure you all the same whether you do or not. But would you believe your own eyes? Well, I saw it with my own eyes. I lived near that house in Italy for a year; and these men here (pointing to the other servants) can testify that they saw it as well as myself. But the best proof I can give you is, that thousands have visited the house, and they (who have the best right to judge whether the story be true or not) have left such presents behind them there, that if the house was inclined to move off again, my master could ballast it with the guineas it has brought him in."

There was no disputing such evidence as this. The sale of the pills went on merrily, and at nightfall the crowd poured back to Ballintubber, well laden with Dr. Briccone's medicines, and leaving a good deal of their loose cash behind them. For though the doctor had come among them from motives of pure benevolence, yet it appeared that all his plans tended very much to the filling of his own pockets. And, indeed, he owned that the chinking of the money in his purse was quite essential to the efficacy of his medicines. Dan Kelly was among the largest of his purchasers. Pat Callaghan was very much disposed to believe in him too, but he was a more cautious man. He had a long talk with the doctor at the end of his public speech, and he thought he would like to have a talk with Lord Kilmarty too, before making up his mind. So next morning, at the hour that he knew Lord Kilmarty was in the habit of coming out to walk about his farms, Pat steered his way up towards the great house, and sure enough he did not fail of meeting his lordship.

"Good morning, Pat," said he.

"Good morrow kindly, your lordship," said Pat.

"Well, Pat," said he; "I hear you had great doings last night. Were you down on the fair green with the rest?"

"Why, then," said Pat, "if that was not the very thing that I wanted to have a talk with your lordship about, and to know what your lordship's opinion was; for I was there sure enough; and I think I never heard a finer spoken man than this new doctor that's come here; and he made it clear to me that he was the only man that could cure myself and all my family of whatever sicknesses we had; but still I thought it better not to deal with him until I heard what your lordship would say about him."

"Well, Pat," said Lord Kilmarty, "I'd like to hear how he made this clear to you."

"Why, my lord, you know neither Dr. Brady, nor Dr. Farrell, nor Mr. Jones, can say that they are always certain of being right in the medicines they order; and when they meet a strange case they are often in doubt, and, perhaps, they don't agree with each other; but this doctor says that he is never in doubt, and that his medicines never fail, and that his agents never disagree with each other, but sell the same pills all the world over."

Lord Kilmarty smiled, and said—"Why, I thought, Pat, you were too sensible a man to trust to any man just because he gave himself a good character. Is it common sense of you to think that he must be a better doctor than your old friend, Mr. Jones, just because he talks bigger and brags louder, and will not own that he may happen sometimes to make a mistake?"

"But, my lord," said Pat, "if this is not the real infallible doctor that never makes a mistake, who else can it be? for I never heard of any one else but himself that claimed to be the man."

"Why," said Lord Kilmarty, "what makes you think that any doctor is infallible?"

"That is what he showed us, my lord," said Pat; "that the Lord would never have sent medicines into the world, without providing some one who could tell us where to find them; and that he would not leave our health and our lives depending on guess-work, and on doctors that were not certain how to make a right cure."

"Pat," said Lord Kilmarty, "do you see the eagle's nest in the cliff above there? I wish you would spread your wings and fly there, and bring down the young birds."

Pat did not open his wings, but he opened his eyes instead.

"Because," continued Lord Kilmarty, "wings must be a very useful thing to have; and I am sure you must have got a pair; for do you think that the Almighty would give wings to crows, and sparrows, and tomtits, and not give a pair to you, that they would be of so much more use to?"

"I take you now, my lord," said Pat; "but, with submission, the case is very different. For though wings would be very pleasant to have, still we can do very well without them; but one's health is a matter of so much importance to us, and it is such ruin to a poor man to be laid upon a bed of sickness, that I think it stands to reason that if God was merciful enough to provide a way for us to get well, he would not fail, also, to give us a certainty of finding it out."

"I am quite sure of this," said Lord Kilmarty, "that it would be a very pleasant thing never to be sick, or else to be quite sure of getting well again at once, if one did ever get sick; but I fear this would be too much happiness for this world. What I meant, talking to you about wings, was, to show you that we had no right to conclude that God has given us such and such things, merely because we think they would be very useful to us. We have no right to set up ourselves as God's judges, or to dictate to him how he ought to have made us, or to imagine that he must have dealt with us in the manner we could wish as the most desirable. If we had such a certain way of recovering from sickness as you speak of, perhaps we should be careless about avoiding sickness, and taking proper care of our healths. And if we were to indulge our conjectures, we should have fancied there would be no such thing as sickness in the world at all."

"Well, my lord," said Pat, scratching his head, "I don't know what to say again your lordship; but I find it hard to get out of my head, but when God sent us medicines he would be sure to send us also an infallible doctor, to tell us with certainty what the right medicines are."

"Perhaps," said Lord Kilmarty, "you may be able to get this into your head, that you might also say, that if God had given us an infallible doctor, he would also have given us a way of knowing, with certainty, who the real infallible doctor was—some better way of knowing than merely to see who bragged most. For you must know that though Dr. Briccone does sell a great many of his pills, there are a great many more people, and those very sensible men, who don't believe in him at all, and say that he is no more infallible than you or I; and, so far from that, that his pills are very unwholesome. I grant you, that if he could prove that he performed those miraculous cures he prints in his handbills, then we might have some reason for trusting him; but his own friends only laugh at these stories, and you see he is very cautious about pledging himself to them. So I may ask you what's the use of God's sending an infallible doctor into the world, when he does not give us an infallible way of finding him out? And," continued Lord Kilmarty, "as you are guessing what it is likely God would do, I will guess this, that if he did send us an infallible doctor, the man so favoured with wisdom would not be a profligate and abandoned character. Now, I know something of this Dr. Briccone's history, and I can tell you that his life, at times, has been so loose and immoral that I would be ashamed to tell you the particulars of it."

"I think, my lord," said Pat, "you must have heard these stories from some of the doctor's enemies."

"Enemies!" said Lord Kilmarty, taking a newspaper from his pocket, "not at all. See here this advertisement from Mr. Baron, one of the doctor's agents, who puffs off his pills as well as any man alive; and look here, he confesses that, some years ago (ay, when the doctor was a middle-aged man), he was a monster of iniquity! To be sure, he has reformed his life somewhat now; but at the time I am speaking of he sold his infallible pills, and Mr. Baron says they had just as much virtue as now."

"Well, but," said Pat, "after all, is it not safer for me to take the doctor's pills? for he has made me afraid of being poisoned by Mr. Jones, and I don't hear that Mr. Jones says as much harm of him."

"Yes, you sensible man," said Lord Kilmarty. "Surely, it is safe to trust to the man that brags the loudest of himself, and says the most harm of his rivals. But as for the safety of these pills, I wish you would get me a few of them, and I will have them analyzed by a good chemist, and then I will tell you whether they are harmless or not."

"I can't do that, my lord," said Pat; "for the doctor says that his pills must be swallowed without examination; and that it would ruin their virtue if any one was to try to find out what is in them. And he will not give them to any one who does not promise to use them without attempting to examine what they are."

"That looks very suspicious, my friend Pat," said Lord Kilmarty; "I think if he knew there was no harm in them he would not have such an objection to their being examined."

"Well, I might think so, my lord," said Pat, "only for this:—You see he has seven thousand agents in different parts of Europe, and I can't think that they would all agree in selling the same pills unless they knew that they had none but wholesome ingredients."

"But," said Lord Kilmarty, "you have just told me the very thing that makes this agreement of his agents a fact of no value at all. Your doctor made the most of the differences between the regular physicians, and yet you know that it is only in very difficult and uncommon cases that they have any doubts or differences. In all the common sicknesses that may happen to you, you will find they all follow the same method. Now, this is an agreement which will give you some confidence. When Dr. Brady and Dr. Farrell tell you that Mr. Jones is treating you quite right, you have good reason to think that he is; for you know that they are judging for themselves; they are not in league with Mr. Jones, and, perhaps, they might be well pleased enough if they could show that he was going wrong. So when you find all the regular physicians agree, you have good reason for thinking them in the right. But now, when Dr. Briccone's 7,000 agents all agree in selling the same sealed packages of pills, which they must not examine for themselves, and cannot even tell what is in them, they have no better warrant for the pills being good than that they heard Dr. Briccone say so; and their agreement does not make you a bit more sure of their virtue than you were when you heard him praise them yourself."

Pat had a good deal more conversation with Lord Kilmarty, and the end of it was, that he determined on sticking to Mr. Jones, in spite of all Dr. Briccone's big words. But for all that, Dr. Briccone drove a very good trade at Ballintubber. I cannot say that he had much success in curing any of the diseases I ever heard of before; but he frightened the wits out of the people by telling them of a new and dreadful disease that would come upon them shortly. He described so vividly the pains this disease would cause them, the violent purgings, and the hot burnings, which he swore would equal the torments of hell, that the people, and especially the women, were half mad with fright, and came in crowds to purchase his remedies against this dreadful disease. These remedies principally consisted of pills, which Mr. Jones asserted were only bread, but which Dr. Briccone was positive were quite another thing.

He had other remedies, indeed, but they were very nauseous and disagreeable. He praised very much those people who would take them. But to those who disliked them (what struck me as very funny) he sold licences to do without taking them: and he promised that by merely looking at a pill-box, or by seeing a man take a pill, they should get as much benefit as if they had taken so many bottles of his medicine. For you must know that Dr. Briccone asserted, that those who took more of his medicine than their health required did not injure their stomachs by it, as you might imagine, but, on the contrary, laid in a stock of extra health, which he had the power of selling to his other customers. I suppose these remedies must have had great virtue, for I never heard of any one suffering from this new disease. However, they paid Dr. Briccone very well, and he has a shop open in Ballintubber for the sale of them to this day.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER, 1852.

DURING the last month our thoughts have dwelt continually on the subject of our last article in this part of our paper. A people, the most ancient, perhaps, now in Europe, journeying by HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS across a mighty ocean, to seek new homes in the far west wilderness of a new world—alike for the distance of the journey, and the multitude of travellers, this vast movement stands unparalleled in the history of mankind.

And of us who remain, who has not sent some loved one of their hearts and homes to join that mighty band of exiles on the homeless sea and distant shore? Who has not seen or felt the partings, when the aged parent has blessed his long and much-loved child on setting out upon that long journey that anticipates the solemn separation of the grave? Which of us has not sought himself, or seen those round him seek, the long-wished-for letter that brings some little tidings of those we shall see no more on earth, but by taking ourselves the long, long journey that they have taken? Who has not witnessed the wasting grief of those who seek for months and years the never-coming letter, until the despairing conviction comes, that those whom we have loved we shall hear of no more on earth, till the sea shall give up its dead?

Such are the trials, deep and great, of a whole nation on its journey to a distant world. Such must be the consequences to individuals, of the mighty movements of a people.

But along with this, we see a mightier movement still. As if it were not enough for a nation to leave its ancient land and cross the world, there must be a movement as great in the very mind and soul of the nation; as if it were not enough to abandon its ancient home unless it should abandon the religion of its fathers too. The proof of the fact we gave in our last number, from the Rev. Mr. Mullen, Roman Catholic curate of Clonmellon, who thus states the result of his inquiries on the spot—"THE FAITH HAS DIED OUT IN MILLIONS." God forbid that we should trifle with such a fact, much less triumph over it. It is a solemn and a fearful fact. If the mind swells with deep emotion at the thoughts of a nation without a home, struggling across the ocean and the wilderness, how much more awful and solemn is the thought, that in religion too, that nation is wandering more hopelessly, without an aim, and without a guide! And is it anything short of this to say—"The faith has died out in millions?"

We dare not trifle with such a fact. We dare not use it for a political purpose, as Mr. Mullen has done. We dare not use it to triumph over a church whose people have thus wandered. One thought, and one only, fills our minds in contemplating facts so great and so terrible, and that thought is, how the wandering of the Irish people in religion may be ended, so that in their pilgrimage through the wilderness of this world, their souls at least may be at rest.

That fearful fact which Mr. Mullen has disclosed, is proof that there has been something wrong with the Irish people. We anxiously avoid drawing any conclusion from it that is not strictly just. Were we to treat this fact in any party or sectarian spirit, we should be unworthy to propose a remedy. We have no right to say that this great falling off of the Irish people is any proof that their religion is false. Peoples and nations have forsaken true as well as false religions. But we are bound to say, that there has been something wrong. If their religion was true, then these people were not properly taught and grounded in it. That, at least, is a conclusion we must come to. And this conclusion is confirmed by the positive testimony of an American missionary priest, who has spent twelve years among the emigrants. That testimony, too, we gave in our last number, as we found it in the Tablet newspaper—"It is owing, with scarcely an exception, to the want of religious instruction in which these unfortunate people were literally raised." We trust and know that this was not so with all. But we fear it was true of a vast number. The truth must be told. With a vast number while in Ireland, the priest was their religion: they left their religion to him, and he was content to let them do so. For the religion of the heart and soul they had not learned it; and he had not taught it to them. The priest had been himself their religion; and when left without a priest, they were without a religion; and so "the faith died out." Such a religion as this will ever fail in the time of trial. But if these men had had their religion in their hearts—if they had been taught to understand and to believe for themselves, their faith would not have failed in the day of trial, and the storms and troubles of this world would have strengthened and established it the more.

Who has not seen the self-denial and self-devotion of the very poorest of our people, in providing the necessaries for those who go? Who has not seen them strip themselves to absolute destitution to provide sea-stores for a son, or a brother, or a sister, who was about to go? And can we be indifferent to provide the bread of life which alone can sustain their spiritual life, for those who go?

It was while we were continually revolving such thoughts in our minds, and thinking what that sea-store should be, that would keep their faith from "dying out" upon their voyage, that we happened to take up the sermons of St. Chrysostom, Archbishop of Constantinople, that great preacher of the Catholic Church. We knew how he has spoken of the storms and the troubles of our pilgrimage on earth, and how he shows where to look for strength and comfort. We know that he preached fourteen hundred and fifty years ago, and that he would give us no modern disputes or cavils. And we read thus:—

"What saith he? Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly—that is, the teaching, the doctrines, the exhortation, wherein he says that the present life is nothing, nor yet its good things; for if we consider this, we shall yield to no hardship whatever. Let it dwell in you, he saith, richly—not simply dwell, but with great abundance. Hearken ye, as many as are worldly, and have the charge of wife and children. Now, to you, too, he commits especially the reading of the Scriptures, and that not to be done lightly, nor in any sort of way, but with much earnestness. . . . He said not simply, let the word of Christ be in you; but what? Dwell in you, and richly, in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another. . . . . And tarry not for another to teach thee, for thou hast the Scriptures of God. No MAN CAN TEACH THEE AS THEY; for he, indeed, often concealed much for vainglory's sake and envy. Hearken, I entreat you, all ye that are careful for this life, and procure books that will be medicine for the soul. If ye will not any other, yet get you at least the New Testament, the Acts of the Apostles, the Gospels, for your constant teachers. If grief befall thee, dive into them as into a chest of medicines; take thence comfort of thy trouble, be it loss, or death, or bereavement of relations; or rather dive not into them merely, but take them wholly to thee; keep them in thy mind. This is the cause of all evils, the not knowing the Scriptures. We go into the battle without arms, and how should we come off safe? Well contented should we be if we can be safe with them, let alone without them." (Homily 9, on Coloss. ch. 3, vs. 16, 17.)

We here ask every Christian man to consider this. If every Irish emigrant had followed this advice, would the faith have "died out in millions?" Has it not been thus, with a great multitude of emigrants, that they went into that most trying battle of life, emigration to a foreign land, without these arms, and so their faith "died out?"

But here we find some comfort in thinking of many of our countrymen. We know that multitudes of them had heard of the Scriptures here, and did take these arms with them. Many have gone for this very purpose, that they might freely read the Word of God. It is likely that they may have cast off many a superstition, and many a doctrine which they cannot find in Scripture; but may we not hope that they have found the medicine of their souls? Father Mullen says nothing of these. He may have counted them heretics, or he may have thought this just as bad, or worse, than if the faith had died out in them: but would St. Chrysostom, or can any Christian man think so?

This, then, is our advice to emigrants and the friends of emigrants; yet not our advice, but St. Chrysostom's. Emigrants get yourselves Bibles, or at least the New Testament. Emigrants' friends, provide them with this store of medicines for the soul. Let not the faith die out in them, in the long, weary wandering that lies before them. Ask the priest for the book; if that fail try the parson.

Oh, what a comfort, in the long, long weary days at sea, when nothing but the watery waste and cloudy sky appear, to learn to call on Him, and trust in Him, who, for our hope and comfort, has passed through every scene of trial we can know, has walked upon the troubled water, and bid the stormy waves be still, that in the tempest's loudest roar his people's cry should ever be—"We perish; save us, Lord!"

INDULGENCES.

WE have postponed, for some time, responding to the letter of the Rev. Edward Spring upon this subject, in the hope that the Right Rev. Dr. Keane, Roman Catholic Bishop of Ross, would have relieved us from the necessity of doing so, by publishing an authoritative explanation of the matters inquired after by Mr. Spring. As, however, we are informed that Dr. Keane has not noticed the Rev. Mr. Spring's letter, we shall endeavour to state, fully and fairly, the Roman Catholic doctrines upon this subject, with a view to eliciting a fair discussion and inquiry into their truth or error. The universal jubilee granted by the present Pope, in his encyclical letter, dated 21st November, 1851, renders the subject, at the present time, of more than usual interest to every sincere and candid inquirer after religious truth. "To convey a true idea of what is meant by the Church of Rome by the grant of an indulgence, it will be necessary," says Dr. Bouvier, Bishop of Maus, in his work upon the subject (which has gone through six editions, the last published in 1836), "to have a clear idea of the punishment due for sin. After the guilt and eternal punishment due for sin have been remitted, by repentance and the sufferings of Christ, there still remains a debt of temporal punishment due to God's justice, on account of the sin, which debt must be expiated either here or hereafter. This is laid down as an article of faith, in express terms, by the Council of Trent (Sess. 14, Can. 12), and it was on this principle that the ancient Penitential Canons were founded, imposing a penance of three, seven, ten, fifteen, or twenty years' fasting on bread and water, privations, and humiliations, to continue during a man's whole life, and all this for one sin! And it was never thought that such penances, or atonements, ever exceeded the measure of God's justice."* Not, be it remarked, in regard to the guilt or eternal punishment due to it, both of which are admitted to be already remitted, by God's mercy, through Christ's death, on repentance or penance of the sinner, but entirely in respect of the debt of temporal punishment supposed to be still unexpiated, either by Christ's sufferings or the penitence of the offender. Penances of this kind, as they were imposed and enforced by the church, so of course they could be remitted and relaxed by the church; and the relaxation of such penances is called an indulgence, plenary or partial, as the pardon of a condemned criminal may be complete or a mere commutation of his sentence, by remitting a portion of it. This power of the church to remit sentences of penances enjoined by the Penitential Canons in this life, and which really existed and could be actually enforced against the offender, was assumed as extending to the next life also. The same writer, whom we have already quoted, thus lays it down, p. 12:—"Every indulgence presupposes sin; so that if a person had committed no sin he should have no need of an indulgence; and whereas, after the guilt and eternal punishment, which have been remitted by the sacrament of penance, there remains, in general, a temporal punishment, which sinners should suffer either in this life or in the next, to satisfy the Almighty and to expiate their sins, an indulgence remits part of this punishment or atonement; and indulgences do not only remit part of the temporal punishment, which the sinner should suffer in this life, but also abridge the punishment in purgatory, when a person has not entirely atoned for his sins."

We have also before us a work printed by Richard Grace and Son, 45, Capel-street, Dublin, entitled "Indulgences Granted by Sovereign Pontiffs to the Faithful, collected by a Member of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences in Rome, translated into English with permission of Superiors," in which the definition of an indulgence is thus given, page v.—"An indulgence is the remission of the temporal punishment which generally remains due to sins already forgiven in the sacrament of penance, as to the guilt and eternal punishment. This remission is made by the application of the merits and satisfactions which are contained in the treasures of the church. These treasures are the accumulations of the spiritual goods, arising from the infinite merits and satisfaction of Jesus Christ, with the superabundant merits and satisfactions of the Blessed Virgin Mary, of the holy martyrs, and of the other saints, which ultimately derive their efficacy from the merits and satisfactions of Christ, who is the only mediator of redemption. These CELESTIAL TREASURES, as they are called by the Council of Trent, are committed, by the Divine bounty, to the dispensation of the church, the sacred spouse of Christ, and are the ground and matter of indulgences. They are infinite in reference to the merits of Christ, and cannot, therefore, ever be exhausted."

We believe no Roman Catholic writer will object to the foregoing statements of the nature and objects of indulgences; and our readers will at once perceive that we are not about to charge their church with the presumption (not unfrequently attributed to it by Protestants who have not carefully examined the subject) of granting to any one a licence to commit sin with impunity, by forgiving, by anticipation, sins not yet committed. An indulgence is never supposed, by any well-informed Roman Catholic, to forgive sin at all, but only to remit the punishment—the temporal, or rather, the temporary punishment of the sin, as contradistinguished from the eternal punishment—the punishment of hell.

Indulgences, says the same Dr. Bouvier (Abridgment,

* See the Abridgment of Bishop Bouvier's work, entitled "A Dogmatical and Practical Treatise on Indulgences, for the use of the Clergy and Laity. By a Parish Priest; page 3. Printed by John Coyne, 21, Cook-street, Dublin, 1832.

p. 13), are of different sorts—viz., plenary, partial, and jubilee.

A plenary indulgence is a relaxation of all the temporal punishment which remained to be undergone by a person who has already performed a reasonable penance. It is called plenary, being entire and without reserve.

A partial indulgence is a relaxation of part of the temporal punishment due for sin. An indulgence of forty days, or seven years, for example, remits so much of the pain of purgatory as would be remitted by the actual performance of a penance of so many days or years, according to the ancient Penitential Canons of the church.

We take the description of a jubilee from an equally authentic source.

"A jubilee signifies a plenary indulgence in its most ample form, granted at different periods by the Sovereign Pontiff, to those who, either residing in the city of Rome or visiting it, perform there the visitations of the churches and other prescribed works of piety, prayer, fasting, and alms deeds, with confession and communion, which are always enjoined for the giving of this indulgence, in order to facilitate the return of sinners to God by the last-mentioned exercises of religion. Most extensive powers are acceded by the Supreme Pontiff to all approved ministers of the sacrament of penance, a principal object of which indulgence is not only to encourage Christians to a closer union with, and a livelier sense of their dependence, in spiritual matters, on the Supreme Pontiff, who governs them as Christ's vicar on earth, but principally to induce them, by holding out every possible encouragement to pray to God, and perform works of piety in those places, and under those circumstances, which shall be most acceptable to God, and most conducive to their own spiritual advantage."*

Having thus explained the meaning of the words, we next proceed to show what are the benefits stated to result from gaining a plenary indulgence. We cite the same authority before referred to (Indulgences Collected by a Member of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences at Rome, p. x.)—"If a person laboured with all his power to make satisfaction, and complied with the requisite conditions, and if he were truly penitent, and so well disposed as to gain the full effects of a plenary indulgence, should he die immediately after, his soul would suffer nothing in purgatory, but would go directly to heaven. The same may be said of the faithful departed. Whenever, in their favour, we fully gain a plenary indulgence, which is applicable to them, the soul to whom the indulgence is especially applied, if it be in purgatory, that moment is liberated from the painful flames, and is received into glory, provided the Divine justice designs to accept it in her favour."

Having thus answered, from authentic Roman Catholic works, the principal questions asked by Mr. Spring (reserving for a future number the rest), we proceed to add something (as he desires) of the grounds on which Protestants refuse to avail themselves of a provision said to be replete with such wonderful blessings."

Those reasons will ultimately resolve themselves into one or other of the two following—viz., either, 1st, that indulgences are chimerical; or, 2nd, that they are positively injurious.

We intend not to approach this subject in any other spirit than that of candid discussion, to which we invite the best efforts of our respected Roman Catholic correspondents to support those doctrines of their church, and open the eyes of Protestants to their error (if such it be) in resisting the benefits which Roman Catholics believe to result from such indulgences. If Protestants be in error on the point, it is surely the duty of Roman Catholics to pity rather than to anathematize them; and we can conceive no more imperative duty, on the part of a Christian bishop or priest, than to afford pious and candid Protestants every light in their power to lead them into truth, remembering that, although some men may be inclined to take things for granted, without proof, others cannot do so, and require proof before they can adopt, as true, propositions not in themselves self-evident.

The latter class, when invited to partake of the blessings alleged by Roman Catholics to flow from indulgences, naturally and not unreasonably ask for proof—probable proof, at least, if not positive—that they are not chimerical, but founded in reality.

Now, for a man to arrive at such a result, we think that it will scarcely be denied that the following points ought to be proved or fairly established:—

1st. That God, when he pardons the guilt of sin, and releases the sinner from the eternal punishment due to it, still leaves the sinner unpardoned as to temporal or temporary punishment, to work out his own pardon, either during life or after death, before he can seek the benefit of the remission of his guilt, and of the eternal punishment due to it.

2nd. That this temporal or temporary punishment can be commuted, or compounded for, by acts not partaking of the nature of punishment or suffering.

3rd. That the acts or supposed merits of one human being can be transferred to another, so as to satisfy the Divine justice in respect of that punishment which remains due, after the merits of Christ have blotted out the guilt and expiated the eternal punishment due to it.

4th. That superfluous merits or satisfactions of Christ and eminent saints, are laid up in a celestial treasury, to be laid out for those that want them, to make up the deficiency of their own personal endurance of the temporary or temporal punishment due to those sins whose guilt has been forgiven them.

5th. That the Pope has the power of dispensing this treasury either with or without the aid of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences at Rome, in favour either of the living who comply with the condition he imposes, or in favour of the faithful dead who are suffering in purgatory this temporal punishment.

Each of these points we propose seriously to discuss in their turn; but, as with the Rev. Mr. Spring, we should rather hear the best Roman Catholic arguments from "a living, speaking tribunal," than subject ourselves to the charge of understating them, we would earnestly solicit the Right Rev. Dr. Keane, or some other able and learned bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, to furnish us with the best proofs that exist on the foregoing points, which we shall gladly print in our pages, and treat with all the respect which the importance of the subject and the dignity of his office deserve at our hands. But should he still decline "to explain, with perspicuity, the power of indulgences," neither he nor our Roman Catholic readers will have a right to complain, if we proceed, in our next number, to consider the force of the best reasons we have been able to find, in Roman Catholic controversialist writers, in support of the doctrine and practice in question.

A copy of the Rev. E. Spring's letter, which appeared in our August number, and of this article, has been forwarded, in a respectful letter, to the address of the Right Rev. Dr. Keane, Roman Catholic Bishop of Ross, Skibbereen.

WHAT TRADITION TELLS US OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

No. 1, THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

IN our last number we laid before our readers all the passages we could find in the New Testament where the Virgin Mary is spoken of. We think it is likely that many of our readers were surprised to see how few there were; and that even of these few passages in in which her name is mentioned, in the historical part of the New Testament, two seem designed to check any excess of veneration for her, and to point out to Christians that the blessedness which she enjoys is only that which may be shared by any faithful follower of our Lord. "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother." Blessed is the womb that bare our Lord; but he has said, "Yea, rather, blessed are they who hear the Word of God and keep it." Very striking, too, is the fact, that not a single mention of the Virgin Mary occurs in any of the letters of the Apostles which has been handed down to us.

Now, we do not mean to argue this question on Protestant grounds. A Protestant holds that the providence of God has preserved, in the Holy Scriptures, everything taught by our Lord and his apostles which it is necessary for us to believe or practise, and that of such teaching there is no other authentic record. When, therefore, he finds that the Scriptures do not say a syllable as to any advantages to be gained by offering our prayers through the mediation of the Virgin, and that, on the other hand, they speak of our Lord as the only mediator, he inquires no farther; for he cannot suppose that, did such a way of access to God exist, the Scriptures would have been silent on a subject so important to our faith and practice. However, as we have said, we are content to examine into this subject on Roman Catholic grounds, and if any good evidence can be produced by tradition that our Lord and his apostles recommended their followers to offer their prayers through the Virgin Mary, we are willing to attend to it. It must, of course, be kept in mind, that the value of a tradition constantly diminishes with the number of hands it passes through before being recorded. Thus courts of law will listen to anything a witness says he saw or heard himself, but they will not receive "hearsay evidence," as to what other people told him took place; still less will they receive the hearsay of a hearsay; and even in common conversation we should not yield much belief to a story if we had no better authority for it than that our informant heard it from Mr. A., who was told by Mr. B. that he had heard Mr. C. who had heard somebody else say that such and such a thing took place. So, then, if we are told by any one who lived in the time of the apostles, that they taught any particular doctrine, such a witness is worth being listened to; if we are told so by one who lived 50 or 100 years after their death, the evidence is, of course, of something less value; and when we come to people who lived 500 years after the apostles, we give our readers a very simple test how much their evidence is worth. It is now only 125 years since the death of George I. (not a very long time to carry a tradition through), and yet, if we had no printed books to tell us what took place in Ireland during his reign, we think that it is little enough we should learn on the subject from the reports of our fathers and grandfathers. Four hundred years ago Henry the Sixth was King of England. If our readers will endeavour to find out how much they can learn with certainty, by tradition alone, of what took place in Ireland in his time, then they will know exactly of what value is a tradition four hundred years old.

Having said this much to enable our readers to judge of the comparative dependence to be placed on the writers whom we shall quote, we proceed to lay before them in order all that we can find in the early Christian writers concerning the Blessed Virgin. And as the number and length of the books which we have to examine increase, it becomes of course more difficult to be certain that we are leaving out nothing. All that we can say is, that we shall designedly leave out nothing that is of importance to this question; that we shall assist our own reading by examining the writings of those Roman Catholic divines who have quoted all that they could find in the works of the early Fathers calculated to do honour to the Virgin; and that, if after all, we should omit to insert any such testimony in its proper place, we shall cheerfully insert it, if pointed out to us by our readers.

Before proceeding to uninspired writers, we wish to make some further remarks on the fact, that no mention is made of the Virgin Mary, in any of the apostolic epistles. On the grounds which we are now arguing we admit that this silence will not prove demonstratively, that they did not entertain those views of the Blessed Virgin which are held by the Church of Rome; but it will at least show that she did not occupy a very prominent place in their thoughts. If there be any subject which a friend has never mentioned to us, in any conversation we have held with him, we cannot be quite sure that he knows nothing of this subject, but we may conclude, that it is not one that is constantly in his thoughts, or on which he is very anxious that we should be informed. So we can at least see that modern Romanists, "who have the Virgin's name ever on their lips," do not in this respect at all resemble the apostles, who have left us twenty-one epistles without one allusion to her. It would require us to look through a great many pastorals of Romish bishops, now-a-days before we could find twenty-one which do not in some place mention the Virgin Mary. Since our last article was published, a pastoral, issued by the present Pope, has appeared in the Dublin papers. When we saw it, we at once looked through it in search of the never-failing paragraph in honour of the Blessed Virgin; and sure enough there it was, in the following terms:—

"And that God may be made more accessible, and give ear to our prayers, let us raise our hearts and hands to his most holy mother, the Immaculate Virgin Mary. We could not find protection more powerful or more effectual with God. She is to us the most tender of mothers; our firmest reliance, and the very spring of our hopes; since she asks nothing which she does not obtain, and her prayer is never refused."

Now, we would ask our readers, did the apostles think the same? And if they did, why did they never mention the Blessed Virgin? We could understand their silence on an important subject; but could they write twenty-one letters without once speaking of the "very spring of their hopes," or once pointing out to their readers where they could find "protection the most powerful and the most effectual with God?"

But perhaps it may be said, although nothing of this kind appears in the letters of the apostles, there was much of it in their conversation, which has been handed down to us by those who heard them. Well, let us see. We take up the collection of writings, commonly known as "the Apostolic Fathers," and we proceed to examine and report what we can find therein on the subject we are discussing.

The first work in this collection is an epistle ascribed to the Apostle Barnabas, the companion of St. Paul in his travels. We need not here dispute whether or no this letter was really written by Barnabas, because the work is undoubtedly one of high antiquity. But in it there is not a single mention of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

We have next two epistles purporting to be written by Clement, one of the first bishops of Rome, and supposed to be the same as the Clement mentioned by St. Paul (Phil. iv. 3)—"Clement, my fellow-labourer, whose name is in the book of life." Of these two epistles learned men generally consider the first to be genuine, the second not to have been written by Clement, although an ancient document; but both epistles agree in this, that there is not a syllable in either about the Virgin Mary.

We next come to a collection of epistles by Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, who suffered martyrdom about seventy years after our Lord's death. Concerning these epistles there has been much dispute, as it is now generally confessed that much that was, for a long time, passed off as Ignatius's was not, in reality, written by him. And though the majority of learned men agree in accepting what are called "the seven shorter epistles" as genuine, there are others who maintain that some of these are not genuine, and that the rest have been extensively interpolated. This is a controversy, however, with which we need not meddle; for in all that has been ascribed to Ignatius there is not a word of any prayer or invocation being addressed to the Blessed Virgin.

In Ignatius, however, we do find the name of the Virgin Mary. In opposition to those who denied that our Lord was truly man, he asserts, in three or four places, that our Saviour was born of Mary (see Ephesians, cape. 7, 18, Trallians, cap. 9, Smyrna, cap. 1), but without any further ascription of glory to her. He also entertained a singular opinion that our Saviour was born of an espoused virgin, in order that his birth might remain unknown to the devil. See Ephesians, cap. 19—"Now the virginity of Mary, and her bringing forth, was kept in secret from the prince of this world, as well as the death of our Lord." Beyond these passages we find no further mention of the Virgin, and it will be seen that there is not a trace of a prayer or invocation addressed to her.

There is extant an epistle to the Philippians, by Polycarp, who died about 400 years after our Saviour's death, but he does not once mention the Virgin's name.

The acts of the martyrdom of both Ignatius and of Polycarp are equally silent as to the Virgin, nor did these martyrs think of addressing their dying prayers to any save our Lord.

Lastly, we have got a production of great antiquity, called "The Shepherd" of Hermas. Here, too, there is no mention of the Virgin of any kind. But this writer has very plainly declared to us what was the sole ground of his hope—

"If you wish to enter into any city, and the city be surrounded by a wall, and have but one gate, can you get into that city except by its gate? As, then, there can be no entrance into that city save by its gate, so is there no entrance into the kingdom of God except by the name of his Son." And again—"The gate is the Son of God, who is the sole access to God. None, therefore, shall enter to God but by his Son."

We have now laid before our readers the result of a search through the most ancient uninspired remains of Christian antiquity. These writings contain much on the duty of prayer, on the subject matter of our prayer, and the object of it: but this topic never appears to have suggested the Blessed Virgin to their minds, nor do they speak of any mediator but him whom St. Paul asserts to be the only mediator between God and man.

Now, what inference are we to draw from the silence of these Fathers? We have to thank a correspondent (see below) who, in a letter which has reached us since the foregoing was written, has given us our choice of several ways of accounting for it. We may say, with the first writer he cites, that they said so little about her, in hopes that their readers might think the more of her; or else, with Carthagena, that the best way of commending her excellency was to say nothing about it. But, for our own part, we believe that Canisius has hit off the true account of the matter, and that they said nothing only because they knew nothing of doctrines which were not delivered in their time, and which, if revealed at all, were only revealed in later ages.

In our next number we shall proceed to the writers of the second century. We shall inquire whether any new revelations about the Virgin were made in their time, or whether any of them had more courage than the evangelists, and ventured to undertake a task, the greatness and difficulty of which, according to Aloysius Novarinus, deterred the sacred writers from meddling with it.

Aloysius Novarinus says:—"I believe the evangelists, being oppressed with the greatness and difficulty of the thing, abstained from meddling with that which by no labour or skill of theirs they could perform: wherefore, like skilful painters, they drew a vail, that under the covering and shade of silence, we might conjecture the more concerning her, because they had expressed nothing."—Umbra Virginis, p. 58.

Canisius, a man of vast learning, and one of the founders of the Jesuits, companion in the vast undertaking of the illustrious Ignatius, founder of that order, says:—"It is a heinous error to deny at this time so many things concerning Mary and her dignity, which, though not taken notice of in the Scriptures, nor presently delivered in the time of the apostles, yet have been revealed by God to the later ages as certain, and at length recommended as such by the church."—Lib. 4, de Deip., c. 22.

Posa says:—"By this silence we are told that there is nothing written in the gospels, nothing in the law and prophets, which does not, after a manner, appertain to Mary."—Elucidar. Liber. 2, tract 7, c. 1.

And again—"If you would comprise, in short, what is more largely diffused in Scripture, know that Mary is the sum and brief of them all."—Ibid. Tract 6, c. 1.

Carthagena—"It is a contrivance of the Divine wisdom; because this silence does commend her excellency more fully than the most eloquent tongue can do."—De Arcan. Deip. L. 2, Hom. 2.

Suarez—"Christ being known, and his faith enough established, her excellencies could not be unknown or hid."—Præfat ad Tom. 2, in 3 partem.

Sherlog, the Jesuit—"It was necessary for us to know that Mary was the mother of Christ. This the evangelists sufficiently declared, and this her honour being manifested, the rest might be collected therefrom, though they said no more."—Antelog. 3, in Cantic., p. 142.

Georgius Gallicanus—"The field of her praises is wide and immense, and therefore God would leave every man at liberty to say of her what he pleased."—Marial, p. 3.

Doubtless, sir, you thought you had made a great and most original discovery, that the Bible tells us little or nothing about the Blessed Virgin. Yet you see it is no more that Roman Catholic divines have known for some hundred years! And they see in the fact an argument exactly opposite to what you see in it. They think that the less the evangelists have told us about Mary, the more they intended that we should know about her. And was it not your duty to have known and stated their answers to your argument?

ONE WHO LOVES TO HEAR BOTH SIDES.

We readily insert our correspondent's letter; and if any other answers or explanations from eminent Roman Catholic divines should be sent to us, we will, of course, publish them.

We admit that the authors cited in the above letter are, some of them at least, among the most eminent in the Roman Catholic Church. We have only one further observation to make on them—if Roman Catholic divines approve so highly of the silence which the evangelists and apostles observed about Mary, if they think it so much for her honour, why do they not follow that example, and say as little about her themselves?

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I am surprised that you should have published an article showing how little the Bible tells us of the life of the Blessed Virgin, without having noticed, at the same time, the answers that eminent Roman Catholic divines have given to such statements. Did it never strike you that a fact so notorious as the silence of Scripture about the Blessed Virgin, must have engaged the attention of learned Roman Catholics, and that they must have accounted for it? And would it not have been fair to have inquired how they accounted for it, instead of following the too common plan of everlastingly repeating the same old objections, without ever noticing the answers that have been given to them a hundred times over?

The Scriptures, you say, tell us little or nothing about the Blessed Virgin; they are wholly silent about her from the time of our Lord's ascension. Quite true, sir; but learned Roman Catholics have noticed the fact as well as you, and have accounted for it, and shown its bearings; and I call upon you, if you are really actuated by the spirit of fair play which you profess, to give their answers, which I here subjoin.

The learned author of the Pomœrium says:—This omission "was to excite the devotion of the faithful more towards her, that they might more greedily inquire after her actions, her life, and death."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

DEAR SIR—In your very excellent article, "What Scripture tells us of the Virgin Mary," you quote John ii., from the Rhemish version—"What is it to me and to thee?" Now, Holy Scripture does not tell us that, but conveys a rebuke—"What have I to do with thee?" That this is the true rendering here, the enclosed fourteen quotations will, I think, prove, even to Roman Catholics, as the same original is in all these cases, and the same vulgate, the Rhemish agreeing with them and us in thirteen out of the fourteen; and then, to support their system of Mariolatry, deviating from all. If the Rhemish be right in the fourteenth case, it must be wrong in the other thirteen, or vice versa, if the Douay and Rhemish be right in agreeing with the original and all versions in the thirteen cases, it must surely be wrong in deviating from all in the fourteenth.—Yours, faithfully,

GEORGE H. READE, Inniskeen Rectory.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Having received several numbers of the LAYMAN, I have read much to enable me to arrive at just conclusions, relative to the different topics discussed in its pages since its first publication, particularly the article on "The Rule of Faith," in your June number, page 61, where you state—"We are, consequently, quite prepared to receive, as authoritative and obligatory, any unwritten tradition provided it can be shown, by unquestionable proof, to be derived from an inspired origin." Now, to show that unquestionable proof is my object, as well as to give proofs for several other points of Catholic belief, disputed by the members of the Established Church, and which are, one with the other, intimately connected. That the proofs hereafter given are not the only ones in Scripture in favour of my arguments, I do not pretend; they are the result of my own Scriptural research. Nor do I wish it to be inferred that I enter the field as a controversialist; my earnest desire is rather that some competent person may take up the subject, which I am very imperfectly able to touch on, and see your observations on the different texts quoted. In the most friendly spirit, then, I assert that

The Bible is NOT the only Rule of Faith; that perpetual succession of lawful pastors is preserved in the church (in the person of the Pope); that that church cannot err in its doctrinal teaching; and that it is, consequently, infallible.

Some of the proofs adduced for and against which I give in juxtaposition. Of course, I leave you to multiply the texts against these points of doctrine.

Roman Catholics maintain that—	Protestants, that—
We have not in the world extant divers books of prophetical Scriptures; for no fewer than 20 books of the prophetical penmen of the Holy Ghost haveperished, as thelearned Contzen has proved in his preface on the "Four Gospels." This assertion of Contzen is proved, as far as is necessary, by the following texts:—Joshua x. 13—"Is not this written in the book of Jasher?" (I quote from the authorized version.) Again, 1 Kings iv. 32—"Solomon spoke three thousand proverbs, and his songs were three thousand and five." Next, 1 Chron. xxix. 29.—"The acts of David, first and last, are written in the Book of Samuel, the Seer, and in the book of Nathan, the Prophet, and in the Book of Gad, the Seer." Again, 2 Chron. ix. 29, mention is made of the "Books of Nathan, the Prophet, and the Prophet of Abijah, and the visions of Iddo, the Seer, and chap. xii. 15, "In the Book of Schemiah, the Prophet, and Iddo, the Seer, concerning genealogies," which seems to be a different book from his Book of Visions, as above mentioned; and chap. xiii. 22, mention is made of the "Story of the Prophet Iddo," and chap. xx. 34, of the "Book of Jehu, son of Hanani;" and xxxiii. 19, we find mention of the works of "The Sayings of the Seers," &c., &c. Where are these prophets' books now? Yet we know from Scripture that what was said by those books was said by prophets—"That God spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets.—Heb. i. 1. "That prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but the holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."—2 Peter i. 21. All these texts go to prove that we have not now entirely the whole written Word of God; and that the apocryphal books (acknowledged, in the VIth. Article of Church of England, to be read by the Church "for example of life and instruction of manners") are canonical; for "the holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost!" St. Paul further proves that we have not the whole written Word of God; for, 1 Cor. v. 9, he says—"I wrote to you in an epistle." Where is this epistle? Hence we say, give us all the sacred prophetical writings ever written, and we will abide by the written Word of God as "the sole Rule of Faith."	"These are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of God; and that believing you may have life in his name."—John xx. 31, D.B. This Roman Catholics also believe. "With meekness receive the engrafted Word, which is able to save your souls."—St. James i. 1, D.B. That the "engrafted word" is the now written Word only, the above text does not prove. Nor is it proof against the belief of Roman Catholics in the spoken as well as the now written Word of God—Tradition as well as Scripture. That Moses, who was the first Scripture writer, was not born till about the year A.M. 2,400, may be deduced from his own history of Genesis. So long, therefore, was the world without any Scripture. Scripture, then, could not be the only true Rule of Faith. By what Rule of Faith, then, was Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, guided, and Sarah, Rebecca, &c.? Was it not by the Tradition, &c., of their Church—in either case not written?

(The remainder of this letter being very long, and relating to a different subject, we are compelled to postpone our observations on that part until next number, and we think it better that that part of the letter should appear along with our observations. This letter is signed

"AN INQUIRER, Celbridge."

The above letter is written in a spirit which claims the most respectful and candid consideration. We regret much that the various demands on our space, rendered us unable to insert any part of it sooner. Even now, we cannot go into its minuter particulars, but we trust a consideration of its general principles will suffice.

We take first the sentence—"The Bible is not the only Rule of Faith."

When we affirm that "the Bible is the Rule of Faith," we simply refuse to admit, as articles of the Christian faith, things which are not contained in Scripture, and cannot be proved from it. And this, not because we would refuse to hear apostles, or other ministers who succeeded them, declaring by word of mouth what God had revealed to them, but because we find proof of the fact, that the apostles did not teach any other articles of faith than those which they have written of in the Scriptures.

This proof appears to us to be twofold—1st. We find no other articles of faith (besides those found in Scripture) which can fairly be said to have been held by the Church as articles of faith, from the time of the apostles to this time. 2nd. We find a positive and general testimony in the early Church, that they had not received any other articles of faith than those about which the apostles wrote in Scripture.

Our correspondent thus states what it is that constitutes and proves "a true apostolical tradition"—namely, that it should be "handed down by a full unanimous report of all Catholic nations, attested by their universal practice and uniform doctrine."

We agree to this as a fair definition of "apostolic tradition," provided it be understood of a tradition so held by the Church from the time of the apostles to this time. And we expect that our correspondent will admit that a doctrine held among Christians now, even universally, if that doctrine were not held by the early Church as a part of the faith, has no claim to be an apostolical tradition. However universal a doctrine may now be, yet if no part of the Christian faith in the early ages, it is no part of the faith now—it is not apostolical.

It does not concern us to inquire whether any doctrine, universally held by the Church in all ages, must infallibly be true, or whether a doctrine so held might possibly have been false: for this plain reason, this is not the question between us and Roman Catholics. We admit and hold that every doctrine which has, in fact, been held as a part of the Catholic faith in all ages, IS TRUE, and is to be found in Scripture. The practical question between Roman Catholics and us is simply this—"Has the Church in all ages from the beginning held, as articles of faith, other doctrines which are not in Scripture, and cannot be proved from it?"

If Roman Catholics are really prepared to oppose our view on this great question, we should expect them to do something of this kind—to produce the creeds and confessions of faith of the ancient Church, and show us that those creeds contain articles of faith which are not contained in Scripture, and cannot be proved by it; or, if they cannot do this, at least to produce some of the great doctors and lights of the ancient Church, who have said that the public creeds and confessions of faith in the Churches did not contain all the ARTICLES OF FAITH which the apostles delivered to the Churches founded by them.

Nothing of this kind have we ever seen done or attempted. We earnestly entreat our correspondent to be "an inquirer" in this, and to try if he can find any answer of this kind.

On the other hand, we take all the creeds or public professions of faith which the early Church has left us, and we find nothing in them that our adversaries themselves do not confess to be in Scripture also, and provable from Scripture. 2nd. We produce without end the great doctors of the early Church, all testifying that these creeds contain the whole Christian faith. 3rd. We produce an equal testimony of doctors that the Scriptures contain all the articles of the faith which the apostles preached.

This we believe to be a true statement of the real question at issue between us and the Church of Rome, and of the evidence that should decide it. But if any one can show anything to the contrary, we are open to conviction.

We come now to the consideration of the difficulties which our correspondent feels about it:—

1st. We have not the whole of the Scripture, for many books have been lost.

Any force which this argument contains, must be something of this kind:—"There may have been other articles of Christian faith contained in those lost books; and in that case, by confining ourselves to those articles of faith which are to be found in the existing Scriptures, we may be giving up other articles of faith which were in the lost books only."

Let it be observed here, that none of our opponents have ever ventured to affirm that this is actually so. No one undertakes to say that there really were any other articles of the Christian faith in those lost books, but only that perhaps there were.

Now, supposing it were so, we do not see how the Church of Rome would be any better off in this respect, unless she could say that her tradition has preserved the articles of faith which were in those lost books; but this no Roman Catholic has ever pretended to say. So we do not see how tradition supplies this loss at all.

But the real question is—"Is it at all likely or probable that these lost books did contain any articles of Christian faith which are not in our present books of Scripture?"

Here we observe, that all those lost books were books of the Old Testament (that is, if they really were inspired books). It is true that one passage is quoted to show that one epistle, written by St. Paul to the Corinthians, has been lost. That passage is 1 Cor., ch. v., v. 9—"I wrote to you in an epistle." Our correspondent has taken this, as a great many others have done, as if it necessarily referred to some epistle previously written by the Apostle; and if this were so, there would have been an epistle to the Corinthians, which is now lost. But this is clearly a mistake. There is evidently a mistake in the translation. The indefinite article "an" is clearly a wrong translation. It should, at least, be the definite article "the;" thus—"I wrote to you in the epistle." And this definite article is very often used in Scripture for the demonstrative pronoun "this." We give only those instances which are most to the point. Col. iv. 16, the Douay Bible translates the same definite article "THIS epistle." Again, in 1 Thes. v. 27, "THIS epistle." Again, 2 Thes. iii. 14, "THIS epistle." Why, then, may it not be "THIS epistle" in the place in question, 1 Cor. v. 9?

A still stronger case is Romans, c. xvi., v. 22 (Douay Bible)—"I, Tertius, who wrote THIS epistle, salute you in the Lord." Will any Roman Catholic say that the Greek word here translated "this" must refer to a former epistle which the apostle wrote to the Romans, and that, therefore, we have lost one Epistle to the Romans too? Why, then, cannot the same Greek word be translated "this" in the Epistle to the Corinthians?

This last passage (Rom. xvi. 22) is still more forcible, because it also contains the same word, "wrote," in the very same tense. It clearly should have been translated—"I, Tertius, who have written this epistle," he being St. Paul's scribe in writing it. In the same way, the very same words in 1 Cor. v. 9 should be translated—"I have written to you in this epistle," referring to what he had already said of the fornicator in v. 2—"that he might be taken away from among you," which plainly implied that they were not to keep company with him. The apostle goes on, in the tenth verse, to explain what this command did not mean—viz., not every fornicator; and in verse 11 he explains what was really the meaning of what he had written, to this effect—"But now I have written to you, not to keep company," &c. Where mark, 1st, the words, "I have written," are still the same word, and the same tense, translated "I wrote" in verse 9; and, 2nd, the word "now" does not, either in Greek or English, always mean to contrast the present time with the past time. We may say to a person, "Now, I tell you this," without at all implying that we have told him something else at a former time: we may and often do use that expression about a thing of which we have never spoken before. We have such a use of the same Greek word and the same English word, in Hebrews xi., v. 15 and 16—"If they had been mindful of that country from which they came out . . . . But now they desire a heavenly country;" where "now" does not mean, "they desire at this time;" but it is just as much as if the apostle had said—"But now I tell you it was the heavenly country they then desired, and not the earthly."

So the apostle's meaning, in 1 Cor. 5, v. 9, 10, 11, is simply this—"I have written to you in this epistle, not to keep company with fornicators. But I don't mean every fornicator. But now I tell you the exact meaning of what I have written, every fornicator that is called a brother (i.e., a Christian), with such a one to keep no company."

To confirm this translation, we appeal to tradition. We say it is the general tradition of the ancient Church that the apostle wrote only two Epistles to the Corinthians; and, therefore, he cannot have written another to them before the two that we have. All the ancients who have left us lists of what the apostles did write, speak of only two epistles written by him to the Corinthians. This is a point on which the tradition of the Church is the proper evidence, and we invite those who are so fond of tradition to decide this point by tradition.

Hence it appears that the only proof offered, that one of the books of the New Testament has been lost, utterly fails, and there is no proof at all of any such thing. We have, therefore, to consider the "lost books" as belonging only to the Old Testament.

Now, supposing for the present that these lost books were really inspired Scripture (which we will consider again), but supposing now even that they were, is there any reason to suppose that those books contained any other "articles of the CHRISTIAN faith" besides those articles of faith which we find in the New Testament?

Now, we ask our "Inquirer" to consider, in which Testament does he expect to find "the articles of the Christian faith," in the Old or in the New? Who was it that revealed and declared to the world the doctrines of the Gospel, and the articles of the Christian faith? Was it not Christ and his apostles? Well, then, in the words of Christ and his apostles, and in their writings, we expect to find the articles of the Christian faith, and not in the Old Testament writings, which were finished 300 years before Christ came.

We do not undervalue the Old Testament. There are many things to be learned by us besides "articles of faith." In the Old Testament we learn much of the character and the dealings of God, and we learn there, too, the corruption of human nature. In the Old Testament, too (when rightly explained by the New), we find many glorious prophecies concerning the Gospel, and the doctrines of the Gospel, which serve to throw great light on the New Testament. The Old Testament was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ: in the New, Christ and his doctrines are revealed to us. This we are bold to affirm (and we expect no Roman Catholic will contradict it)—that there is no article of Gospel faith prophecied of in the Old Testament which is not declared and revealed in the New Testament. Take any book you please of the Old Testament—Joshua, for instance, or Judges, or the Proverbs, or even the evangelical prophet Isaiah—and tell us WHAT article of the Christian faith we would now be without, if that book had been lost? And if this be so, with the whole of the Old Testament that we have, what show of reason can there be for supposing that we have lost any article of the Christian faith by the loss of any other books of the Old Testament, if any have really been lost?

Our correspondent's letter suggests to us another argument on this subject.

He says:—"Our Lord, in expounding to his apostles ALL the prophets, must have included those prophetical writings not now extant." Well, if he did, we trust we still have, in what those apostles taught, any articles of Christian faith contained in those books, although the books themselves be lost. If those books did contain such things, and if those books be now lost, all that either the Church of Rome or we can now do is, to seek for what the apostles taught. What they wrote in Scripture we know is their teaching. If any one can show us that anything else taught by the apostles has been handed down to us by the Catholic Church from the times of the apostles themselves, so that we may be sure that it really came from them, let them show us this too, and we have already expressed our readiness to believe it. Does not our "Inquirer" now see that this is the only thing that ought to convince us that we are wrong—namely, to point out to us other articles of faith, and to show us that these have really been handed down from the apostles themselves? Yet this is the very thing that we do not find in his letter. Nothing will direct his own inquiries better than trying to convince us of our errors. Let him try and tell us, then, what articles of Christian faith, besides those contained in Scripture, we ought to believe. Let him show us what these articles are, and what the proof is that the apostles taught them.

To return to the lost books. What proof is there that the lost books in question were really inspired by the Holy Spirit? None of the places that mention these books say that they were inspired. We know that the apostles themselves, in their inspired writings, quote books that were not inspired. But it will be said, some of these books were written by "prophets." We grant that: but were prophets always inspired? We have good ground for believing that they were not: that they sometimes spoke as the Holy Ghost moved them, and at other times spoke as other men do. We believe this is agreed on all hands. Is there any better reason to believe that they always were inspired as soon as they took a pen in their hands? We see no reason to believe this. "A prophet" might write a letter, just as other men wrote one, and that letter was not inspired. "A prophet"—i.e., one who was sometimes inspired—might write a book of history, and that book might not be inspired. There was certainly, at that time, a way of knowing what speeches or what writings of a prophet were inspired. The prophets knew the difference themselves. And the difference could be proved to other men, while the power of working miracles existed, and while the High Priest could inquire of God in the tabernacle.

The question is, did the Jews, while they had these means of knowing, count these books inspired? We reply that there is no evidence that the Jews, while they had these means of knowing, ever counted any books inspired besides those which we now have of the Old Testament. We invite inquiry about this.

But when were these books lost? This may throw some light on the question.

We think our correspondent has succeeded in proving that no prophetical books were lost before our Saviour's time. He says—"Our Lord, in expounding to his Apostles all the prophets (see Luke xxiv., verse 27), must have included those prophetical writings not now extant." We think this conclusive proof that none had been lost before that time. The question is, have any books then existing been lost since? Now this is clearly not the case. Josephus, a very learned Jew, who was born before our Saviour died, tells us what sacred books the Jews then had: he says they had only twenty-two which were counted inspired; they had other books, he says, which were not of the like authority. Now, taking the twelve lesser prophets as "one book" (which we know that the Jews did), this exactly agrees with the books we now have. It is impossible to bring into that number all the books our correspondent reckons up. Either, then, these books were not counted inspired in our Saviour's time, or they were lost before his time. In either case we have the inspired books of the Jews, just as they stood in our Saviour's time. If he found no fault with those books, as they then stood—if he did not blame the Jews for not having all the inspired books they should have had (and we know that he did not)—if he was content to take those books as they then stood, without asking for more or less, surely we may do so also. What better authority can we have than His in such a question?

We are, therefore, satisfied to take the books of the Old Testament as our Saviour took them, and the books of the New Testament as the tradition of all Christians has handed them down to us; and as far as this argument goes, we see no shadow of reason for believing them to be insufficient.

Nor do we see any reason, so far, for going to tradition for more articles of faith, until some one can show any such articles, with proof that the apostles preached them.

We now call to our correspondent's recollection a passage of his own letter—"Hence, we say, give us all the sacred prophetical writings ever written, and we will abide by the written Word of God as the sole Rule of Faith."

Now, if we have shown him that we have all the sacred writings of the Old Testament as our Saviour had them, and was content to take them; and, further, that we have all the sacred writings of the New Testament, that ever were heard of by the Church on earth, is not this enough?

And even if it were not, if any books had been lost out of the Old Testament, yet since at least we have all in which we could have any expectation of finding "articles of Christian faith," is not this all that we can require?

We trust, then, that our correspondent will now perform what he promised, and abide "by the written Word of God as the sole Rule of Faith."

We could not deal lightly with this argument about the lost books of Scripture. It has taken up so much room, we must leave the remainder of this letter for the next month.

"W. C. SEARCH" AND BISHOP JEREMY TAYLOR.

"Warner Christian Search" has to explain, that he took the passage referred to in Bishop Taylor's work of Liberty of Prophesying, not from any edition of the original, but from a controversial treatise on Purgatory, by a Roman Catholic writer.

"W. C. S." begs further to add, that he has since consulted Doctor Taylor's work itself, and finds the quotation to appear, with the words ("SAYS THE ROMANIST") in a parenthesis. There is no writer, among Church of England theologians, whose works are so erroneously appealed to, and whose views on certain doctrines are so misrepresented as Bishop Taylor.

"W. C. SEARCH."

Sept. 24, 1852.

P.S.—You forget to observe upon some of the early Fathers—St. Chrysostom, for instance—declaring the practice of praying for the dead to be of APOSTOLICAL TRADITION.

We suspected that "W. C. Search" took his quotation at second hand from some Roman controversial writer who had given the passage without these words; and we find by his letter that he did so, though he does not give us the name of the writer who deceived him, as we think he was bound, in fairness, to have done, when we invited him to clear himself, by telling us the name of the book, so that others might be put on their guard against it. We regret that he has not done so; and, once more, we call on him, as he regards his own character for honesty and truth, to tell us from what book he took his quotation from Bishop Taylor, otherwise, though we are quite willing to believe that it was not "W. C. S." himself that committed the fraud in the quotation about the Maccabees, we cannot exculpate him from the charge of screening from exposure the writer who did so.

We have not forgotten our promise of commenting on "W. C. Search's" passages from the Fathers of the fourth century, which he has cited as in favour of Purgatory; and we have already in type an article upon the subject, which press of matter precludes us from inserting in our present number.

KINGSTOWN HARBOUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Please your honour, I read the CATHOLIC LAYMAN regular, for the master lends it to me; and since you are so kind in printing letters, maybe you would take one from a poor man like me.

The master sent me to Dublin last week, with cattle that was going to Liverpool, for the herd was ill. And because I never was in Dublin, he told me to take a day to look about me, and he wouldn't stop the wages. So, sure enough, I went down to Kingstown by the railway, and my! what a place it is! All them ships, and the steam vessels, all fizzing and buzzing, and seeming in such a hurry to be off, and the big stones, and the bright bonnets, and the party faces, and all the cars, and the fine houses, and what isn't there? And them big walls running straight out into the sea, and, my! the stones in them walls! and every wall ten times as wide as the street before my door! And if I didn't see a big iron chest let down into the sea, and two men in it, going down to their work at the bottom of the sea as pleasant as I'd go to dig praties; and may I be happy if there was a bottom to the chest!

And while I was walking about looking at it all, I met a mighty pleasant looking gentleman, and I made bold to speak to him; and "please your honour," says I, "how long were they making all this place?" And so he answered me quite pleasant, and, says he, "I believe they are fifty years making it anyway." "Fifty years!" says I, "and isn't it done yet?" "No, indeed," says he, "and I don't see much signs of its being done." "And when will it be done, your honour?" says I. And with that he stopt short in his walk, and seemed to be considering for a bit, and, says he, "The parliament allows ten thousand pounds a year," says he, "for finishing it, and it is my opinion, that it never will be finished till that is stopt." "Well, tear and ages," says I, "maybe that's just the way with my father's soul," says I; for the thought just came across me all in a minute. "What do you mean?" says he. "Why," says I, "I'm paying ten shillings a year, for these six years past," says I, "to Father D—, for getting my father's soul out of purgatory," says I; "and maybe its just the same way, that he'll never get out till that's stopt," says I. And with that he considered again a bit, and says he, "Did Father D— never say to you, I needn't take any more money from you, for your father's soul's out?" "No, 'deed, didn't he, your honour," says I. "And did you never hear," says he, "of Father D— saying that to any one else?" "I never heard of the like of that, your honour," says I. "Well," says he, "maybe you're right enough, and maybe your father's soul is like enough to Kingstown harbour," says he; "maybe while you go on paying for the job it won't suit them to finish the job; and maybe when you stop paying, there won't be anything to finish the job with; and maybe it won't be worth their while to finish the job at their own cost," says he.

So, your honour, I don't know what to do at all, or whether to go on paying, or to stop; and I thought I would just write to your honour, that seems so knowledgeable, and ask if you ever heard of a priest saying to a poor man that came with money for masses, "I needn't take that, my man, for your father's soul's out before this." So waiting your honour's answer, I remain your humble servant to command,

PAT MURRAY, of Westmeath.

If any of our correspondents can report such a case as Pat Murray wishes for, we shall be happy to publish it, as we do not happen to know of such a case ourselves. Our correspondent need hardly have gone to Kingstown to see a chest without a bottom, where the lower places are concerned. We suspect there is no bottom to Father D—'s chest; and we are pretty sure there is no bottom to p———y itself.—ED.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR OCTOBER.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

The Dun or Winter Oats, Black Barley, Bere, and Rye should be sown as early in the month as possible; if not already got in, advantage should be taken of dry weather, and while the land is dry to get in these crops, particularly the Dun oat. By so doing, a considerable saving of seed will be effected, as if farther advanced in the season, and the land wet, considerably more seed will be required (see operations for last month).

Winter Vetches, either alone or mixed with oats or rye, should be sown immediately, where not sown last month, so as to insure a strong braird before the frosts set in.

Russian or Winter Beans should, if possible, be got in before the middle of the month. This hardy and productive variety, is fast superseding most other kinds to a great extent.

Parsnips, if sown this month, in tolerably dry, but well-tilled and well-manured land, come in early, and produce heavy crops.

Rape sown in the summer months may be still transplanted in the stubble land, as directed last month.

Early Cabbages sown in July last should now be transplanted in well-cultivated and well-manured land, if wanted early.

HENRY THE EIGHTH—THE REFORMER.

We suppose our readers often heard what a great reformer Henry the Eighth was, and how much the Protestant religion in England was indebted to his zeal and to his conjugal fickleness, and how, on each change of his wife, he went a step further from the true faith and a step deeper into Protestantism. This, we know, is a favourite topic with a certain class of teachers, who, having all the learning on their own side, are apt to take liberties with the facts of history. In answer to such men it is useless to say, it is otherwise written in such and such an history; for they will readily reply, that it is either a Protestant history, or if written by a Roman Catholic, that he was an Atheist in disguise or a fool. We have felt the force of the seeming paradox, that nothing is so fallacious as figures, except facts. In controversy this is peculiarly so; for an unscrupulous controversialist can furnish an array of facts, judiciously selected from contemporary writers, and apparently well authenticated, to prove anything, and may blacken the character of any man, whether he be a Luther, a Melancthon, a Calvin, a Cranmer, a Pascal, or a Howard; he can even condemn them out of their own mouths, by a simple transposition of words spoken on one occasion and applied to another wholly different; or by extracting a passage from an author which the author meant to put into the mouth of an adversary, for the purpose of exposing and confuting its error; while the uncandid controversialist, by quoting the passage simply as that of the author, makes it be supposed that he advocates the very error which it is his express design to confute. We are sorry to say that this iniquitas quotationis is too common a trick among men who profess to deal with sacred things; it is too convenient a plan of proving anything of anybody, out of his own mouth, to be abandoned from the mere risk of occasional detection. Our readers may see one example of this deceptive style of argument in another column of this paper, p. 125, relating to the writings of the celebrated bishop, Jeremy Taylor, and if they desire to see another striking instance of the same artifice, let them take up the discussion between Father Maguire and the Rev. W. Pope, in Dublin, in the year 1827—a book in the hands of many of our readers, and, perhaps, known to all of them. Turn to p. 153, and to p. 202 (Edition published by R. Coyne, 1827), and you will see how that skilful and much applauded defender of the Roman Catholic faith, Mr. Maguire, in order to prove the infallibility, unity, and purity of the Roman Catholic Church, and that it, therefore, needed no reformation, brings forward the weighty testimony of Sir Edwin Sandys (a sturdy Protestant of the reign of Queen Mary), and cites a long passage from his works, as testifying his opinions in favour of Mr. Maguire's views; whereas, on the passage being examined, it turned out to be (and Mr. Maguire was constrained publicly to confess it so to be) Sir Edwin Sandy's statement of the allegations of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics of his day in support of their own system, which he afterwards proceeds to demolish in his downright manner, so that Mr. Maguire, by means of this dishonest manœuvre, was able to adduce as a witness for the purity and infallibility of the Church of Rome the man who describes the state of the Church of Rome to be such that "what in some other places even a loose person would be ashamed to confess, these priests and friars refrain not openly to practise." The instances which Sir Edwin Sandys gives are not suitable for publication in such a journal as this, nor, indeed, for the general eye; but we may well wonder at the cool effrontery with which the writings of dead men are sometimes dealt with, to answer the purposes of the moment, and those of Sir Edwin Sandys to prove the purity of the Church of Rome; and when we find a wary priest, in the presence of a learned adversary and an enlightened auditory, venture upon such a piece of falsification as this, what may we expect of the candour and fairness of the quotations of provincial controversialists who have no mixed audience to criticise, and no Mr. Pope to correct?* Even poor Henry the Eighth is not safe in their hands; his temper and his conjugal infidelity, perhaps, have not been misrepresented; his eccentricities in religion and in love may not be exaggerated; but, at all events, there is one thing certainly in which he has been scandalously misrepresented, and which it is our present purpose to rescue his memory from the imputation of—that is, Protestantism; for we venture to affirm, there never was a more unfounded accusation brought against any man than to say that Henry the Eighth was not, from first to last, a sincere and thorough-going Roman Catholic, and that he did not hold and maintain, even with a burning fiery zeal, all the distinctive doctrines of the Church of Rome.

In order to prove this, we need not go back to Henry's more juvenile freaks, when he entered the lists of controversy against the great Reformer himself, Luther, and obtained from Pope Leo X. the harmless soubriquet of Defender of the Faith. Nothing, perhaps, would have ever forfeited this mark of Papal approbation of the royal controversialist, had not the influence of the Emperor Charles constrained the then Pope, Clement VII., to withdraw his consent and dispensation from the divorce of Queen Katherine. This took place A.D. 1529. It was two years afterwards, 1531, that Henry claimed the title of protector and supreme head of the Church and clergy of England. He afterwards married Anna Boleyn, and, in the year 1534, the final breach with Rome took place, and Henry abjured the supremacy and authority of the Pope. But do these facts warrant the assertion that Henry VIII. was the founder of the Protestant religion? Was Henry the advocate of Protestant doctrine, or the author of, or the participator in, the Protestant so-called heresies? Fortunately there remains on record a document which defies all attempts at falsification—a record so public, notorious, and trustworthy that its testimony is beyond impeachment and above being tampered with. This record of the religious sentiments of Henry VIII. is no other than an act of parliament passed by the King, Lords, and Commons of England with the consent of the whole of the clergy of England assembled in convocation, A.D. 1539, and when Henry was in the height of his contumacy towards Rome. It was then that the Act of the Six Articles was passed.

The act is the 31st Henry VIII., c. 14—"An act for abolishing of diversity of opinion in certain articles concerning religion." This famous, or rather infamous, statute recites the great advantage of uniformity, and the mischief of diversity of opinion in religion, and proposes to arrive at this desirable end in true pope and rouncil fashion. The Six Articles are as follows:—

"1st. That in the most blessed sacrament of the altar, by the strength and efficacy of Christ's mighty word (it being spoken by the priest), is present really, under the form of bread and wine, the natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, conceived of the Virgin Mary, and that after the consecration there remaineth no substance of bread or wine, nor any other substance but the substance of Christ, God and man." This is no doctrine of the Protestant Church, and, therefore, it was not Henry the Eighth who restored the doctrine of the commemorative and spiritual nature of the sacrament of the Lord's supper.

"2nd. That the communion in both kinds is not necessary, ad salutem, by the law of God, to all persons, and that it is to be believed, and not doubted of, but that in the flesh, under the form of bread, is the very blood, and with blood, under the form of wine, is the very flesh, as well apart as though they were both together." We doubt if the Council of Trent ever gave so clear and distinct an exposition of the dogma of the communion in one kind and the exclusion of the laity from the cup, contrary to our blessed Lord's own institution of the sacrament, as did Henry the Eighth in this article.

"3rd. That priests after the order of priesthood, received as afore, may not marry by the law of God." This is not, certainly, Protestant doctrine, more than it is the example set by St. Peter, the first of the Popes—as Roman Catholics will have it—who is under grave suspicion of being guilty of having a wife.

"4th. That vows of chastity, widowhood by man or woman, made to God advisedly, ought to be observed by the law of God."

"5th. That it is meet and necessary that private masses be continued and admitted in the King's English Church and congregation, as whereby good Christian people, ordering themselves accordingly, do receive both godly and goodly consolations and benefits, and it is agreeable also to God's law." Neither is this any part of the Protestant faith, which holds that Christ died once for the sins of the whole world, and that his work is finished.

"6th. That auricular confession is expedient and necessary to be retained and continued, used and frequented in the churches of God." This was not one of the principles of the Reformation, nor in conformity with the directions of the Sacred Scriptures, which enjoin us to confess our faults to one another, not to a priest or minister. So far we see that Henry VIII. was a bad Protestant, but a faithful adherent to the doctrines of the Church of Rome, however refractory he may have proved in discipline and in denying the supremacy of the Pope.

That he held the main tenets of the Church is beyond doubt; and that he was a zealous propagandist of them will appear from the style of discipline which he applied in their favour.

Section 5 of the act ordains that all offending against the first article, as to the real presence, shall be adjudged heretics, and "every such offender and offenders shall therefore have and suffer judgment, execution, and pains of death, by way of burning, without any abjuration, clergy, or sanctuary, and forfeit everything."

Section 6 enacted, that offenders against the other five articles, by preaching or teaching, should be adjudged felons, and suffer pains of death, as in case of felons (that is, by hanging), without any benefit of clergy.

Section 7 enacted, that offenders against the last five articles, by word or writing, were to be adjudged, for the first offence to forfeit all their property for life; and for a second offence were to suffer as felons by death.

Section 9 declares, that if any man, which is or hath been a priest, shall keep company with a wife, he shall suffer as a felon (that is, by death), whereas (by section 10) if the priest kept company with any other woman, he only forfeited his goods for life.†

It may, however, be said, all this was the tyranny of Henry VIII., and not the act or instigation of the Roman Catholic Church. We have repeatedly read this bold apology for the enormous cruelties of the Inquisition, and the barbarities practised to propagate the faith of Rome—that they were not dictated or countenanced by the church, but were the independent actions (as the imprisonment of the Madiais for reading the Bible is naively thrown upon the Duke of Tuscany) of the civil power. And, accordingly, all the cruelties of Henry VIII. and Queen Mary are disposed of as acts of state, and not as instances of religious perse-

* Father Maguire is not the only Roman Catholic controversialist of eminence who has misrepresented Sir Edwin Sandys. Mr. French, too, a Roman Catholic barrister, at the celebrated discussion with Dr. Cumming at Hammersmith, in 1839, was detected by Dr. Cumming in similar misquotations.—See Hammersmith Discussion, p. 899.

† This statute continued in force during the entire reign of Henry VIII., but was repealed in the reign of Edward VI.

cution. Here again we must rescue the memory of Henry VIII. from more than his deserved share of obloquy. He has enough to answer for; but in his legislation he only copied the example of earlier Roman Catholic times, of a Roman Catholic prince acting on the solicitation of Roman Catholic bishops. We refer the reader to the act, 2 Henry IV., c. 15. (A.D. 1400)—an act concerning heresies, reciting that a new sect of heretical preachers had arisen, and that the diocesans cannot by their jurisdiction spiritual, without the aid of his Majesty, sufficiently correct the said false and perverse people, "ON THE PRAYER OF THE PRELATES, it is enacted, that none shall preach without license, and any offender against the act shall be arrested by the diocesan, and imprisoned and fined; and any person refusing to abjure, or relapsing, shall be delivered to the sheriff, who then before the people, in an high place do to be burnt, that such punishment may strike in fear to the minds of others. So that such wicked doctrines nor its authors shall be in any wise suffered." Here is the plan of conversion carried out by a Roman Catholic prince at the prayer of Roman Catholic prelates; and yet it is said by Dr. Milner, "that if Queen Mary was a persecutor, it was not in virtue of the tenets of her religion that she persecuted." No, because the church disclaims the power of punishing heretics: she only prays the secular arm to execute the vengeance she prescribes, and yet she affects to be guiltless of the blood of all the Protestant martyrs. Even Henry the Eighth revolted from the loose cruelty of this act, which left the matter at large, and every man exposed to the penalties of heresy, as defined by the bishop; and there was a degree of justice in Henry the Eighth first defining what should be deemed heresy, by which, as he says, the ignorant might escape being ensnared.*

Thus far we have shown that Henry the Eighth was a bad patron of Protestant doctrines, and in the close of his life, and three years before his death, we find him directing cruel prohibitions against the cardinal principle of the Reformation—the free circulation of the Bible.

The 34 Henry VIII., c. 1 (A.D. 1542), after enacting various restrictions on the use of the Scriptures in English, enacts, that no women, nor artificers, prentices, or journeymen, serving in the degree of yeomen, as under, husbandmen, nor labourers shall read the Bible or New Testament, in English, to himself, or to any other, privately or openly, upon pain of imprisonment. This must certainly have been the precedent forwarded to the Duke of Tuscany for his guidance.

Why, then, reader, is it that Henry the Eighth is set down as the founder of the English Protestant Church? Do you not see that the best way to injure a cause is to associate with it men of infamous character, if you cannot blacken the characters of its real leaders or associates? Both plans have been resorted to with equal perseverance, whether to vilify a Luther, a Calvin, or a Cranmer, or to prejudice a Reformed Church by setting forth as its patrons the most reprobate of men. The intrinsic value of the argument itself, that a religion is false because some of its professors are like Simon Magus or Judas Iscariot, is nothing; but the weight which it carries with the unreflecting is considerable, and therefore it is that to which the Church of Rome most sedulously applies itself; especially as it is one that can be supported by facts, manufactured and fabricated after the fashion of Mr. Maguire at the Dublin controversy, or Mr. French at that of Hammersmith. When the priest has no better argument against the religion of Protestants than that Henry the Eighth was its founder, or that Luther held conferences on theology with the devil, we trust our readers will regard them with suspicion, or at least with caution, and examine for themselves the foundation on which they rest.

* But one of the first statutes of the reign of Queen Mary (1 Mary, c. 6) was to revive this dreadful enactment, and under its comprehensive and deadly powers she swayed the sceptre, or rather the sword, of orthodoxy during her entire reign.

DOUBTS AND DIFFICULTIES.

OUR readers may rely on the truth of the following anecdote, which recently appeared in print, from an authentic source: we may add, that we ourselves have heard its accuracy confirmed by the testimony of a gentleman in the civil service of the East India Company, who was, for many years, resident in India:—

"A native gentleman in Tinnevelly, holding one of the highest situations under government which a native may hold, himself related to me the following story of an interview which he had with a Roman Catholic priest, in the house of a merchant residing at Tuticorin. In the course of the conversation, the priest highly commended the public spirit of this native gentleman, who was then, at his own expense, building a noble bridge across the river, between Palimcottah and the town of Tinnevelly; and suggested the propriety of his taking a further step, and becoming a Christian; asking him, whether he had never formed any intention of doing so. 'Well, sir,' said my native friend, 'I have thought about it at times, and I don't know what I may do before I die; but you must not, in that case, suppose that I should become a Roman Catholic.' 'Why not?' inquired the priest, and asserted the exclusive claim of the Church of Rome to be called Christian. This not being assented to, the priest again asked why he would not become a Roman Catholic, 'Oh, sir,' said the native, with the usual politeness of his countrymen, 'I do not wish to assign a reason; it might be offensive to you.' 'Oh, no,' rejoined the priest: 'you need not fear that: tell me freely what your difficulty is.' 'Then,' said the native gentleman, 'if you must know it, it is simply this: I see no advantage whatever in giving up one form of idolatry for another.' 'Idolatry,' was the reply:—'you do not mean to say we are idolaters?' 'Well, sir, I can arrive at no other conclusion: have you not images of the Virgin Mary, and Jesus Christ, and the saints, in your temples, as we have our gods; and cars upon which you drag them about at your feasts, as we do; and do you not bow down before them in your worship, just as we bow before our images?' 'True,' said the priest, 'we have those images, and use them in our worship, but we do not worship them: we worship only the sacred persons whom they represent.' 'Well,' said the Hindu, 'that explanation, after all, does not remove the difficulty; for do you think that I, an ignorant Hindu, as you would say, am so foolish as to imagine that the idol which I worship, and which I know was made by the stone-mason of the place, is the god himself? Oh, no! I don't worship the idols—I worship only the sacred persons whom they represent; and so, after all, I don't see any great difference between us; and to tell you the truth, I am resolved that if I should ever give up idolatry, I will give it up entirely, and worship God according to your Bible, which, I believe, forbids image worship altogether."

It is a true saying—

> "If thou would'st thy faults discover, > View thyself with other's eyes."

Our Roman Catholic friends, when they read the above extract, may imagine for the moment that they are looking through a pair of Hindu spectacles at their own religious rites and services; and when they find a Hindu native gentleman, himself confessedly an idolater, roundly asserting that they are no better than his countrymen, we can well conceive that the first feeling in their minds will be one of scornful incredulity. "What!" they will say, "our church, the true Catholic Church, which has a college in Rome for the propagation of the faith, under the eye of the Pope himself—our church, which yearly sends forth hundreds of missionaries to every part of the earth, to convert the poor, blind, ignorant heathen from the worship of false gods to the faith of the Gospel of Christ—our church herself guilty of open and manifest idolatry, the most grievous offence which can be committed against Almighty God! The thing is too absurd to be believed."

We can fully enter into these feelings; and we are confident that our Roman Catholic readers will thank us for giving them an opportunity of carefully considering both sides of a question which hitherto, perhaps, may never have been brought before their minds, but which, we freely admit, is one of the very greatest importance. We approach this subject with the most anxious desire to avoid all harsh and irritating expressions. Truth, and truth alone, is the one object we have at heart.

In the first place, we need scarcely stop to prove, that idolatry is a great and awful sin; upon this point, at least, both Roman Catholics and Protestants are agreed. The Word of God uniformly uses the strongest language in warning its readers to beware of any approach to this sin. St. Paul reckons idolatry among those works which shall exclude whosoever doeth them from the kingdom of heaven (Gal. v 21). He charges the Corinthians to "flee from idolatry" (1 Cor. x. 14); and St. John classes idolaters with murderers and whoremongers, all of whom "shall have their portion in the lake burning with fire and brimstone."—Rev. xxi. 8. It is plain from these and other passages, that if the enormity of this sin be so great in the sight of God, every pious Christian will carefully shun all such actions and expressions as may have even the appearance of leading to idolatry. St. Paul warns the Thessalonians not only to abstain from sin, but "from all appearance of evil refrain yourselves."—1 Thess. v. 22. In this, as in some other cases, a man may fall into sin through ignorance or inadvertence: he may not know or reflect that a custom in which he has been trained from childhood is really idolatrous, and contrary to God's Word; but as soon as his error has been pointed out to him, he is called upon, by every motive of Christian obedience, to repent of it and abandon it without delay.

Some of our readers, however, may be ready to ask—What is the exact nature of the sin of idolatry, and in what does it consist?

Now, in the first place, we must be careful not to confound idolatry with the worship of false gods. The word is, indeed, often used in this sense now; but at present we are to inquire into the meaning which it bears in Scripture, where the sin of idolatry is forbidden. In its proper and literal meaning, idolatry signifies the worship of images (1). There may be images of false gods as well as images of the true God; but it is important to observe, that the Bible has but one word to describe the religious worship paid to any image; and further, that one and the same word is used to designate an image of a false god and an image of the true God. In proof of this fact we need only refer to the history of the golden calf (Ex. xxxii. 4, 5). By this calf Aaron intended to represent the Deity, "who had brought Israel up out of the land of Egypt." (Vide Nehemiah ix. 18—"Yea, when they had made them a molten calf and said, This is thy god that brought thee out of Egypt.") When the calf was made, Aaron "proclaimed a feast unto the LORD (Jehovah.)" The calf, therefore, was intended to be an image not of a false God, but of the true Jehovah. Yet, St. Stephen, in the Acts, calls this calf an idol (εἴδωλον). "They made a calf in those days, and offered sacrifice to the idol."—Acts vii. 41. And St. Paul, in reference to this history, charges the Israelites with idolatry for worshipping this image of the true God. "Neither become ye idolaters," saith he, "as some of them, as it is written, The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play."—1 Cor. x. 7. We must remember, therefore, that (although the word is occasionally used in a somewhat wider signification) the primary and proper Scripture meaning of idolatry is, the worship of an image.

We now come to consider the important passage of Scripture in which God has been pleased to make known to us his will in regard to the worship of images.

We know from history that several of the most civilized nations in ancient times, whose only guide was the light of reason, considered it no sin to make images of their gods, or to worship them; but we who have the Word of God in our hands ought to look to it, and to it alone, as our rule in this matter. Now, this rule is fully and plainly set forth in the second of the Ten Commandments (Exodus xx. 4; Deut. v. 8)—"Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down thyself unto them, nor serve them; for I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God"(2).

This commandment plainly contains three distinct clauses, or prohibitions, against the use of images or pictures in connection with religious worship. Firstly, the making of them is forbidden: "thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or likeness." Secondly, outward reverence is forbidden: "Thou shalt not bow down unto them." Thirdly, inward adoration is prohibited: "Thou shalt not serve (or worship) them." And the reason of this whole commandment is emphatically added—"I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God;" or, as the same reason is elsewhere more fully stated by the prophet Isaiah, "I am the LORD, that is my name: and my glory will I not give to another, neither my praise to graven images."—Isaiah xlii. 8. God's hatred of image worship is here stated so plainly and distinctly, that there scarcely seems any possibility of evasion. In fact, we do not see how stronger or more express words could have been employed by the Divine legislator, in order to prevent the possibility of image worship, in any form or upon any pretext whatever.

And now, if we turn to the authorized formularies of the Church of Rome, we shall, doubtless, find them to be equally express in denouncing a sin which is so plainly condemned in the second precept of the Decalogue. But, alas! we soon discover our mistake. The eleventh article of the Creed of Pope Pius IV., which is the most authentic summary of the Roman Catholic faith, runs as follows (3):—"I most firmly assert, that

(1) The Latin Vulgate (which is the authorised version of the Scriptures in the Roman Catholic Church) translates εἰδωλολατρεία by "simulacrorum servitus," the service or worship of images (Vide Col. iii. 5). The Greek word, as every scholar knows, is derived from εἴδωλον (an image), and λατρεία (worship).

(2) Vide the CATHOLIC LAYMAN for March, pp. 27, 28, where some remarks are made on the difference between the Authorised Version and the Douay translation of the Second Commandment. The difference is but trifling, and turns chiefly upon two words. 1. The Hebrew פסל is rendered by the Douay Version "graven thing," instead of "graven image." Gesenius, who is confessedly the greatest Hebrew authority in modern times, translates the word by "simulacrum sculptile," which exactly agrees with the Authorised Version. 2. The Douay translators render לא־תשתחוה (thou shalt not bow down to them, Auth. Ver.) "thou shalt not adore them." But the primary meaning of the verb שחה, as given by Gesenius, is, "to bow oneself down, to prostrate oneself before any one out of honour;" and our Roman Catholic readers may satisfy themselves that this translation is correct by referring to the following passages, where the same Hebrew word is thus translated in the Douay Version. In Genesis xxvii. 7, we read, "Abraham bowed down before the people of the land" (Heb. וישתחו) Genesis xxxvii. 7, "Your sheaves, standing about, bowed down before my sheaf" (Heb. תשתחוין). Genesis xlviii. 12 Joseph bowed down with his face to the ground" (Heb. וישתחו). These examples, taken from the Douay Version itself, are enough to prove that the clause of the Second Commandment ought to be translated, as it is in the Authorized Version, "Thou shalt not bow down to them."

(3) Firmissimè assero, imagines Christi ac Deiparæ semper Virginis, necnon aliorum sanctorum, habendas et retinendas esse: atque eis debitum honorem ac venerationem impertiendam.—Symb. Pii. iv., § 11.

the images of Christ, and of the Mother of God, always virgin, and of other saints, are to be had and retained, and that to them due honour and veneration is to be given."

This is, indeed, a sad and melancholy contrast! The word of God says—"Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image." Pope Pius IV. says—"I most firmly assert that images are to be had and retained." The Almighty declares—"Thou shalt not bow down unto them or worship them." The Church of Rome asserts that "due honour and veneration" is to be given to images. What may be the precise nature or amount of this "due honour and veneration" is not indeed stated; but those who are familiar with the customs prevalent in Roman Catholic countries, and especially in Italy, must have a painful recollection of the universal prevalence of image worship, avowedly, and without disguise. Nay, the very language of the Creed of Pope Pius IV. would almost lead us to expect as much. In it Roman Catholics are taught to believe in God "with a firm faith" (firma fide), but "to assert most firmly" (firmissime), the lawfulness of image worship. Thus, the Church of Rome, if we are to believe the language of this Creed, teaches her members to believe more firmly in the lawfulness of image worship than in the existence of God himself! Is this the manner in which she practically trains them "to abstain from all appearance of evil?" We fear that, with the creed of Pope Pius IV. in our hands, and the practice of the great majority of Roman Catholics before our eyes, we cannot acquit the Church of Rome of criminal negligence, in not guarding her followers, by adequate means, against the plain and open breach of the Second Commandment.

We know, of course, the plea by which the practice of image worship in the Roman Catholic Church is usually defended—namely, that the worship, whatever it be, which is paid to the image, passes on to the being whom the image is intended to represent. We shall hereafter take occasion to point out the great difficulties and objections which stand in the way of this theory, and which have been acknowledged even by Roman Catholic divines; but at present we may observe that the plea—such as it is—leaves the greater part of the charge we have made unanswered. The Second Commandment, as we have seen, distinctly forbids three things—viz., the making of images for religious uses, the bowing down to them, the inward adoration of them. Now, we cannot tell what passes in a man's mind as he offers up his prayers before an image. His thoughts may, for ought we know, be directed to Christ or the Virgin Mary, or they may rest directly on the image itself; but his outward gestures are open to observation; and when we see him bowing down before the image, and addressing religious reverence to it, we cannot but conclude that he is either ignorant of, or that he altogether rejects the plain command of Almighty God—"Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image—thou shalt not bow down to it, nor serve it."

And there is one fact which seems to prove very conclusively that the heads of the Church of Rome are quite conscious that their practice of image worship cannot stand the test of Scripture—namely, the almost universal omission of the Second Commandment from the popular Roman Catholic catechisms.* Why, we may well ask, are the Roman Catholic clergy so anxious to keep back the knowledge of the existence of this commandment from the children whom they instruct, unless they are afraid that doubts will be excited in their young minds by the sight of images in their churches and chapels, if they should discover that the Word of God expressly condemns all image worship? When the Almighty gave the Ten Commandments to the Israelites, "he wrote them upon two tables of stone" (Deut. v. 22), and he charged the people "to teach them diligently unto their children."—Deut. vi. 7. Every jot and tittle of these laws ought to be held in the highest reverence. If we feel any regard for what the Almighty has commanded, surely the words which were written by the finger of God himself ought to be carefully treasured up in the memory, and implicitly obeyed by all, whether young or old. And yet, in the common Roman Catholic catechisms, the Second Commandment is either wholly omitted, or else cut down to one small fragment! We again ask, why is this done? The Church of England is not afraid to teach her children all the council of God. She does not dare to mutilate the solemn words which the Lord saw fit to make known to his people in such a miraculous manner. The authorised catechism in the Prayer-book of the United Church of England and Ireland contains the whole Ten Commandments without curtailment or alteration. That Church, at any rate, is not afraid of the light.

We have seen that the Creed of Pope Pius IV. declares that "due honour" is to be given to images; and that the Council of Trent makes the same assertion.† But what is this "due honour?" Why did not the learned Fathers of the Council, or the infallible Pontiff, leave more precise directions upon this point? Their silence, we apprehend, proceeded as much from fear of betraying the weakness of their cause as from any other motive: for this is one of the knotty points relating to the worship of images which, however it may be decided, must, according to Roman Catholic divines, inevitably lead to idolatry, as we shall now proceed to prove. In the theology of the Church of Rome, Latria is the name given to the worship which is due to God alone. Let us suppose that there is an image of Jesus Christ before us; the question is, are we to worship this image with Latria, or are we not? No, says Bellarmine, we are not; and here are his reasons*:—"No image is to be worshipped properly with that worship which the thing represented is worshipped by; for Latria is a worship proper to God; but no image, upon account of relation, or any other way, is God. Therefore, that worship doth not belong to it. Again, either the Divine worship, or Latria, which is given to the image relatively for another, is the same with that which is given to God, or an inferior worship. If it be the same, the creature is equally worshipped with God, which certainly is idolatry. For idolatry is not only when God is forsaken, and an idol worshipped, but when an idol is worshipped together with God. If it be an inferior worship, then that is not Latria, for that is the highest worship." Thus far Bellarmine. On the other side, Vasquez, a Jesuit, a man of as great reputation and ability as Bellarmine, decides exactly the opposite way—namely, that we are to worship the image with Latria.† "For," saith he, "if an inferior worship be given to the image, distinct from that which is given to the thing represented, he that so gives it incurs the crime of idolatry, for he expresses his submission to a mere inanimate thing, that hath no kind of excellency to deserve it from him."

We may now put the question to our Roman Catholic readers, what are they to do? If they worship the image of Jesus Christ with Latria, they are guilty of downright idolatry, according to Cardinal Bellarmine, for they are giving to an image that worship which is due to God alone. If they do not worship the image with Latria, they are worshipping it for its own sake, by which, according to the Jesuit Vasquez, they incur the crime of idolatry. We see, then, that if they worship the image at all, in no possible way can they avoid the crime of idolatry according to the opinion of the most eminent Roman Catholic divines. Here then, surely, is a question, if there be any, upon which the infallible guidance of the Supreme Pontiff is needed, in order to save faithful members of the Church of Rome from falling into deadly sin. But what say the Council of Trent and Pope Pius IV.? They reply, as we have seen, that "due honour" is to be given to the image—in short, they leave the difficulty where they found it! Where, we may well ask, is the boasted unity of Roman Catholic divines upon one of the most important articles of their faith? Where is the benefit which they derive from an infallible head, if it cannot help them out of a difficulty which nearly touches their eternal salvation, and which has been acutely felt by the greatest champions of their creed?

We make no pretensions to infallibility; and yet we venture to think that we can give our Roman Catholic friends safer advice than either Pope Pius IV., Cardinal Bellarmine, or the Jesuit Vasquez. It is simply this, to abstain altogether from the practice of image worship, which, even according to the statements of its most illustrious advocates, is encompassed with such awful perils. The sin of idolatry is too great, that we should rashly venture upon any practice which may, however unwittingly, lead us into such a grievous transgression against the honour and majesty of Almighty God.

We have not space at present to enter on an examination of the arguments by which the practice of image worship has been palliated or defended, nor to trace the history of the rise and progress of this corruption of the primitive faith. We hope, however, to take an early opportunity of returning to the subject; and we shall then present our readers with such an extraordinary picture of the inconsistencies, vacillation, and contradictions of Popes and Councils upon this matter, as may well startle the most stubborn believer in the unity and immutability of the Church of Rome.

TALK OF THE ROAD—No. VIII.

"Oh, Jem, where have you been all this time?"

"Why, Pat, I got a job down to Roscommon, to drive up some cattle, and I only got back last night," said Jem.

"Well, it's I that's wishing to have a talk with you, Jem," said Pat.

"And what is it about?" said Jem.

"Why, sure the readers is come!" said Pat.

"Ah, where are they come?" said Jem.

"Why, into the very town of Kilcommon itself," said Pat.

"Well," said Jem, "if that doesn't beat all! didn't I think, if ever they came down this way, it would be in some quiet, out-of-the-way place like this they would come, where, maybe, some of us would let them in of an evening unknownst; but what will they do in Kilcommon at all?"

"Well, then, it's there they've come," said Pat, "right into Father John's month, and facing all the blackguards in Kilcommon; and of all the work ever you see, it's in Kilcommon it is."

"Tell us all about it: will you?" said Jem.

"Well," said Pat, "I looked for a job in Kilcommon last week, for there was nothing to be got here, and, sure enough, I saw the readers the first day they came into the town. And they didn't go about like any readers ever we saw going through the country before; but just like men going about their business in a fair, or in a market—going straight forenent them, into every house, one after the other, and passing none, and talking to the people as open as day, and telling them they had souls to be saved, and that the Word of God, and nothing else, was able to save their souls."

"Well, how did the people take it all?" said Jem.

"Why, then, they took it quite pleasant," said Pat; "they seemed all to be took of a sudden, and it looked so open, they could see no harm in it, and the people were all mighty civil to them; and when I followed them a while after dinner, I saw that there was a deal of the people that were well pleased to talk to them."

"Well, and what was Father John doing at all?" said Jem.

"Why, the next day," says Pat, "Father John comes down just the same way, and goes into every house the readers were in the day before, and 'Where's the books and papers the Ranters left with you?' says he. Well, and sure enough, many of the people that was glad enough to speak to the readers the day before, was just cowed when they saw Father John forenent them, and handed up their books, looking for all the world as if they were going to do penance; and some of them that I knowed took the books, said they never got any; and there was some said out that they liked the books, and found no harm in them, and they weren't going for to give them, and old Jemmy Neal says, says he, 'Sure it's only about Irishmen's rights,' says he; 'and aren't we going to have any rights at all?' says he."

"And what were the readers doing that day?" says Jem.

"Why," said Pat, "they began before Father John was out, in another part of the town; and all the time Father John was going over one street, they were going about in another, as pleasant as ever."

"And didn't Father John go after them to where they were," said Jem.

"Indeed, didn't he," said Pat; "and I was wondering why, for I saw the town-sergeant come and tell him where they were, and he didn't go after them a bit; and so I went to see what they were doing, and sure enough they were walking about as bold as you please, and a real clergyman with them, and he with his Douay Bible in his hand, saying he only wanted to tell the people what was in that, and that if he met Father John he would hold his own tongue, and only hand the book to Father John, and ask him to read some of that, and explain it to the people. And sure enough I didn't wonder that Father John kept out of the street he was in, for that would be new work for Father John."

"Well, and how did it end at all?" said Jem.

"Why, it just went on the same way till Saturday," said Pat; "the readers getting in to all the houses quite pleasant, for no one liked to put them out, and Father John running about at the far end of the town, for fear he would meet them; and so it went on till Saturday night. Well, on Sunday morning, says I to myself, I'll just go into the chapel at Kilcommon, where I wasn't, sure enough, for long enough, and I'll hear what Father John has to say about it. Well, of all the scolding and cursing that ever you heard a priest give at the altar it was the terriblest. First he fell on the Ranters, and the Swaddlers, and the Soupers, and the Jumpers, and the unbaptized heathens, and the cockatrices, and the goose-stealers, and a deal more names he had for them; and, sure enough, I wondered why he called them goose-stealers (for them's as decent men as you would see, more like gentlemen than Father John, with all his bad language); till I saw him turn round to some old women that wor in the chapel, and says he, 'Now, you ould women there, mind to look after your geese,' says he, 'for these Soupers are so fond of soup,' says he, 'that when the bacon's out, it's stealing your geese they'll be,' says he, 'to make soup of.' Well, thinks I to myself, says I, if that's all you have to say against reading the Bible, the readers will have the town yet, thinks I; and with that he went on to Mr. Owens for fetching the readers, and of all the bad names that ever was called, he had the baddest for him. And, says he, when the cholera was in Ireland, their clergy, says he, that's married and has wives, says he, all presented a petition to the Protestant bishop, says he, that they mightn't go to the cholera hospital, says he, but let the Protestants die like dogs, says he. And thinks I to myself that's enough any way; for when I was lying ten days in the cholera hospital, didn't I see Mr. Owens, that has a wife, there three times a day, and never set eyes on Father John, if it would keep me out of hell, let alone Purgatory? and I saw plain enough there was plenty forby me that considered that. Well, then he came to Mrs. Owens, and if he hadn't the horridest names for her that ever you heard, it's a wonder; and when he got just black in the face with abusing her, it's a fiend out of hell I was going to call her, says he; and, sure enough, I saw many a poor creature that seemed ashamed to hear Mrs. Owens called that way, for it's she that's good to the poor. Well, then he went on to tell them what to do to the Ranters; and if they would not throw dirty water on them, and gather on them in the streets, and hoot them, and sweep up the puddles in their floors in their faces with the besoms, he'd call them on the altar next Sunday, and put the curse of God and his curse on them, and never give them the rights of the church as long as they lived; and so that was Father John's sermon at the blessed altar."

"Well, and what became of it a Monday?" said Jem.

"Why, then, sure enough, I went to see," said Pat; "and what should I see when the readers came up the street, but up comes Brady, the jammer, with a big hand-bell that Connor, the bell-man, rings in the street when there is an auction: and Brady, the jammer, comes up the street, ringing his bell, and gathering all the blackguards in the street, and sure they are the bad set in Kilcommon, and up he goes to the readers as they were going into a house; and of all the screeching, and cursing, and bad language, and ringing that ever you heard, it beat all."

"And how did the readers take it all?" said Jem.

"Just as pleasant as you please," said Pat; "they had a word to answer for everything, and were never put out, no more than if they were ringing bells themselves all their lives."

"Well, and did the people let them in?" said Jem.

"How darst they," said Pat, "when such a mob was riz on them; but I saw that a deal of them did not like it at all, and went out and listened to the readers and the clergyman quite quiet. But, oh, the jammer: when the clergyman would offer to speak a word to the people, he'd go and ring his bell up at our ear with one hand, and when that was tired with the other hand, at the other ear, screeching himself black in the face; and then the clergyman would say, holding up the Douay Bible in his hand—'Is it your own Bible that you hate, that you treat it that way? Why don't your priest come himself, and show if the book is a bad one?' And, indeed, when the people saw how pleasant and quiet the readers behaved, they thought it bad work, and out comes ould Sally Smith, and says she to the jammer, 'Is that what you're at, and isn't it yourself that would sell the priest next for a glass of whisky?' And, indeed, I heard after that, that the jammer was hired by Father John, and that he had a pound to put the readers out of Kilcommon, and no cure no pay. But that's the way it is; and what will come of it, I don't know at all."

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "I'm thinking that if the priest has nothing to say agen the Bible, but dirty water, and mud, and shouting, and the ringing of a bell, he'll never put it out of Kilcommon that way. Sure all the boys must see, when they come to think of it, that their religion is in a bad way, when the priest has nothing else to say for it."

"Well, indeed, I'm thinking that's true," said Pat; "but we'll see, and who knows but the readers and the Bible will have Kilcommon yet?"

POPE PIUS V.—CATECHISM OF COUNCIL OF TRENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have often been surprised that the vast majority of Roman Catholics, believing themselves to possess an infallible guide, do not more generally refer to the original documents, which alone contain, with certainty, its true teaching. It rarely happens that they go beyond the instructions of their particular spiritual guide, whose fallibility they do not, in theory, deny; but whom yet they thus elevate, in practice, into their only infallible standard. It cannot be expected that all priests should be equally well informed, or should take the same views of their church's doctrines, scattered as they are over so many ponderous and difficult volumes. Hence arise the greatest differences amongst individuals, which seem completely to mar the practical utility to be derived from a common authoritative standard. An instance of this occurs to me as a good example, not that it appears to a Protestant to be on a point of any vital importance, but because it is much insisted on by eminent Roman Catholic divines, and yet seems to be a palpable inconsistency.

The 4th and 5th verses of the 20th chapter of Exodus, which form the Second Commandment in the Protestant version, and which, though very frequently omitted in catechisms, are yet acknowledged by the Roman Catholic Church as part of the first precept, have lately provoked no small controversy. Our translation is objected to as a wilful perversion; and it is argued that we have introduced the words "graven image" improperly, and to uphold our heretical views on that subject. To those who remember that the next word is "similitude," or "likeness," it would seem of little moment, as this must include an image; but it is not so treated, and if worth a very warm attack, it deserves a just defence. Dr. Dixon, whose name derives unusual importance from his recent elevation to the Roman Catholic Primacy, published a work, some few months since,* in which he devotes a chapter to the meaning of the two verses, and bases much of his argument on the Protestant mistranslation, or introduction of the word image. Dr. Doyle, in his "Abridgment of Christian Doctrine,"† distinctly attributes great weight to this view. The Douay Bible represents the careful opinion of many of the greatest biblical students, and was specially revised by Dr. Murray, and is, therefore, to be taken as the exponent of their opinion on this point, and translates the words in question "graven thing."

The only translation usually referred to, as stamped by the Roman Catholic Church with the attribute of infallibility, is the Vulgate, in which the word "sculptile" is used, which leaves the controversy open, or rather favours the Douay version. It appears to me, however, that there is another, even (if possible) more authoritative, and certainly more decisive. The Catechism of the Council of Trent has been usually received as the undoubted expression of the church's doctrines, and, if not infallible, has never had its accuracy impeached by Roman Catholic divines. This, too, has been commonly referred to in Latin, and does not, therefore, advance the controversy a step. But, fortunately, I find that there were two editions promulgated simultaneously, both from the Papal press at Rome,‡ both with the same authoritative approval of Pope Pius V., and both in the year 1567. On an inspection of the two, there is no reason to pronounce one of more authority than the other; the one is in Latin, the other in Italian; and, if a preference should be given to either, it should be to that which was in the native language of those who drew it up, and which was, therefore, incapable of error from ambiguity or misunderstanding. Turning, therefore, to the 375th page, we find the commandment thus rendered:—

"Non ti farai alcuna imagine scolpita," &c., and farther on, "non le adorerai, ne le honorerai."

I need hardly translate words so obvious and unmistakable—"Thou shalt not make thee any sculptured image." And, again—"Thou shalt not adore them, nor shalt thou honour them." The first needs no comment, and the second expression is no less valuable; for no words are so frequently translated in different forms, and so often disputed, as those that express different kinds of forms of worship. The infallible declaration, therefore, that images are not even to receive a religious honour, seems to me to have been wholly overlooked by Roman Catholic controversialists. As to the introduction of the word "images," it suggests this inquiry—Are Dr. Doyle, Dr. Murray, and Dr. Dixon right, and was Pope Pius V. wrong? And, if not, then did not these three learned divines teach incorrectly, on what they said was important? This will surely show that no Roman Catholic should rest satisfied with the mere ipse dixit of his priest, however learned, but should refer to the documents which alone he believes infallible.

One word on a feature in this authoritative edition, particularly as it is one that may have tended to cause this very error. The oversight was most natural; for, without a very careful perusal, this text is not likely to be discovered at all. The verses that are given, as constituting the ten commandments, are printed in very large type, quite distinct from the rest of the book, and with a commendable prominence; but this fourth verse, the Protestant second commandment, is omitted in that place and type, though those before and following appear; and any reader would naturally imagine that it did not form any part of the ten commandments. However, some pages afterwards it is introduced in the commentary, so that it cannot be said it is wholly omitted; but it is so done as not to attract notice, nor to appear a part of the commandment; and not even being placed as a quotation, between inverted commas, it might escape the notice of any reader, who was not previously aware that it was both a verse in the Bible and an integral portion of the Decalogue. If this verse escaped the observation of such learned men as the three divines I have named, I may well imagine that I may happen to be the first to now place this important translation before the public.

THE TOUCHSTONE.

OBJECTION 13.—Protestants commonly teach that people of all religions may be saved, even Pagans, Jews, or Mahometans, that believe not in Christ, nor receive his Gospel.

Their own Bible, in clear and express terms, condemns this error (St. Mark xvi. 16)—He that believeth not (the Gospel) shall be damned. Acts iv. 12—Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is no other name (but the name of Jesus) under heaven given unto men, whereby we must be saved. St. John iii. 36—He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him.

REPLY.—It is plain that the persons here spoken of are such as had had the Gospel preached to them; which some of them received, and others, to their condemnation, rejected.

As for such Pagans as have lived and died without ever having heard the Gospel, no Protestant Church presumes to decide how they will be judged; because Scripture gives us no information on the subject.

But that Protestants consider it a matter of great importance to make known the Gospel to Pagan nations is sufficiently proved by the toils and dangers and sufferings which many of their missionaries encounter in that work, and in the zeal and liberality shown by others in sending out and supporting such missionaries.

OBJECTION 14.—Protestants teach that it is not necessary to salvation to embrace the faith and communion of the true church.

Their own Bible teaches the contrary, when it tells us (Acts iv. 47) that God added daily to the church such as should be saved. And (Isaiah lx. 12) that the nation and kingdom that will not serve (the church) shall perish.

REPLY.—The passages, it should be observed, make no mention whatever of the Church of Rome. Protestants do hold that the Gospel promises are limited to those who are members of the Church of Christ—namely, the universal church—which consists of all believers in Christ throughout the whole world. But they do not admit the supremacy claimed by the Church of Rome and by the Greek Church; each of which calls itself the only "true Church," and the "Catholic Church," and demands submission from all Christians. Let any one try such claims by the TOUCHSTONE of Scripture, according to the professed design of this tract. Protestants will admit the claims of the Church of Rome if any passage can be found, either in the Epistle to the Romans, or in any other part of Scripture, describing the Church of Rome as supreme over all Christians, and as possessing an authority which all are bound to submit to. A doctrine so very important as this would be, if true, would surely have been mentioned by the Apostles had they known of any such. But we find them, on the contrary, always speaking of each of the churches—of Ephesus, for instance, and Corinth, and Thessalonica, &c.—as perfectly independent of anyone on earth, except the apostles themselves.

OBJECTION 15.—Protestants look upon it as uncharitable to say that heresy is a damnable sin, or that heretics are in a state of damnation.

Their own Bible (Gal. v. 20) expressly reckons heresies amongst those sins of which it pronounces, that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

OBJECTION 16.—Protestants are of opinion that no man shall be damned for following a wrong religion, if he really judges it to be right, whether he have taken sufficient pains to inform himself of the truth or no.

Their own Bible expressly tells them (Prov. xvi. 25), There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death.

REPLY to 15, 16—If you read through the Prayer-book of the Church of England, including the Thirty-nine Articles, you will find no such declaration. And as for what any private individual, Roman Catholic or Protestant, may declare as his own private opinion, this, be it right or wrong, is not to be regarded as a decision of his church.*

The same observations will apply to the 16th objection. But no Protestants deny what the Apostle says at Gal. v. 19 20, 21, concerning the sins which are there enumerated, among which, along with heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, and many others, they find idolatry—that is, adoration of images.

But Protestants do not, in general, presume to pronounce of any individual sinner that he is inevitably doomed to final perdition, and that it is impossible for the Almighty to pardon him; because God alone can perfectly know what opportunities each man has had, and what temptations he has been exposed to. And no Protestant Church has ever put forth any such declaration as that contained in objection 16.

If a passage could be cited, from the works of any individual Protestant writer, declaring it as his belief that it is a matter of indifference whether a man have taken due pains to inform himself of the truth or no, this would prove nothing against any other Protestants. But we do not believe that even any one such passage could be found.

OBJECTION 17.—Protestants, to justify their wide notions of salvation in any religion, falsify the Scripture, by forging a text, nowhere to be found, even in their own Bible—viz., that a remnant of all shall be saved.

Their own Bible loudly condemns this forgery (Rev. xxii. 18, 19)—I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this Book, if any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book: and if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, &c.

* See Eighteenth Article of Church of England.

Reply.—This is altogether a mistake. If you read through all the formularies of the Church of England, and of any other Protestant Churches, you will find no such notions taught, nor any such pretended text cited.

Objection 18.—Protestants will have the trial of spirits to be made only by the written word, and not by the living voice of the pastors of the Church, or by adhering to them or their authority.

Their Bible prescribes a different rule (1 John iv. 6)—He that knoweth God heareth us (the pastors of the Church); he that is not of God heareth not us: by this we know the spirit of truth and the spirit of error.

Reply.—The Apostle John and the other Apostles of the Lord were divinely inspired, and proved their immediate commission from heaven by the miracles they wrought. Protestants hold themselves bound to hear them, which they do by studying their writings which have come down to us, and comparing with these whatsoever is taught by uninspired men.

You may observe that, in order to condemn Protestants for their procedure, it was found necessary to foist in the words "the pastors of the Church," which is not in the Bible.

If any "pastors of the Church" teach doctrines at variance with what an Apostle has taught in his writings, it is plain that to follow them is not to "hear the Apostle," but to be led by the spirit of error.

Objection 19.—Protestants reject unwritten traditions.

Their Bible expressly recommends them (2 Thess. ii. 15)—Brethren, stand fast and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word or our epistle.

Reply.—Protestants are aware, as, indeed, every one must be, that of things that are reported—i.e., traditions—some are true and some false, and some have a mixture of truth and falsehood. The test that they apply is Scripture—the very touchstone recommended in this tract.

Any tradition that is confirmed by Scripture they receive as genuine; any that is at variance with Scripture they reject; and any that is neither confirmed nor contradicted by Scripture, they leave at large, to be believed or rejected by each man according to his own judgment.

As for those who had themselves heard Paul preach, they would be likely, if attentive hearers, to remember correctly what he taught. But those who heard their report of it, and those again who heard the report of these, and so on through fifty or a hundred intermediate reporters, would be likely to depart somewhat from the correct statement of the Apostle's preaching. And, moreover, crafty persons might designedly introduce something into their reports, to serve some purpose of their own; even as the Pharisees, in our Lord's time, had "made the Word of God of no effect through their tradition."

And it is remarkable that almost the only tradition mentioned in Scripture as having gained currency among Christians, during the life-time of the Apostles, had even then become falsified—John xxi. 23—"Then went out this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die."

To guard against such danger in future ages, the Apostles committed their doctrines to writing; and the Scriptures which they have left us serve as a touchstone to try what traditions are to be trusted and what not.

Objection 20.—Protestants take for their rule of faith the Scripture, as interpreted by their own private judgment.

Their Bible tells them (2 Pet., i. 20) that no prophecy of the Scripture is of private interpretation.

Reply.—The passage here quoted from St. Peter is not inconsistent with the Protestant view of the right of private judgment in the interpretation of Scripture. For it relates not to the doctrines, precepts, or histories of Scripture, but to its prophecies; and the sense of it seems to be, that a prophecy is not—like a precept or narrative—to be interpreted from the very words in which it is written, but is to be explained from the event which fulfils it. Thus, the ancient prophecies concerning the death and resurrection of the Christ were not understood, either by the Jews generally or by the disciples of Jesus, till after their fulfilment; and then we read of his "opening their minds to understand the Scriptures, saying, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer and to enter into his glory."

And with respect to the right which the Romish Church arrogates to itself of supreme authority, both in the interpretation of Scripture and on other points, Protestants may feel assured that if St. Peter, as Romanists pretend, had been the supreme ruler on earth of the Christian world, and had appointed that the Bishops of Rome should hold the same rule for ever after, he would not have failed to state it in this his very last epistle, written when he was expecting soon to be removed from this earth, and for the express purpose of reminding his converts of what it was most important for them to remember and observe.

Objection 21.—Protestants maintain that the Scripture is clear, and plain to be understood; and that the unlearned run no risk in reading and interpreting it.

Their Bible assures them (2 Pet., iii. 16) that in the Scripture are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest to their own destruction.

Reply.—This passage from St. Peter is misquoted. The Apostle is speaking of St. Paul's epistles, in which, he says, "are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction." But he does not, on this account, dissuade any of his converts from reading them; he only reminds them that, "seeing they know these things before," they are to beware lest, being led away with the error of the wicked, they fall from their own steadfastness. It was, therefore, some moral fault (self-conceit, and want of humility, perhaps) which caused these "unlearned and unstable" persons to wrest the Scripture to their destruction.

MANNER IN WHICH ROMAN CATHOLIC CONTROVERSIALISTS QUOTE BISHOP JEREMY TAYLOR.

In our September number we had to offer some comment on a letter written to us by "Warner Christian Search," on 2 Maccabees, ch. xii. See page 107.

We had, then, to observe on the use which "W. C. S." made of a passage quoted from Bishop Jeremy Taylor. "W. C. S." gave this passage as Bishop Taylor's own judgment—"His learned doctor . . . THUS EXPRESSES HIMSELF." We showed that Bishop Taylor had not thus expressed himself, but had only told us what Roman Catholics say for themselves. We showed that he had marked this by the words, "says the Romanist," which words "W. C. Search" had left out, to make it appear as if Bishop Taylor was giving his own opinion.

Knowing, as we do, that this is not a solitary instance, but a common practice of many Roman Catholic controversialists, to maintain their cause by dishonest quotations from writers of great name and character (as if there was no chance of being able to defend their cause by truth), we then promised to give other instances in which Roman Catholics had dishonestly quoted Bishop Taylor, in order that our readers may see what hope they can have of being guided into truth by such men as seek to defend their cause by the arts of falsehood.

We take our first instance from a discussion, held at Hammersmith, near London, in the year 1839, between Dr. Cumming on the side, and Daniel French, Esq., barrister-at-law, a Roman Catholic, on the other. We quote from the edition published by Hall & Co., London, 1851.

Mr. French thus introduces his quotation from Bishop Taylor:—

"Listen, also, to that renowned doctor of the Protestant Church, Dr. Jeremy Taylor—a man who, if splendour of genius can atone for the enormous crime of omitting to embrace that truth which shone so vividly in his eyes, will not be destitute of a very large reward in the kingdom of heaven."—P. 382.

Mr. French concludes his quotation thus:—

"This, I say, is a noble concession made to truth, in a disinterested hour, by Dr. Jeremy Taylor—a man whose perspicacity and wisdom shone so luminously amid the stupor of surrounding error. Oh! such words as these are, indeed, worthy of the mind that uttered them."—P. 383.

The words should have been truly and fairly stated. But before we give the words, to let our readers judge of this for themselves, we must tell the purpose of the words.

The book, called the "Liberty of Prophesying," was one of the most remarkable books ever published. It was the FIRST book ever published in the world expressly for the purpose of establishing religious liberty. Dr. Jeremy Taylor published this book to persuade mankind that they ought not to persecute men on account of their religious opinions. And there is no denying that it is a great glory and a lawful boast of the Church of England and Ireland, that a bishop of that Church (he was a bishop in Ireland) was the first person that ever wrote a book with this noble object. This led him, of course, to consider what religions which are false can have to say for themselves—whether they have such plausible reasons as might deceive well-meaning men, so that we should rather pity than persecute them for being deceived. Where, observe, it is not the truth of this doctrine that is in question, but whether those who hold it are to be persecuted or tolerated.

In section 20, he considers the case of Roman Catholics, whether Protestants should persecute or tolerate them. It is from this section that Roman controversialists take all their false quotations from Bishop Taylor in favour of their religion.

The "heading" of the section is as follows:—"How far the religion of the Church of Rome is tolerable"—that is, whether this religion is to be tolerated or proscribed and persecuted. This in itself would be enough to show any fair man that the subject of the discuss on was not the truth of this religion.

The commencement of the chapter states this plainly—"Now, concerning the religion of the Church of Rome, ... we will proceed another way, and not consider the truth or falsity of the doctrines; for that is not the best way to determine this question concerning permitting their religion or assemblies. Because that a thing is not true is not argument sufficient to conclude that he that believes it true is not to be endured." But he proposes to consider the reasons by which Roman Catholics are "abused" (or deceived), in order to argue from that that though their religion be false, they are yet to be tolerated and not persecuted; and for that purpose he goes on to state what the Roman Catholics say for themselves.

What can we say to the honesty of a man who, after reading this, gives these arguments as Taylor's own proofs or admissions of the truth of their doctrines? Yet this is what Mr. French does, and all other Roman controversialists who quote Bishop Taylor as confirming their doctrines by his own opinions.

Mr. French quotes the passage which immediately follows Bishop Taylor's declaration, that he was not considering the truth of Rome's doctrine, and says that this is Bishop Taylor's "concession made to truth!" Is this fair and honest?

But this is not all. It was not enough to hide the object with which Bishop Taylor wrote this passage; it was necessary, also, to change and alter the passage in several important particulars, in order that it might seem to bear that sense which Mr. French wished, instead of the sense that Bishop Taylor intended; and Mr. French makes all these changes and alterations without scruple. To show this, we print the passage in parallel columns, as Bishop Taylor wrote it and as Mr. French changed it.

"These following considerations may very easily persuade persons of much reason and more piety, to maintain that which they know to have been the religion of their forefathers, which had actual possession and seizure of men's minds and understandings before the opposite professions had a name; as, first, its doctrine having had a long continuance and possession of the church, which, therefore, cannot easily be supposed in the present professors to be a design, since they have received it for so many ages, and it is not likely that all ages should have the same purposes, or that the same doctrines should serve the several ends of divers ages. Secondly—its long prescription, which is such an advantage that it cannot with many arguments be retrenched; as relying upon these grounds, to wit, that truth is more ancient than falsehood, and that God would not, for so many ages, forsake his Church, and leave her in error.	"And here first I consider, that those doctrines that have had long continuance and possession in the church cannot easily be supposed in the present professors to be a design, since they have received it from so many ages, and it is not likely that all ages should have the same purposes, or that the same doctrine should serve the several ends of divers ages. "But, however, long prescription is a prejudice, oftentimes so insupportable that it cannot, with many arguments, be retrenched, as relying upon these grounds that truth is more ancient than falsehood, that God would not, for so many ages, forsake his church, and leave her in an error.
(This passage Mr. French cut out, because it showed plainly what Bishop Taylor's meaning was.)	. . . . . "But this consideration is to be enlarged upon all those particulars, which, as they are apt to abuse the persons of the men, and amuse their understandings, so they are instruments of their excuse; and by making their errors to be invincible, and their opinions, THOUGH FALSE, yet not criminal, make it also to be an effect of reason and charity to permit the men a liberty of their conscience, and let them answer to God for themselves, and their own opinions; such as are the beauty and splendour of their church; their pompous service; the stateliness and solemnity of the hierarchy; their name of 'Catholic,' which they suppose their own due, and to concern no other sect of Christians; the antiquity of many of their doctrines; the continual succession of their bishops; their immediate

Well might Mr. French cry out—"a noble concession by Dr. Jeremy Taylor!" So it is, as Mr. French has manufactured it; but is it so as Bishop Taylor wrote it? If so, why need Mr. French have altered it? What would be said of a lawyer, like Mr. French, who should thus manufacture his proofs, in pleading a cause in a court? And was the question Mr. French was then discussing less deserving of a regard to truth?

But, after all, Mr. French felt in a difficulty. If so great a man as Bishop Taylor did really thus prove that the religion of Rome was true, how came it that Bishop Taylor never became a Romanist? Hear Mr. French's answer (page 383)—"I can give you one satisfactory reason for it. There are few men who have a contempt for earthly lucre, disregarding the silver and the gold, and all chance of worldly prosperity. Scarcely had a month elapsed after writing that when he was promoted to a bishopric of Ireland, and from that moment he drew forth his pen with the utmost virulence against the Catholic religion." What will our readers say to this, when we tell them that that book was first published by Bishop Taylor in 1647, FOURTEEN YEARS before he was made a bishop, and that it was republished by Bishop Taylor himself in 1664, three years after he was made a bishop!

We shall presently give Bishop Taylor's own answer to those who tried to use that book as Mr. French has done; but first we must examine another great Roman Catholic controversialist who has quoted Bishop Taylor. This was Dr. Milner, a Roman Catholic bishop in England, who lived about thirty-five years ago, the author of a book called "The End of Controversy," a favourite text book still with those who argue on that side. In part 3, letter 36, Bishop Milner says—"The celebrated Bishop of Down, Dr. Jeremy Taylor, reasons with equal fairness where he says—"The object of their (the Catholics') adoration in the sacraments, is the only true and eternal God, hypostatically united with his holy humanity, which humanity they believe actually present under the veil of the sacrament. And if they thought him not present, they are so far from worshipping the bread, that they profess it idolatry to do so. This is demonstration that the soul has nothing in it that is idololatrical; the will has nothing in it but what is a great enemy to idolatry." Dr. Milner gives this as Bishop Taylor's own reasoning, HIS OWN demonstration that it is not idolatry to worship the host. But Bishop Milner treated Taylor much as Mr. French has done: he, too, cut out of the middle of the passage these words—"If their confidence and fanciful opinion hath engaged them upon so great a mistake, as without doubt it hath. . . ."

But Bishop Milner must have known well, that in that very chapter Bishop Taylor had protested that he was not going "to consider the truth or falsity of the doctrines," but only whether the men who hold such doctrines should be tolerated or persecuted in a Protestant state. To excuse the men as much as he could, in order to gain toleration and safety for them, Bishop Taylor stated their own arguments, to move Protestants to pity, not to persecute, those who were deceived by such arguments. And Bishop Milner was not ashamed to represent these arguments as Bishop Taylor's own reasoning on the matter!

But we have Bishop Taylor's own answer to such quotations from this book. He published a second edition of it in his "Polemical Discourses," in 1657, ten years after its first publication, and in the preface of that late edition he says—"If any one made ill use of it, it was more than I allowed or intended to him; but so all kindness may be abused: but if a criminal be allowed counsel, he would be scorned if he should avow his advocate as the real patron of his crime, when he only says what he can to alleviate the sentence." This is Bishop Taylor's own answer to those who quote his book as Dr. Milner, Mr. French, and the nameless writer who deceived "W. C. Search" have done!

But even this was not enough. About the year 1664, a Roman Catholic controversialist, John Sergeant, tried again to use this book of Bishop Taylor's in the same way, and Bishop Taylor answered him thus, in the introduction to the second part of his "Dissuasive from Popery"—

"There are some of your propositions for which there is no probable reason or fair pretence in the world: nothing that can handsomely or ingeniously deceive a man; such as is your half communion, worship of images, prayers not understood, and some others . . . But it seems 'J. S.' knows my mind for this; and in my 'Liberty of Prophesying' my own words (he says) will, 'beyond all confute, evince it, that they have probabilities, and those strong ones too.' But now, in my conscience, this was unkindly done, that when I had spoken for them what I could, and more than I knew that they had ever said for themselves, and yet to save them harmless from the iron hand of a tyrant and unreasonable power,* to keep them from being persecuted for their errors and opinions, that they should take the arms I had lent them for their defence, and throw them at my head! But the best of it is, though 'J. S.' be unthankful, yet the weapons themselves are but wooden daggers, intended only to represent how the poor men are cozened by themselves; and that, under fair and fraudulent pretences, even pious, well-meaning men, and men wise enough in other things, may be abused; and though what I said was but tinsel and pretence, imagery and whipt cream, yet I could not be blamed to use no better than the best their cause would bear: and yet, if that be the best they have to say for themselves, their probabilities will soon be outbalanced by one Scripture testimony urged by Protestants, and 'thou shalt not worship any graven image' will outweigh all the best and fairest imaginations of their Church. . . . . 'J. S.' might, if he pleased, have considered that I did not intend to make that harangue to represent that the Roman religion had probabilities of being true, but probabilities that the religion might be tolerated."

We leave it to our readers now to judge—1st, of the honesty of those who quote Bishop Taylor in support of Romanism; 2nd, how hard it must be to find arguments in its favour, when its defenders have to go to Bishop Taylor for them, and have to use such arts to try and represent him as speaking in its favour; and, 3rd, what hope they can entertain of being guided into truth by those that use falsehood and fraud to keep men in the religion of the Church of Rome.

Editor—If any of our friends do not understand the above, upon the first reading, we advise them to look it over again carefully; and if they be not thereby edified, let them then consult St. Paul's 1st Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. xiv., in some known tongue, for a satisfactory explanation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The letter of Mr. Power is in type, but our want of space and its great length oblige us to postpone it. We would earnestly request our valued correspondents, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, to limit the length of their communications, which would not only prevent disappointment to themselves, but greatly increase the facility of insertion in a periodical so limited in space as the Catholic Layman. We would suggest that a variety of distinct topics should not be discussed in one letter, if the object be to facilitate discussion and really elicit truth.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER, 1852.

We beg to inform our readers that it is our intention, at the close of the year, to supply such of them as have preserved the Catholic Layman with a neat title-page and index for the year 1852, free of expense. A few back numbers, to complete sets, may still be had, on application to the publisher; price threepence each.

Among the many proofs afforded by the last few years of the extent to which religious inquiry has seized upon the minds of the present generation, perhaps there is none stronger than the movement that has grown up in Northern Italy for ecclesiastical reformation. Hitherto a certain degree of silence has been observed with reference to it, we presume because it was thought unadvisable to excite hostility by a premature disclosure of the extent to which that movement had gone. But as the "Univers," the paper which, in France, is the recognised organ of Ultramontanism, has, in a recent article, called the attention of its readers to the subject, there can be no longer any object in withholding from our readers the facts which have come to our knowledge.

Some years ago, we understand, a few clerical students, at an Italian university, devoted themselves, earnestly and diligently, to the study of the Bible. Afterwards, having entered upon their duties as priests of the Roman Catholic Church, they drew their teachings solely from the Holy Scripture, and passed by, in silence, those pretended traditions which could not be traced to the primitive Church, by which men had corrupted its holy precepts. Their preaching soon won its way to the hearts of their Italian congregations, and filled to overflowing the churches in which their ministry was exercised. Soon other priests in their neighbourhood began to inquire by what charm these young men had succeeded in attracting such large congregations; and finding that the wonderful spell employed was the simple preaching of the Gospel, as taken from the Holy Scriptures, they were induced first to listen, then to study, and at length to pursue the same course themselves. Gradually the circle widened, and a movement, which had commenced with two or three, now comprised hundreds. Impressed deeply with the difficulties of their position—feeling strongly that all great changes, to be healthy and enduring, should proceed from within rather than from without—these men have worked diligently for some years to spread around them the knowledge of true religion, and in this manner to prepare the minds of their flocks for the rejection of those innovations which the Church of Rome has so largely introduced. Believing that so long as they were permitted to preach the pure Gospel to their people, they might conscientiously retain their position as ministers of the church in which they had been brought up, they have not renounced communion with the Church of Rome, and still indulge the hope that the spread of the knowledge of the truth will lead all to join heartily in that reformation which they are so anxious to effect. It was under these circumstances that they sent over one of their number to London, for the purpose of consultation with members of the Church of England. To that application it appears that the following reply has been made:—

"To the most honourable Priests and Deacons of the Catholic Church of Lombardy and Venice, followers of the most pure doctrine of Holy Writ, and of the ancient Fathers, some priests of the Reformed Anglican Church, greeting in Christ:

"Our soul was filled with unspeakable joy when we learned, both from your letters, which your interpreter and friend, our honourable colleague, the Abbe Cassiano di Col, professor of theology, gave us to read, as also from his own lips, what progress the restoration of the Catholic doctrine had made amongst you. The principal and continual object of all our thoughts is to lead back the minds of men to the Holy Scriptures and to the customs of the most ancient churches. This is why we deem it of the highest importance that there should be elsewhere distinguished personages, whose sentiments coincide with our own on this point, and whose desires and labours should be consecrated to do that which our ancestors believed, willed, and performed three centuries since. We are convinced that it is by divine inspiration that, without aid from without, without having received our counsel, without any participation on our part, without our even being aware of it, you have spontaneously entered into the same path of salvation as ourselves, professing, like us, veneration for the Scriptures, respect for the Catholic Fathers, and moderation in the work undertaken, to renew the state of the church, discipline, and faith.

"Not to make our letter unnecessarily long, we shall content ourselves with pointing our three pricipal things which demonstate how perfectly united we are with you in the same sentiments (sampsukoito euphronountes).

"We believe, then, what you confess yourselves—

"1. That the best interpreter, in the explanation of the Holy Scriptures, is the primitive church, which faithfully extracted the Catholic Church from the canonical books of the Old and New Testament, and which has defined and consecrated, for the perpetual use of the faithful, the rule of faith in the three symbols of the Apostles, of Nicea, and Athanasia.

"2. Secondly, as regards the performance of Divine worship and the sacred rituals, we believe that the diverse churches, offsprings of the universal Church, ought one and all to study the most ancient liturgies, and, after purging them of all the errors which the lapse of time might have introduced, after abolishing the useless ceremonies, and having re-established all the practices of the primitive worship, appropriate, without delay, those liturgies to the usages of our time, and put them in every country into a vulgar tongue.

"3. Finally, we believe that every rightly constituted church has always preserved three orders of ordained ministers—bishops, priests, and deacons; and that these three orders, descending from the Apostles themselves in uninterruped series, have always been, by Divine goodness, transmitted and continued in the midst of the faithful.

"This is why, most reverend sirs, we entertain an ardent desire to behold always maintained between the evangelical truth and the apostolic institutions that concord, that harmony of tendencies, which founded the Anglican Churches and caused them to flourish. May it please the most merciful God to ordain that you may renew the primitive purity in such guise, that love of innovation may not take root in the republic, and that there may not be seen in the Church schismatics, heresiarchs, rationalists, nor atheists. Follow the doctrine, the worship, and the government (politeia) of the primitive Church, in such manner as not to give any just grounds of suspicion to the civil magistrates nor to the people any occasion of creating disorder. Should it ever come to pass that Northern Italy, that land so fruitful so rich, so illustrious in intellectual works, in works of art, and in works of piety, in which respect it is surpassed by no other country—if it should ever come to pass that, mindful of its ancient glory, and extirpating the two weeds which have grown up in pseudo-Catholic Rome—superstition and infidelity—it should return fully to the Gospel of Christ, oh! then, what joy for the only Church, yours and ours!

Upon this letter The Univers thus comments—

"It is not long since that the actually reigning Sovereign Pontiff gave serious warnings to Italy respecting the underhand efforts made by heterodoxy to establish itself among us, and thereby to deprive us of the unity of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman faith, perhaps the only blessing, but certainly the greatest, which remains to us. The most clear-sighted of our Pontiffs have, on various occasions, repeated those same warnings, and have endeavoured to point out their great importance. Some honest-minded men, however, would only behold in them the effects of a panic; and on their side, the seducers, in their perfidious hypocrisy, made them the objects of their calumnies, and have represented them as dictated by a cunning knavery. Numerous facts, nevertheless, bring with them daily the conviction that those fears are but too well founded, and assuredly the one most worthy of attention is that revealed by the document of which we subjoin the tenor. It will be seen that, among the most distinguished members of one of the most remarkable and edifying clergies of Italy, there are some who have endeavoured to establish relations with an assembly of Anglican dignitaries, and who receive the communications of that society with a view to operate a religious reform in Italy similar to that affected in England three centuries since. Can anything be more clear or peremptory? At the foot of this document, accompanied with their Christian names and titles, are affixed the names of those who thus offer a hand to the Italians to aid them in this pious work. As regards the names of those to whom it is addressed, they are inscribed in a book in which we are not allowed to read. But the names of the apostates, and of those who betray the faith, will resound in a terrible manner at the day of judgment.

"We have the certitude that this document is authentic, and yet we hesitated about making it public. After mature reflection we decided to do so. It is never useless to convince of the reality of danger those who are exposed to be its victims, those who are to be put upon their guard, and especially those whose duty it is to take efficacious steps to obviate it. On the other hand, it must not be thought that such measures are taken without urgent necessity, and it is, therefore, of importance to make known the facts which modify and justify them. And we are of the opinion that there is nothing better suited to attain that object than the publication of a document which enables us to place our finger, as it were, upon the danger which threatens us, and which is much nearer to us than many too confident persons are willing to believe."

In the above document, and bitter comment of the Univers upon it, we have a striking and satisfactory evidence of the extent and importance of this Italian movement; and may we not hope, that if not stayed by the interference of the temporal power, ere long a truly national reformed Italian Church may arise, retaining in its organization, in its ritual, and in its discipline those distinctive characteristics which suit the warm and impassioned inhabitants of a southern clime; drawing its doctrines and its teaching, pure and unadulterated, from the living fountain of God's Word, and leaving for ever the broken cisterns of man's creation? With such a church we could, indeed, unite in the bonds of brotherhood. And there may then be that real unity among Christian Churches, for attainment of which so many have sighed in vain; not such a forced unity as that of Rome, which, as in the monstrous productions of nature, binds the living to the dead; but that unity which arises from a common faith and a common object—a unity which finds its strongest bond in the pursuit of the same object, through diversity of means. It is such an union as this that might exist between us and a reformed Italian Church. And if such were established, although unwilling to mix up any mere political speculation with such a subject, we may be excused if we add the hope, that the establishment of a reformed National Church would be but the forerunner of the re-admission of Italy, free and united within itself, into the great brotherhood of independent nations.

We are sure our readers will cordially respond to the sentiments contained in the letter of Mr. Leyne to Sergeant Shee, which we reprint, as an act of justice to the character and feelings of the educated Roman Catholics of Ireland. The case referred to is that of Francesco and Rosa Madiai, at Florence, which has excited so much public attention, and appears to have been simply as follows:—

They are husband and wife, and, though of irreproachable character, were arrested on the 17th of August, 1851, on the charge of being Protestants, and, as such, reading the Bible, and endeavouring to induce others to do the same; and the charge was summed up by accusing them of impiety and proselytism. On these charges they were at length brought to trial, on the 4th of June, 1852 (having been detained in prison, unheard, during the whole of the intervening period), and were found guilty of having read the Scriptures, and of worshipping God in a way not prescribed by the Church of Rome. There was no suspicion or imputation of moral or political criminality attaching to the case. The public prosecutor frankly declared at the trial that there was no such accusation whatever, and that the prosecution was wholly and avowedly for their opposition to the religion of the Established Church of Tuscany. Upon this charge the Madiais were condemned by the Corte Regia of Florence, the husband to 56 months of imprisonment with hard labour, at Volterra, and the wife, to 45 months' imprisonment, with three years more of police surveillance. And this sentence, on appeal, was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Florence.

Mr. Leyne's spirited letter is as follows:—

"TO SERGEANT SHEE, M.P.

"Upper Buckingham-street, Dublin,

"October 29, 1852.

"SIR,—I ask permission to address you a few words in reference to an occurrence which took place at the Catholic Conference in the Rotundo on yesterday.

"I was present on a ticket furnished to me as a member of the public press, and, therefore, could take no part in the discussion of any topic brought before the conference, else I should have yielded to my desire to remark upon the allusion you made to the case of the Madiai.

"As a Catholic and an Irishman, I was delighted at your bold and vehement denunciation of the barbarous tyranny of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. I was glad that at this moment, and in that Catholic assembly, one Irish representative had the manliness and honesty to express sentiments so just and noble.

"It is, indeed, an abominable and impious doctrine that men are to be imprisoned for religious opinions, and chastised for maintaining any form of doctrine, or for reading any work bearing on religious questions. But the notion that it is a crime for any man to read the Word of God in his private house is a theory so false, foul, and unholy, that one can only wonder how it can gain supporters amongst the followers of any religion who have for three centuries battled against persecutions and proscription of the exact nature of the oppression you denounced. The Catholics of Ireland hold no such intolerant faith.

"It surely was not a greater tyranny for the British Government to prohibit the exercise of the Catholic faith in Ireland than for this black despot of the South to forbid his subjects the privilege of reading the Scriptures in their homes for their own private edification. The old penal laws form an exact precedent for the intolerant Cour Royale of Florence.

"It has been argued, I understand, in justification of the conduct of the Duke of Tuscany, that, as a Catholic Sovereign, he had a perfect right to prevent the circulation of the particular book for the perusal of which the Madiai have been subjected to penalties. I know not whether this teaching be a heresy, but it is a startling and monstrous dogma—one which would justify, in an extended application, the bloody propagandism of Mahomet or of Cromwell, and strip conscience of all privilege and volition. As a Catholic I refuse to swallow it. If a Catholic rob me, I hand him over to justice—if he assault me, I will defend myself. If a Catholic prince use despotic power and trample upon a people, are we to be told that the church will sanction the tyranny because the aggressor is a Catholic? Sir, it is a libel on Catholic truth, and a disgrace to people to have such abominable tenets paraded as the teaching of the church.

"Believe it, sir, that the genuine opinion of every man in Ireland who loves liberty, political and religious, goes with you upon this question.

"No statement of this case that has been brought before the public disproves the fact you represented.

"And I trust in God that, as long as Ireland is Catholic, we shall ever steadily hate the odious doctrines which justify religious persecution, and that men shall be found honest and courageous enough to condemn the acts of the tyrant, whether Catholic or Protestant, and to express sympathy with his victims.

"I have the honour to be, sir, your faithful servant,

"M. R. LEYNE."

(From the Cork Southern Reporter.)

"Every friend of liberty will read with pleasure the manly, energetic speech of Sergeant Shee. His noble denunciation of the outrageous violation of the principle of civil and religious liberty, in the case of the Madiais, will find an echo in the hearts of all who love freedom and hate oppression. It was absolutely necessary that some person in the Conference should, on the part of the Catholics of Ireland, proclaim to the world their detestation of the tyranny perpetrated at Florence in the name of religion. Sergeant Shee did the thing at the right time and in the right way. Though the editor of the Tablet had the baseness to stand up in an assembly met to promote religious equality, and defend the crime of the Tuscan Government, no one can charge the Catholics of Ireland with participating in his odious opinions. He stands alone. We could almost wish to see him in some country where his own principle of toleration could be applied to himself. This man is doing all he can, and very effectually too, to bring the Catholics of Ireland into discredit and disgrace."

Correspondence.

THE SILENCE OF SCRIPTURE RESPECTING THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

SIR—Your correspondent, "One who loves to hear the Truth," is surprised that you should have published an article showing how little the Bible tells us of the "life of the Blessed Virgin." He admits that a fact so notorious as the silence of Scripture about the Blessed Virgin has engaged the attention of learned Roman Catholics, and that they have accounted for it. Your correspondent's words are remarkable—"The Scriptures, you (Mr. Editor) say, tell us little or nothing about the Blessed Virgin Mary; they are wholly silent about her from the time of our Lord's ascension. Quite true, sir; but learned Roman Catholics have noticed that fact as well as you, and accounted for it," &c., &c. He then quotes several passages from Roman Catholic writers, which entirely bear out his assertion, that the Scriptures really do say little or nothing of the Blessed Virgin Mary. With this conclusion neither you (Mr. Editor) nor I are prepared to combat. But, unfortunately, on this, as on many other questions, amongst Romanists themselves, opinions are divided. I do not recognise among the list furnished by your correspondent any canonized saint or Pope. St. Bonaventure, a canonized saint, who holds a prominent place in the Romish calendar, writes—"Omnes scripturæ loquuntur de ea."—Serm. 13 in Hex. This passage I find quoted with the greatest approbation in Saint Liguori's "Glories of Mary"—thus "the whole of the Sacred Scriptures speak in praise of Mary." The words "in praise" are our interpretation; the original passage as given by Bonaventure, is inserted in a note at foot of the page. Now, the authority of Liguori is undoubted. We know that all his works, and the "Glories of Mary" in particular, underwent twenty years' strict examination by the most competent authorities of the Church of Rome, being the "Secret Congregation of Rights," of which the Pope is president. They unanimously declared that not one word of his writings was worthy of censure. According to Saints Bonaventure and Liguori, the Pope, and all the sacred college, "the whole of the Sacred Scriptures speak of her"—plain contradiction to the assertion of the authorities quoted by your correspondent.

The edition of Liguori from which I quote is, or ought to be, of the very greatest authority; it is the only edition which bears the signature of authority; the date is 1852, and purported to be "printed for the Redemptorist Fathers of St. Mary's, Clapham" (p. 6); and CARDINAL WISEMAN thus recognises this edition—"We hereby approve of this translation of the 'Glories of Mary,' and cordially recommend it to the faithful. Nicholas, Cardinal Wiseman, Archbishop of Westminster, given at Westminster, on the Feast of St. Alphonsus de Liguori, 1852."

I now leave your correspondent to reconcile as he best may these contradictory statements.

I am, sir,

Your most obedient servant,

October 19, 1852. C. H. COLLETTE.

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Allow me to correct a mistake which you have made in your last number, page 109, where you say that "the dogma of the immaculate conception has been at length declared, by the successor of St. Peter, to be an article of faith." This is not the case. You were probably deceived by the facts, that the church observes a festival in honour of the immaculate conception, and that she makes mention of it in her prayers; and also, that the present Pope has taken into consideration the propriety of affirming the doctrine more solemnly. But, as far as I am aware, he has not yet done so, and the doctrine is but matter of pious belief, and is not yet an article of faith. It is, perhaps, natural that you Protestants should be careless in this matter; but a Catholic knows that it is extremely important to be accurate in observing the time when any doctrine becomes an article of faith; for, previous to that time, it may be doubted or denied without mortal sin. We all know for example, that St. Bernard is now a saint in heaven, although he opposed this very doctrine of the immaculate conception; but any one who shall deny it after it has once been made an article of faith by the successor of St. Peter would, no doubt, be guilty of damnable sin.

I am, Sir, &c.,

A LOVER OF ACCURACY.

We cheerfully insert this letter, as we have always promised to insert any corrections of misstatements which we may inadvertently have made. The sentence for which our correspondent takes us to task was, perhaps, incautiously worded; but if he will turn to p. 23, he will find that we have proved that, even though the doctrine be not yet formally declared an article of faith, the authorities of the Church of Rome have practically made it de fide to a large and increasing body in the communion, by sanctioning the festival and office of the immaculate conception.

We have no space here to discuss the question whether the church can make any doctrine now an article of faith which was not always so. According to the Roman theory, it would seem as if certain parts of the road to heaven got choked up in the course of ages, and as if the church is obliged occasionally to post "no thoroughfare" on the paths by which saints of old made their way to glory. We believe that it cannot be so necessary to our salvation to believe any doctrines of which the Christians of the first centuries were ignorant, or which they did not know that they were bound to believe. But, as we have said, we cannot discuss this question here.

ALLEGED LOST BOOKS OF SCRIPTURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As a constant reader of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, I think it strange that a Roman Catholic "Inquirer" would make so strange a statement as to say that there are twenty books of the Holy Scripture lost. He even surpassed the great Roman Catholic luminary, Doctor Cahill, who could tell the people of Liverpool, in June last, of only seventeen lost books (See M'Cabe's Telegraph, 12th June last). I believe, had the doctor read the last number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN before he delivered his speech, the number would have been still smaller; but I am still astonished that Dr. Cahill and the "Inquirer," Celbridge, men of no small knowledge, would be so little acquainted with the Douay Bible, &c.; for they say that the following books are lost: That of Samuel, Nathan, Gad, Ahias, Iddo, Jeremias, and Jehu, &c. But I would ask them who wrote the book of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles? I do not know what might be their answer, but I know the answer that the Douay annotators give. See the preface to the 1st Book of Samuel, 1st Book of Kings, and the 1st Book of Chronicles, Douay Bible, which explicitly show that these books were not written at one time, nor by one man, but refer to the above-named prophets as being the writers. It is true, the preface to the 1st Book of Chronicles says that the present Books of Chronicles are not the ancient Chronicles, or words of the days, &c.; but the writer has to acknowledge, at the end, that they are the same books, only revised and abridged by Ezra. Now, Ezra is the acknowledged arranger of the canon of Scripture (i.e., the Old Testament)—an opinion which the Jews have always maintained, and in which the Christian Church has universally concurred. Dr. Prideaux, Dean of Norwich, gives a full and learned account of the work which Ezra is admitted to have performed. "Ezra," says the doctor, "corrected all the errors which had crept into previous copies, through the negligence or mistake of transcribers; he collected together all the books of which the Holy Scriptures then consisted, and disposed them in proper order, settling the canon of Scriptures for his time; he added, in several places throughout the various books, what appeared necessary for illustrating, connecting, or completing them, wherein he was assisted by the same Holy Spirit by whose influence they were at first written. He changed the old names of places, grown obsolete," &c. So I believe the Books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles were divided into sections, before Ezra's revision, every section or part, each part bearing the writer's name; in proof of which I would refer the "Inquirer" to the first Book of Samuel. There we are told that Samuel is the writer as far as the 25th chapter, &c.; so it is reasonable to believe that Ezra, in his revision, would leave out those names, and unite the sections into consistent volumes, &c., to the end that they might be the better preserved, for the "grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the Word of our God shall stand for ever."—Isaiah xl. 8. Again, "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass than one tittle of the law to fail or fall."—Luke xvi. 17. I would sincerely hope that the "Inquirer" would meditate over these things, and charitably consider the whole matter; and I firmly believe that he will come to the same conclusion as his well-wishing and humble friend in Christ.

A CONVERT FROM THE CHURCH OF ROME, AND A LAYMAN. C—Y.

THE LETTER OF "AN INQUIRER."

That the traditions of the Church, then, as well as the written Word of God, are to be accredited, appears to me by the following:—

That our Lord attached importance to the writings of the prophets is clear from Luke xvi. 31—"And he said to them, if they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe if one rise again from the dead;" and, xxv. 27—"And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded to them in all the Scriptures the things that were concerning him." Now, our Lord, in expounding to his Apostles all the prophets, must have included those prophetical writings not now extant. That the Apostles could not have taught their disciples (and successors) any other doctrines than those received by them; and that, by perpetual succession of lawful pastors, these doctrines—traditions—could not be vitiated by the church, and, therefore, to be received by us with equal reverence as the now written Word of God, I shall endeavour to show as far as I can. It will be evident, from the following texts, that the church could not err in what she taught and teaches (I, of course, argue not for her in secular infallibility); and, hence, that she must be infallible; and if so, how reject her traditions?

1st Thess. ii. 13—"When ye received the word of God, which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but (as it really is) the word of God;" therefore a very fit Rule of Faith, even before it was written? Rom. xvi. 17—"Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which you have learned;" where as yet he had written nothing to the Galatians, for where is any such writing? St. Paul also says (Gal. i 6)—"I marvel that so soon you are removed from him who called you into the Grace of Christ unto another gospel"—removed, I say from the faith I delivered, which was true, though not a written gospel; and, in verse 8 he says—"Although we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that you ye have received let him be accursed." The Galatians received at the time nothing in writing; they had all by oral tradition, and yet in verse 9 he says, more vehemently—"As we have said before, so I say now again, if any man preach any other gospel unto you than that you have received, be he accursed." But how, it may be asked, do we know that the traditions which we have now are apostolical? (I make no distinction between divine and apostolical tradition.) I answer, that a true Apostolical tradition is handed down by a full unanimous report of all Catholic nations, attested by their universal practice and uniform doctrine. What is thus delivered is the doctrine of the church diffused, and therefore infallible. Upon this ground alone you and we receive such and such Scripture as canonical, and such and such copies of the Scripture as authentic. The churches unity of doctrine all over the world goes also far to prove the infallible source whence she derived her traditions. How explicit are these texts! Psal. lxxxix. 4—"I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn to David, my servant, thy seed will I establish for ever, and I will build up my throne to all generations." All which is verified in Christ only, who, in his church (Luke i. 32) "hath given him the seat of David, his father, and he shall reign in the house of Jacob for ever and of his kingdom there shall be no end." What a promise of everlasting perpetuity to his church! And, lest anyone should think that his promise might be made void by any sins of hers, or to be made only on condition of their walking in his commandments, we find in the same Psalm, 27, 37—"And I will put him, the first begotten, high above the kings of the earth; I will keep my mercy unto him for ever, and my testament faithful unto him. I will put his seed for ever and ever, and his throne as the days of heaven. But if his children shall forsake my law (this cannot possibly be of the elect), and will not walk in my judgments; if they will profane my justices, and not keep my commandments, I will visit their iniquities with a rod, and their sins with stripes." He does not threaten that he would allow them to fall into doctrinal error; but "my loving kindness I will not take away from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break, nor the thing which is gone out of my lips. Once have I sworn in my holiness, if I lie to David, his seed shall continue for ever, and his throne as the sun in my sight, and as the moon perfect for ever." Observe how perfect the church was to be preserved, and, consequently, incapable of error! The above promises were made of Christ, "the son of David, the son of Abraham."—Matt. i. 1.

Isaiah is full to this purpose. Chap. xlix., 14, 16—"And Zion said, our Lord hath forsaken me, and our Lord hath forgotten me. Why can a woman forget her infant, that she will not have pity on the son of her womb? And if she should forget, yet I will not forget thee. Behold I have written thee in my hands." And liv. 9, 12—"As in the days of Noah is this thing to me, to whom I swore I would bring in no more the waters of Noah upon the earth: so have I sworn not to be angry with thee, nor to rebuke thee. For the mountains shall (sooner) be moved, and hills tremble; but my mercy shall not depart from thee, and the covenant of my peace shall not be moved, said our Lord, thy miserator. Poor little one, shaken with tempest, without all comfort, behold I will lay thy stones in order (to withstand any tempest), and will found thee in sapphires, and I will put the jaspar stone for thy munitions." And, again, lv., 15—"I will make thee the pride of worlds, a joy unto generation and generation." That the church would be made the pride of worlds, &c., and allow error to creep into it, would be incompatible with the foregoing word of God. "Iniquity shall be no more heard in thy land, waste and destruction in thy borders, and salvation shall occupy thy walls, and praise thy gates." What more salutary than to be confident of the church in which salvation is certain? Verse 20—"Thy sun shall go down no more, and thy moon shall not be diminished, because the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended." How could the church have dark ages (when error is said to have crept into it) while the Lord himself promised to be to her an everlasting light? Here infallibility, therefore, is proved from Scripture, as clearly as a mathematical proposition whose solution is indirectly obtained.

To multiply more proofs I think is unnecessary: a few more, however, and I have done. Is. lxii. 3, 6—"Thou shalt be a crown of glory in the hand of our Lord, and the diadem of a kingdom in the hand of thy God. Upon thy walls, Jerusalem, I have placed watchmen all the day and all the night; for ever they shall not hold their peace." What clearer proof of the visibility of the church, in her watchman and pastors; and v. 12—"Thou shalt be a city sought for and not forsaken." How forsaken would God's church be if he allowed her to teach error! Again, Jer. xxxiii. 17, 18—"There shall not fail David a man to sit on the throne of Israel, and of the priests and Levites, there shall not fail before my face a man to offer holocausts, and to burn sacrifices, and to kill victims all days." Behold, a succession of lawful priests still offering sacrifices—expressed by the priests and sacrifices as were then only known; and "If my covenant with the day can be made void with David my servant, that there may not be of him a son (a vicar or vicegerent) to reign in his throne, and the Levites and priests my ministers." Yea, v. 22—"Even as the stars in heaven cannot be numbered, and the sand of the sea be measured, so will I multiply the seed of David, my servant, and the Levites my ministers." The church is above shown to be visible, and governed in perpetual succession by lawful pastors; here, a son (or vicar) to reign in David's throne. Why, then, refuse to admit the visible head of the church to be Christ's vicar on earth? And how vast Christ's Church when compared to the "stars in the heaven," and the grains of "sand of the sea!" This passage does not countenance that the Church of Christ could be "a small fold," as the Vaudois Church must have been, at least in my opinion.

The points at issue being fundamental ones, you will pardon me if I go a little farther; indeed, my letter has already extended beyond what I first imagined. I will, therefore, draw to as speedy a close as possible. We find Dan. ii. 44, "In the days of those kingdoms the God of heaven shall raise us a kingdom that shall not be dissipated for ever; and this kingdom shall not be delivered to another people, and it shall consume all the (idolatrous) kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever in the quality of a kingdom." How, unless having a VISIBLE HEAD? To govern this kingdom (the church) "He gave some apostles, some prophets, and other some pastors and doctors," &c., until we meet all in the unity of faith, which will not be till the world's end.—Ephes. iv. 11.

How can we doubt the truth of the doctrines by those taught, when in addition to this passage, our Lord himself saith to his apostles (Matth. xxxiii., 20)—"Behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world?" As the Apostles were not to live to the end of the world, it is evident that Christ meant both them and their lawful successors. Therefore, a lawful succession of pastors must needs, in all ages, to the end of time, be found in the church, at least without any considerable interruption, as the foregoing texts also fully prove.

In what other than the ROMAN CHURCH, then, is this perpetual succession found? This visible head we designate by the name of Pope—a significant name when its etymology is ascertained to mean "Father."

One text more, and I conclude for the present. That God seems to glory in the multitude of those who confidently resort to the church, as a mistress of assured truth, to be instructed by her, Isaias says (ii. 3.)—"Let us go to the mountain of our Lord, and he will teach us his ways, and we shall walk in his paths, and he shall judge among the nations." Here is a court or tribunal erected in his church to decide controversies. Whose decision is final unless that of a judge?

On all these texts I leave you, sir, and the public to decide; and again requesting that you will not look on this as emanating from me in any other than the most friendly feeling,

I remain, sir, yours, &c.,
AN INQUIRER.

Celbridge, June 24, 1852.

If the Celbridge "Inquirer" had read more carefully what we have written about tradition and Scripture, he might have left out some of his letter.

In our article on the "Rule of Faith," in our number for June, on which the "Inquirer" comments, we said—"We know perfectly well that a doctrine is in itself neither more nor less the Word of God for being written or unwritten. We are fully aware that the doctrines now contained in Scripture were for some time unwritten traditions. We are, consequently, quite prepared to receive as authoritative and obligatory any unwritten tradition, provided it can be shown, by unquestionable proof, to be derived from an inspired origin."

We do not see how it is any answer to this to bring forward 1 Thes., c. 2, v. 13, and many other passages of Scripture, to prove that what inspired Apostles spoke was of as great authority as what they wrote. That, surely, is no proof against what we have said.

What we want to know is this—Are we sure that what the Pope and the Roman Church say now was said by the Apostles? We do not insist on its being shown to us that the Apostles wrote it. If any one can show us that they said it, that will be enough for the argument in hand. What we want is proof of the fact that they said it; we do not want proof that their saying it was as good as their writing it; though even on that point we may have something to say hereafter. For instance, take this article of the Creed of Pope Pius IV.:—"I confess that under one kind only (i.e., bread or wine alone) whole and entire Christ, and a true Sacrament, is taken and received." We know that the Pope, and the Council of Trent, and the modern Roman Church do say this. WE KNOW, also, that the Roman Church, for 1200 years, did not say it (see our June number, page 63). We want to know, "Is this an apostolical tradition?" Can any one give us proof that the Apostles said this? We do not ask for proof that they wrote it; we know they did not write it. But if any one can prove to us that they said it, we are willing to admit that it is true. If no one can give us that proof, we will not believe it.

Is it any answer to this to tell us that what the Apostles said is as good as what they wrote? Admitting that, we ask for proof that they did say this; and no one attempts to give us such proof. This is the actual state of the question.

The only proof that the "Inquirer" offers is taken from some of the prophecies, Psalm lxxxix. 4, and Luke i. 32. On these, the "Inquirer" observes—"What a promise of everlasting perpetuity to his church!" Now, we believe in the everlasting perpetuity of Christ's Church. But this is not the question between us and the "Inquirer." We trust the Church of Christ may be perpetual, although the Bishop of Rome, and some other Italian and Spanish bishops, may have fallen into errors at Trent. There was once a church in Africa, the church of Augustine and Optatus, containing, perhaps, 2,000 bishops. That church has ceased to exist centuries ago. Yet; Christ's Church is perpetual. Were all Italy and Spain to become Mahomedan or heathen, like Africa, surely Christ would still have a church on earth. And if the total destruction of the Italian Church would not destroy the perpetuity of Christ's Church, much less can her errors do so.

The "Inquirer" quotes, also, Psalm lxxxviii. 31, Douay Bible ("Inquirer's" reference is not correct)—"If his children shall forsake my law, and will not walk in my judgments—if they will profane my justices, and not keep my commandments, I will visit their iniquities with a rod, and their sins with stripes." Does this prove that they cannot forsake his law, or depart from his commandments? It seems to us rather to prove that they can. Will the "Inquirer," or any one else, say that the Popes have never departed from God's law, or refused to walk in his judgments? If any one will venture to say this, we will answer him by printing some extracts from Cardinal Baronius, the most approved historian of the Church of Rome.

Our "Inquirer" relies very much on the prophecies of Isaiah. We will not follow him into all his passages. We ask for proof that these prophecies were intended to apply to the church in her present state. We know that the Church of Christ is to exist hereafter in a glorified and triumphant state. We know that there are many prophecies which describe her as she shall be in that state. But the "Inquirer" seems to forget this entirely; and every prophecy which he finds about her he applies to the church in its present state, without considering to what state it was intended to apply.

He quotes Isaiah liv. He does not quote verse 7—"For a small moment have I forsaken thee, but with great mercies will I gather thee." With God 1000 years are but as a day, and it is no more, in comparison of the eternal destiny of his church. Will "Inquirer" say that the church cannot err, during the time, long or short, of which this verse speaks? He quotes verse 12—"I will lay thy stones in order, and found thee in sapphires, and I will put the jasper stone for thy munitions." We ask him to compare this with Apocalypse, or Revelation, ch. xxi., v. 19, &c., and consider to what state of the church this prophecy is to be applied.

Again, he quotes Isaiah, ch. lx., v. 18, as describing the present state of the Church of Rome—"INIQUITY shall be no more heard in thy land, waste and destruction in thy borders; and salvation shall occupy thy walls, and praise thy gates."

Is Rome without iniquity? Have her own historians never said that many successive Popes were monsters of iniquity, who filled her city and her land with their crimes? and was this the time of which the prophet said —"Iniquity shall be no more heard in thy land?" Or was there no waste or destruction in her borders, when, but two years ago, Rome was besieged and taken by a French army?

Does not "An Inquirer" see that if these prophecies were indeed spoken of the Church of Rome, in her present state, they prove that she is without sin, as well as without error? If these prophecies prove that the Pope cannot err, they prove also that he cannot sin. We believe all Roman Catholics will admit that he can sin, like other men; and in admitting this they admit that these prophecies are not spoken of him.

Again, he applies verse 20 to the Roman Church in her present state—"Thy sun shall go down no more, and thy moon shall not be diminished, because the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

The whole of this verse evidently applies to one and the same time, whenever that time shall be. Do the last words refer to the present or a future time?

We answer this from two encyclical letters, one published by Pope Gregory XVI., in 1832—"We come now to another most abundant source of evils, with which we grieve to see the church afflicted;" the other, that of Pope Pius IX., dated 21st November, 1851, announcing the new Jubilee—"In the midst of the incessant and painful solicitudes with which the calamity of the times overwhelms us, ... it is for us no slight subject of sorrow to behold what a sad and lamentable spectacle is presented by our holy religion, and civil society, in those calamitous times." Does the Pope grieve thus over the church in that time of which the prophet said, "the days of thy mourning shall be ended?"

We think not; we think that these are the days of mourning, and so thought Pope Gregory XVI., and we see from the above that Pope Pius IX. thinks so too. And so we take it for certain that these prophecies relate to a future, and not to the present state of the church. And comparing this verse of Isaiah with Apocalypse, or Revelation, ch. xxi., v. 23, we find that this prophecy is to be accomplished in the New Jerusalem; and we find, from v. 4, that the time shall be when "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and death shall be no more, nor mourning, nor crying, nor sorrow shall be any more, for the former things are passed away."

Sad would it be, indeed, for the Church of God, if she could hope for no better fulfilment of these glorious prophecies than what can be found in the present condition of the Church of Rome.

The "Inquirer" seems to apply to the priests of the Roman Church, Jeremiah xxxiii. 18—"To kill victims all days." Will he tell us what victims they KILL? If they kill none, what claim have they to this prophecy more than we?

He asks why we will refuse to admit the Pope to be Christ's vicar on earth, when Jeremiah, in the place referred to above, says, that David shall never be without "a son (a vicar or vicegerent) to reign in his throne." We answer, simply because St. Luke tells us, ch. i., v 32, that Christ himself is that son, who shall reign in the throne of David for ever. And, therefore, we cannot consent to the "Inquirer" putting in "a vicar or vicegerent" into that prophecy, and into that throne, out of his own head.

He reminds us of Daniel's prophecy, that the kingdom of Christ shall last for ever, and asks—"How, unless having a visible head?" We cannot see that it is beyond the power of Christ to govern his spiritual kingdom without the help of a man to take his place. Christ tells us that his kingdom is not of this world. Why, then, must it be governed like the kingdoms of this world? Christ also tells us, "The kingdom of God is within you." Christ has also promised that he himself will dwell in us. We think that Christ dwelling within us is the only proper head of his kingdom, which is within us. How can any man be the head of that kingdom?

Lastly, he quotes Isaiah ii. 3, saying that the Lord shall judge among the nations. That seems to us a good reason for looking to the judgment of the Lord, and seeking for it in his Word. Can he show us where it is said that the Pope shall judge amongst the nations?

We return to the instance we have selected. Did the Apostles say that "whole Christ" was contained in the bread by itself, and also in the wine by itself? We do not ask for proof that the Apostles wrote this. We are content to take the proof that they said it. Who will give us such proof? And are we expected to believe without proof?

This cannot be proved to us by taking prophecies that describe the church when the days of her mourning shall be ended, and applying them to the days when the Popes themselves are mourning over the afflictions of the church. Let us have proof of the fact that the Apostles said this, and we will believe it. Will "An Inquirer" believe it, when he can find no proof of it at all?

We hope our correspondent will receive and consider what we have written as emanating from the same friendly feeling which he expresses towards us at the close of his letter. Would that a like spirit guided all controversy, "with all humility and mildness, with patience, supporting one another in charity, careful to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." —Ephesians iv., 2 and 3, Douay Bible. "We are all brethren: why should we strive?"—St. Augustine, Op. Tom. iv., p. 102.

ANSWER TO NOTES AND QUERIES.

THE following appears in the September number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN:—

"NOTES AND QUERIES.

"Can any one explain why, in the Roman Catholic creed, the Creed of Pope Pius the Fourth, the word 'AMEN' is put in the middle, and not at the end? Or is there any other instance in the Catholic Church, since it began, of this word Amen being put in the middle of either a profession of faith or a prayer, and not at the end of it?"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

"A Friend to Truth" wishes to know if he be correct in saying that the Church of Rome does not allow the sacrament of Extreme Unction to a criminal that is to be executed?"

To the first I beg to observe, that in the Roman Ritual, the profession of Catholic Faith, somewhat erroneously called the creed of Pope Pius the Fourth, commences with the NICENE CREED and at the conclusion thereof (the Nicene Creed) the word "AMEN" is put after the last sentence—"the life of the world to come. Amen"—as it is to be found in the Book of Common Prayer, and, of course, whenever the Nicene Creed is recited. The remainder is a profession of faith more explanatory and in detail, in which the word Amen does not occur at all—beginning, middle, or end

"A Friend to Truth" is informed, that had he consulted the general catechisms for the use of schools, he would have learned that the sacrament of Extreme Unction is administered only to such as are in danger of death by sickness: consequently, that neither a criminal about to be executed, nor a soldier going to battle is a fit recipient of this sacrament.

One good turn deserves another; will you, therefore, do me a favour in kind, by answering a note and query of my own?

In two late numbers of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN I perceive you have been ingeniously taking a correspondent of yours to task touching the Roman Catholic interpretation of Scripture. This induces me to inquire, among the different interpretations of the Bible put forward by Protestantism, since the Reformation, which is the true one, or where I can find the sense in which the Protestant Church has held and does hold the Holy Scriptures?

Believing that such an interpretation is somewhat inconsistent with private judgment, of which you are so great an advocate, I should not have asked the question at all, were it not that I have it upon the authority of Mr. Napier, in the House of Commons, May 21, 1852, that "the Church of England has now become an active and living interpreter of God's Word."

All very good; but where is its true sense of the Holy Scriptures to be found. Has it ever been published?

A FRIEND TO INQUIRY, BECAUSE IT ELICITS TRUTH.

Our correspondent says—"The remainder (of Pope Pius's Creed) is a profession of faith, more explanatory and in detail."

Of what is it explanatory? Of what does it give the details? Is it of the Nicene Creed? If not, what does it explain? This question will probably be treated more at large in future numbers.

To the last question we reply—The Church of England and the Church of Rome do not make the same claim as interpreters of Holy Writ. The Church of England claims to be authorized, as an interpreter, to assist men to understand, by aiding the exercise of their own reason. In questions of faith she interprets by the Catholic Creeds, which are the genuine testimonies and tradition of the Church of all ages. She admits no other articles of faith but these. She admits no one to her communion who does not receive these articles. She condemns all interpretations of Scripture contrary to these. In other matters relating to religion, she interprets Scripture by her catechism, her articles, her formularies, the teaching of her authorized ministers. She claims authority thus to interpret, and she claims an attentive hearing, in a tractable spirit; but she does not want any man to submit to these interpretations further than she convinces his understanding.

But the Church of Rome claims a greater authority, of interpreting Scripture, at least in some things. She claims a power of interpreting some passages of Scripture so as to make other articles of faith which are not in the ancient Catholic Creeds: she demands us to believe these interpretations, whether the reasons which she gives convince our understandings or not: and she tells us that we shall be damned to all eternity, as heretics, if we do not believe them. In answer to this, we ask her—What THESE interpretations are, and where they are to be found? and she cannot or will not tell us. We think this a fair question to put to her, and we beg for an answer.

The Church of England does not claim to do this, or profess to have done it; and we, therefore, think it unfair and absurd to ask her to show where she has done it.

THE POWER OF THE PRIEST.

MR. EDITOR—I live in the west of Mayo, where they say the priest used to be able to turn boys into foxes and hares; but I'm not such a fool as to believe he can do so now; and indeed, I myself was by when one of the turncoats dared him to turn him into a goat, and his reverence rode off in a passion, and never made even an offer at it. The jumper grinned when he saw him sticking the spurs into his old horse, though it was no laughing matter in my mind, in these parts, to grin at a priest for not being able to work a miracle off-hand that-a-way; and many's the stout boy that not long ago would have run far enough before facing a priest, and I'm feared the jumper will hear of it yet. But what I want to know from you, Mister Editor, is what you think is the power of the priest, and whether his curse really does people any harm, and particularly whether my reading your paper against his orders is any harm. I used to get it myself at the office, when it first came down here; but all of a suddent it was stopped, though I've often thought that it was the priest that stopped it, and not the friend (whoever he was, good look to him), that found me out to be fond of reading on both sides and sent it to me, I am sure for nothing but friendship. My reason for thinking that it was the priest that stopped it is that the day after I enquired for it, and was told there was none that turn for me by the post-master, who is a cousin of Father ——, Peggy Malowny, who is the servant girl that attends to the childer at the house, and is a cousin of my own, showed me a torn cover with my name on it, which she found at the back of the grate in the little parlour behind the shop, where Father —— and two friars had been sitting together, examining the directions of the letters, and maybe taking a peep at the inside of an odd one or two, where they thought it good for the souls of the boys that hadn't gone to confession lately. Now, Mr. Editor, maybe they wrote "refused" on my paper, and that without the post-mistress telling any lie, I'll be bound the friars tould her; for sure enough she refused to give me the paper, which, no doubt, is all as one as my refusing to take it. Peggy tells me, that in making up the bag betimes, she sees papers sent back to Mr. Curry, in Sackville-street, with "refused" written on them; and maybe it is only themselves that refuse to give them to the lawful owner, for whom it was sent. I suppose you guess that the post-master and mistress goes to mass regular, and the priests and friars are most particular in their attention to them once a month, at any rate; maybe, however, it doesn't do any great good to them after all to be playing false in that way; for, sure, doesn't it make the boys more greedy to get it wherever they can get a lone, or a sight of it unknownst to the priest? And I can tell you, Mr. Editor, I never rested till I made out a friend who shows it to me regular, "behind the bush," as they say; and maybe "stolen milk" is the sweetest, and there is no use calling milk poison, when all the world understands the differ. And I can tell you I know plenty of lads who was taught to read and write in the national school, that reads the LAYMAN as well as me, and don't we discuss it together; and think it is no wonder that the priests won't answer till the Greek and the Latin, and other languages too, which puzzle us entirely to make out what they mane. By the same token I don't think our priest, or his cojutor either, knows as much Greek as would fit on a sixpence, and it's much aisier, no doubt, to curse the boys as read your paper (and a civil spoken paper it is, in my humble judgment), than to prove purgatory out of the ould fathers of the three centuries, as you begged them to do, twiste over, if not three times itself. But that brings me back, and I beg pardon for wandering from what I want to know. Do you really think the priest's curse does people any harm, or is it just like the ould threat of the foxes, and hares, and goats that they used to be threatening the people with when they found the lash of the riding whip was not enough to regulate them to their minds, and bring the boys to raison, as Father O'Sullivan used to say in ould times, when he'd ride in among them at the fairs and other gatherings where there was a bit of a row? Jem O'Driscoll says he doesn't believe the priest's curse signifies a button, unless the boys are themselves willing to carry it out agen one another, which I'm hoping they're beginning not to like as well as they used, when party fights was so common among them, and the bit of land was worth fighting for, which, werrasthrue it has never been since the potaties went to the bad; and, Mr. Editor, I am myself very nearly of Jem O'Driscoll's mind in the matter, only just I'm doubtful whether it wasn't the priest's cursing the people that made God curse the potaties, which it's as plain as my face, (and sure enough I'm as ugly as I need be at any rate, since I got the bating at Castlebar three years ago last August), it's as plain as my face that God did curse the potaties for some raisin best known to himself, and maybe it might be to punish the priests for keeping back the Bible from them as wanted it badly, and is now gone to Americy, to be free to do what they like, and read what they like. I don't myself think the boys is the worse of the cursing; but my notion is, that the priests is a dale worse, though they're no doubt doing their best to conceal it, and keep a good coat on their backs for dacency and a good appearince. I beg your pardon humbly, Mr. Editor, for troubling you with this; but when you printed Pat Murray's letter about Kingstown Harbour, which pleased all the boys here very much, specially as they'd often paid themselves for their father's souls (heaven be their bed!), I thought maybe you'd like to know about the post-office and the friars in the back parlour.—Your humble servant to command,

TIMOTHY M'D———

P.S.—Don't forget to answer me whether you really think Jem Driscoll is right or not about the cursing.

We beg T. M'D——— to borrow from his friend the first number of our paper, in which he will find our ideas in full on the subject of priestly cursing, both as to its sinfulness and inefficacy; and though we cannot insure them against violence from the priest's followers, we can assure T. M'D. and his friends that the priest's curse will do them no other harm, and they need not fear God's curse, if they do nothing to break the law of God, as laid down in the Holy Scriptures. He will also find, in the same number, an accurate report of a trial at the Antrim assizes, on the 20th of March, 1846, before the late eminent Judge Burton, where a miller, named Charles M'Loughlin, recovered £70 damages, and above £100 costs, against a Roman Catholic priest, for cursing him from the altar. We shall, at an early opportunity, call the attention of our readers to another reported law case, where £125 damages was recovered against a Roman Catholic bishop, at the Lifford assizes, for excommunicating from the altar one Philip Boyle, which, we are assured, has put a stop to such proceedings in that part of the country ever since.

If any of our readers, who shall be cursed by their priests for reading the LAYMAN, would have the courage to try the effect of the miller's remedy, we will venture to foretell the priests will leave them alone for the rest of their lives. We feel obliged to Mr. M'D. for his suggestions as to the post-office; and having received several similar hints from other parts of the country, we have lodged a complaint before the General Post-office authorities on the subject, and have been assured of their active co-operation in detecting and punishing the offenders under the Post-office Offences' Act (1 Vict., c. 36), which subjects to fine and imprisonment, with or without hard labour and solitary confinement, any one who shall, for any purpose, destroy, detain, or delay any newspaper, or other printed paper whatever, sent by the post, or who shall aid, counsel, solicit, or endeavour to procure any other person to do so.

It is high time that back parlour proceedings should be put a stop to, though we have reason to believe that Roman Catholic postmasters, in general, know their duty better than to allow any one to induce them to lend themselves to such illegal and arbitrary interference with her Majesty's post-office establishment.

INDULGENCES.

WE had hoped that Dr. Keane, or some other learned Roman Catholic divine, would have responded to our invitation to furnish our readers with an authoritative explanation, from "a living, speaking tribunal," of the points necessary to establish that the blessings said to flow from indulgences are not chimerical, but founded in reality; but regret they have not done so.

We have not space, in our present number, for inserting the results of our own reading and thinking upon the subject, but have not forgotten our promise to consider, at the earliest opportunity in our power, the force of the best reasons we have been able to find in Roman Catholic controversialists in support of the doctrine and practice in question.

FARM OPERATIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

Wheat—Good and seasonable weather for sowing wheat has much influence on the crop, and, with the best farmers, from the latter end of September and during October is considered the best seed season, particularly in light, rich soils; but hitherto the necessity of permitting the potato crop full and sufficient time to come to maturity has been the cause of wheat not being generally sown in Ireland until this month, and, therefore, farmers considered themselves particularly fortunate in getting in the wheat crop any time during the month of November. We would, however, much rather see the wheat sowing concluded within October, the ground is in much better order, not so much saturated with wet, and much less seed will be required; it will tiller more evenly, and be more early in for the sickle—advantages of the utmost importance to the farmer, besides leaving the present month so much more at liberty to the different other farming operations necessary to the advancement of the spring's work. We would, therefore, impress upon our friends the necessity of losing no time in finishing wheat sowing, where that operation has not been performed, ample directions for which have been given in the preceding month.

Winter Vetches may still be sown, provided the soil be not very wet; they are best sown in beds from 6 to 8 feet wide, and a little manure will be necessary; about 4 bushels of seed will sow an Irish acre; 3 or 4 stones of rye may be sown with it, or the same quantity of the Don or winter oats.

Rye, Bere, or Winter Barley may also be sown any time this month, either for a soiling crop, usually called stolen crops, or to stand for seed; from 16 to 20 stones will sow an Irish acre, according as the land is poor or rich.

Beans and Peas.—The Mazagan or Russian bean and gray or hog peas may still be sown any time during this month. For directions see last month's operations.

Parsnips and Early Cabbages.—No time should be lost in finishing the sowing of parsnips, to come in early next July, and transplanting early cabbages, where those necessary operations have not been completed last month.

Stall-feeding.—If the cattle intended for fatting were not put up for this purpose last month, no further time should be lost in doing so; the loss in condition consequent on a fortnight, or even week's delay will throw the cattle back a month or six weeks in coming to maturity, and will be severely felt by the feeder, in not having the command of the market at the proper time. The cattle, to be profitable in stall-feeding, should be put up in good, warm, and thriving condition, which will not be the case if left out any longer this cold, stormy weather; they will lose more flesh in a night than can be put on in a week. When first put in, they should be sparingly fed on the white or inferior class of turnips or cabbages, keeping the better, or more keeping sorts—hybrids, Aberdeens, Swedes, and mangels—for the last, in the order above named, increasing the quantity as they get accustomed to the food. In feeding, the best rule is to feed three times a day—at 8 in the morning, 12 at noon, and 5 in the afternoon, giving each beast as much roots as it can cleanly consume. The troughs should then be cleaned out of all unconsumed food, and 3 or 4 lbs. of sweet hay given each, when they should be left at rest and undisturbed till the hour comes for the next feed. The unconsumed food, whether roots or hay, should be given to the store or young cattle, which will greedily eat it up, and nothing be lost. As to the quantity necessary, a beast weighing between 6 and 7 cwt., when finished, will consume, on an average, from the time of putting up until finished, about 1½ cwt. of roots daily, and at the commencement about ¼ cwt. of hay; but as it progresses to maturity, the quantity of hay consumed will be less and less, till in the end it will not amount to over 10 or 12 lbs.; but they will consume the usual quantity of roots till they finally leave the stalls fatted. Cattle thus fed, on roots and hay alone, will be, according to the condition they are put up, finished from the latter end of February to the middle of March; but if they be allowed a little bruised oats, barley, linseed-meal, or oil-cake, the period of fatting will be much shortened.

Sheep may also be housed and fed on roots and hay; and will pay well for their keep, both in flesh and wool; besides, quantities of the richest manures will be made. Breeding ewes and stores should be allowed a little hay and salt, and lambs should get an allowance of turnips and hay.

Milch cows should now be housed at night, and a few hours in the yards, or a dry paddock, should be all the liberty they should be allowed. If let out in the fields they only poach the land, which is very injurious, if tender, and the manure dropt is lost. Their food should be cooked, consisting of cabbages, turnips, mangels, parsnips, carrots, chopped hay or straw, and the tailings of wheat, oats, or barley.

Stores should be kept close in the house, if there be room, or in good, well-sheltered yards, with open sheds. Remember, dry lodging and generous keep are necessary to insure and develope good form, which will, in the end, command the greatest returns.

Pigs for fatting should now have abundance of cooked food. We take it that, for some time to come, pigs will be the best paying stock—much better than either beef or mutton—and their increase should be particularly encouraged. Turnips, mangels, carrots, parsnips, bean and pea meal, &c., to which may be added some chandlers' greaves, will pay better in feeding this stock than in any other way they can be disposed of; they should be kept perfectly dry, comfortable, and clean, and, as a rule with every animal to be fatted, the troughs, &c., should be carefully cleaned out immediately after the animals have satisfied their appetites.

Roots.—By the end of the month, Aberdeen and Swede turnips, mangels, parsnips, and carrots will be sufficiently matured, and should be carefully taken up and stored, as directed last month.

Potatoes should now be planted, to come into early use. We have nothing to add to last month's directions; but that, as a question has arisen upon the propriety of planting them in lazy-beds or drills, we would recommend both combined; the lazy-beds will undoubtedly give the driest winter lodging to this now more than ever valuable esculent; and we would recommend the beds to be formed from four to six feet wide. Form shallow drills across the beds, 18 inches asunder; drop the potato sets, of which the small sized whole ones are the best, in these drills, twelve inches set from set, covered with a little earth; then place some manure over them, so as that the manure and potato sets may not come into actual contact, and cover them well up out of the furrow, still preserving the raised drill shape, which should be pulled down a little with a rake early in the spring, before the shoots begin to protrude; or to keep over the manuring till spring. A great deal of the desired success depends on the state of the weather at planting, which should be dry.

Grass and Meadow Lands.—Continue to manure grass and meadow lands with either composts, previously prepared, farm-yard manure, bones, marl, or gravel.

Odds and Ends.—Thrashing should go on unceasingly, in order to have fresh straw for the cattle, which will do much better on that which is fresh and sweet than on that which is stale and musty. Admit the water to the irrigated or watered meadows, which should be constantly watched, so that the water flows constantly, freely, and evenly over the surface, without stagnation on any portion, and see that the discharging drains are unobstructed. Draining and subsoiling should be particularly attended to when the weather is open, as it is upon the proper execution of all the details respecting this modern improvement that good farming depends; much money is uselessly—nay, viciously—thrown away on these works, for want of the necessary and strict supervision. Keep the plough constantly at work in favourable weather. Grass land and old lea cannot be broken up too soon, in order to secure as much as possible of the ameliorating influence of the winter's alternate frosts and thaws, and the rotting and closing of the sods, and heavy clay lands should be ploughed up now with a full and deep furrow, for the same reason, more particularly as frost prevents cohesion in such lands, and heat promotes it. Coppices should be cleansed, and timber felled, and planting proceeded with. This is also the proper time to pull down old, useless, crooked fences; mix them with lime, and convert them into rich heaps of compost, form new fences, and plash and repair old ones. When not ploughing, keep the horses at the cart gathering manure, road-scrapings, rich headlands, loamy sand, or bog-stuff, for composts; turn over old compost-heaps; quarry, and draw home, or to the kiln, limestone; also turf, and, when to be had at a reasonable distance, culm, to have at hand for burning the lime as wanted. Repair gates and road-ways; thatch and otherwise repair the roofs of out-offices, and lay up harrows, scufflers, horse-hoes, and such implements as may not be wanting till next season, under cover from the weather, first cleaning and putting them in a proper state of repair.

Dean Swift says, that "he never knew any man rise to eminence who lay in bed of a morning;" and Doctor Franklin, in his peculiar manner, says, "that he who rises late may trot all day, but never overtakes his business."

THE GREAT WESTERN SCHISM.

In the work on Vulgar Errors, which was written a couple of hundred years ago, by the learned physician, Sir Thomas Browne, we find an elaborate discussion of the question whether it be true that a man has one rib less than a woman. He argues that though it be true that God made Eve out of one of Adam's ribs; and though it may be concluded thence that Adam had ever after one rib less than his wife, yet that it does not follow that this defect was perpetuated in his posterity; since we observe that men with one eye have children with two; cripples have children perfect in their limbs; and so on. He pursues this argument into detail, into which we need not follow him. For he also states a fact which, we should have imagined, might have saved him all further trouble—namely, that by inspection of their skeletons, it appears that men and women have each precisely the same number of ribs. In the present day we should think it a waste of time and ingenuity to expend laborious arguments on a question which might be decided by the evidence of facts. We think, however, we may derive from it a useful hint for the most profitable manner of conducting our controversies. We have already, in several articles, discussed questions as to how it is likely that God would have dealt with his Church; whether, for instance, God would be likely to provide Christians with infallible safeguards against all possibility of religious error, or whether he would leave it necessary for us, in order to judge rightly in religious matters, to expend the same thought and care which we have to employ in the affairs of this life. But perhaps it may be well to turn sometimes from abstract discussion to facts. Instead of debating what course of dealings with his Church Scripture and reason make it likely that God would pursue, it may be well occasionally to examine how God actually has dealt with it. For this purpose we intend to give, now and then, sketches from Ecclesiastical History, which will serve to test the correctness of our other arguments. We do not intend, however, to go into minute points, which have been the subjects of dispute between Roman Catholics and Protestants, but mean to confine ourselves to the great facts which are admitted by historians of all persuasions. And the better to secure our impartiality, we shall be careful to state nothing for which we have not the authority of Roman Catholic historians.

In the article on the jubilee, which appeared in our October number, we had occasion to mention incidentally that there were, at the time of the third jubilee, two rival popes claiming the allegiance of the Christian world. It may interest some of our readers, then, if we tell something about the origin of this state of things, and how it was terminated; or, in other words, if we give a short sketch of the history of that long-continued division among Christians known by the name of "the Great Western Schism." To tell the story in all its details would require a large volume; but the chief facts may be briefly summed up. For fifty years, two or more Popes disputed with each other the honour of being the rightful successor of St. Peter; and the claims of the contending parties were so evenly balanced that the nations of Christendom were tolerably equally divided between them: very respectable Roman Catholic writers maintain that it is still impossible to decide with certainty which party was in the right: Saints working miracles are said, by Romanists, to have been numbered among the adherents of either Pontiff: and, finally (we quote from the Jesuit Maimbourgh), even a general council, which had the aid of the Holy Ghost to enable them to decide infallibly which was in the right, was unable to solve the question, and was obliged to have recourse to its authority, instead of availing itself of its knowledge. For the Council of Constance did not venture to decide which of the rival Popes was the true one; but by virtue of its authority deposed them all, and elected a new Pope of its own.

The commencement of the great schism dates from the year 1378, from the death of Pope Gregory XI. For seventy years before that time the papal chair had been occupied by a succession of French Popes, who, to the great dissatisfaction of the people of Rome, had removed their residence from that city to Avignon, in France. And as the French Popes had for the most part nominated French cardinals (with whom lay the election of the new Pope), it seemed likely that this state of things would continue. But it so happened that, a little before his death, Pope Gregory had been induced to remove to Rome, chiefly by the persuasion of Catherine of Sienna, who has been since canonized as a saint, and who is remarkable as having had (according to her own account, at least) the marks of the Saviour's wounds imprinted on her body, although, to spare her modesty, no eyes but her own were ever able to see them. The Pope did not long survive his removal to Rome; and on his death-bed, having a presentiment of the evils which were to ensue, he called his friends together, and solemnly cautioned them to beware of men or women who, under the appearance of religion, spoke visions of their own devising, since that he himself, seduced by such visions, had been led to reject the rational counsel of his friends, and had drawn the Church into imminent danger of a schism.

Sixteen cardinals (of whom but four were Italians) entered the conclave, to proceed to the election of Gregory's successor. Previously, however, the chief magistrates of Rome had presented them with a remonstrance, pointing out to them the miseries which Rome had suffered from the absence of its spiritual head. "The sacred edifices were left without roof, or gates, or walls; the abode of beasts, which cropped the grass off their very altars. The faithful were no longer attracted to Rome, either by devotion or by interest; so that there was danger lest the unfortunate city should be reduced to a vast and frightful solitude." As the only remedy for these evils they demanded the election of a Roman or, at least, an Italian Pope, adding some threats as to the extremities to which the people might proceed, if disappointed in their just expectation.

The cardinals received still plainer hints, to the same effect, after they had actually entered on their deliberations. Their place of meeting was surrounded by a tumultuous mob, which at length burst even into the recess of the conclave. They threatened the cardinals with personal violence if they ventured to elect a foreign Pope—they would set fire to the place—they would tear them in pieces—"they would make their heads redder than their hats;" and they kept up a constant cry, "We must have a Roman for a Pope, or, at the very least, an Italian." At first the cardinals answered boldly, that their choice must be directed by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and not by popular menaces; and that if they made an election constrained by violence, the Pope so chosen would not be a real Pope, but an intruder. At length, however, they gave way, and elected an Italian, who took the name of Urban VI. The cardinals at first seemed well content with what they had done, and sent round to the different states of Europe the customary notification of the choice which they had made. Perhaps had the new Pope given no cause of complaint, they might have continued to acquiesce in the election which had been forced upon them. But Urban VI. had scarcely been seated on his throne when he began to inveigh bitterly against the vices of the prelates, their simony, their injustice, their exactions, and their scandalous luxury. In a short time he had made himself so unpopular that the cardinals determined to take advantage of the violence which had attended his election, in order to declare him unlawfully chosen. When, therefore, the summer heats gave them a good excuse for withdrawing from Rome they retired to Anagni, and there commenced their proceedings against Urban. They began by putting forth a public declaration, describing the tumults which had taken place at the election of Urban; stating that they had only chosen him in the persuasion that, seeing the circumstances under which he was elected, he would in conscience have refused the Pontificate. But that, on the contrary, forgetful of his salvation, and burning with ambition, he had assented to the choice; that under the effect of the same intimidation he had been enthroned and crowned, and assumed the name of Pope, though he rather merited that of apostate and Antichrist. They then anathematized him as a usurper, and invoked against him all aids and succours, divine and human.

Before proceeding, however, to the election of a new Pope, the cardinals thought it desirable to obtain the co-operation of the Italians, who, as we mentioned before, were members of the Sacred College. But, how were they to be got to join in opposition to their countrymen? The cardinals hit on an ingenious method. They separately gave to each of them a secret promise, in writing, that he himself should be the object of their new choice! The device was successful. The Italian cardinals kept their secret from each other, and repaired to meet their brethren, each confident that he was to be elected Pope. But they had no sooner entered into conclave than they discovered that they had been all alike imposed on; for a Frenchman was immediately chosen, who assumed the title of Clement VII.

We pause here in our narrative for the present. Next month we intend to go on to tell how Christians were perplexed between the claims of the rival Popes, and how the whole of Europe was divided in their allegiance between them; how the two Popes excommunicated each other and his adherents; and yet how these anathemas are stated, by respectable Romish writers, to have done no harm to anybody, and how saints flourished and worked miracles in the ranks of both parties; how the schism lasted for a period of about fifty years, and how it was eventually composed.

We shall conclude, for the present, with one practical inference from the whole story. Romanists bring forward specious arguments to prove that it is necessary that there should be, at all times, in the Church, a living and speaking judge of controversies; and they contend that if there were not, Christ's promise to be ever with his Church would have failed. But now, whatever interpretation theory may put on the promises of our Lord, the facts we have brought before you show that the Romish interpretation cannot be the true one; for the great schism lasted longer than the period ordinarily assigned for a "generation" of men. A young man, who had barely arrived at maturity at the death of Gregory XI., might have died at a respectable old age before the schism was finally healed. And such a man, during the whole course of his life, must have been uncertain where to seek for an infallible guide in controversies. There were at that time two who pretended to be the successor of St. Peter, and the most important religious advice given by them was, that each of them assured him that by acknowledging his rival he should be excluded from the pale of the Church, outside of which there is no salvation. And in this advice respectable Roman Catholic authorities are of opinion that both the Popes were wrong.

Well, then, what we say is this: It is no use to a man to know that there is somewhere or other one able to guide him infallibly right, if he cannot tell who that infallible guide is. And it is poor comfort to him to be told that the Church had an infallible guide in former ages and that it will have one in future ages, if there be no guide to be found while he is alive. If, then, God could leave his Church, for thirty years or fifty, without a head, or uncertain who that head was, he might just as well leave it in the same state for 300 years or 500; and whatever is meant by the promise, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against the Church, we may be sure of this, that it does not mean that the Church shall always have a visible head, whose religious teaching may be implicitly followed.

THE WRITTEN WORD.

THERE is reason to believe that neither Protestants nor Roman Catholics are fully aware of the strong grounds that exist for considering the written Word of God to be the appointed depository of his revelation to man. It may, therefore, be profitable to both to set before them some of the many authorities in favour of an appeal to the written Word of God, and to nothing else, as containing all God's revealed Word, both as to faith and practice.

We shall begin by taking a view of the various ways in which God has revealed himself at different times.

It was to be expected that when God made man in his own image—made him a reasoning, intelligent, responsible being—he would not leave him without intimations of his will, but would reveal himself in such ways as should seem best to his infinite wisdom.

At first God spoke plainly, audibly, directly to his creatures. Thus he spoke to Adam in the garden, both before and after the fall. Thus he spoke to Cain, to Noah, to Abraham, to Isaac, to Jacob. They were left in no doubt that God spoke to them, and that what they heard was the word of God.

Thus he spoke to Moses at the burning bush, in the land of Egypt. In all the revelations of his will, with regard to the deliverance of his people, He spoke to him face to face; so that Moses could say—"The Lord has appeared and spoken to me, and I speak in his name."

In the same way God spoke directly to both Moses and to the people in the wilderness. He, with his own voice, in the hearing of the people, spoke the Ten Commandments at Mount Sinai.

The people, we read, were so overpowered by this terrible exhibition of God's glory that they prayed that he might not speak to them directly, but through his servant Moses (Ex. xx. 19)—"They said to Moses, Speak thou with us and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die."

The Lord then took Moses into the mount, and revealed to him the law and the statutes which he was to make known to the people. And at this time our God gave an intimation of the way in which, in future times, he proposed to make his creatures acquainted with his unchanging mind and will, and to have it ever preserved and kept before them. He bore his testimony to the use of having his will—what he declared to his people—committed to writing, that it might be as permanently fixed and secured, for their instruction, as it was permanently fixed in his own mind. As Moses tells us (Deut. ix. 10)—"And the Lord delivered unto us two tables of stone, written with the finger of God, and on them was written according to all the word which the Lord spoke with you in the mount, out of the midst of the fire, in the day of assembly."

What a testimony is here had, from God himself, as to the value of having that committed to writing which it is his will, and for the good of man, to have preserved and kept in memory. If ever there were words likely to be remembered, and treasured up in men's minds, they were the Ten Commandments. The circumstances of their delivery, the solemn awfulness of the occasion, the Divine person who spoke them, their shortness, and yet their importance, all conspired to have permanently fixed them in the memory. Yet, the God who spoke them wrote them with his own finger on two tables of stone, and, in consequence, the Church has them, not as they might have been remembered, and handed down by tradition, but as our God delivered them.

After God, according to the desire of the people, had ceased to speak directly to them the other statutes and judgments, but had given them to Moses, who was to make them known to them, the Lord said unto Moses (Ex. xxxiv. 27)—"Write thou these words: for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel."

Thus was written, by God's express direction, what is often referred to as the "Book of the Law of the Lord." And it is to be remarked, that now was the first case in which an opportunity was given for instruction by tradition—i.e., God speaking to one, and that person delivering what he had heard to another. If any one might have been depended upon for accurately remembering and faithfully delivering what had been said to him, it would have been Moses. But it was not God's intention to have his law to be transmitted by tradition from one person to another—from one generation to another. He had his law written for their learning, and for its safe and continued preservation as he had originally delivered it. And this book of the law was to be used as the storehouse and depository of God's revelation. So we read (Ex. xxiv. 3, &c.)—"Moses came and told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments, &c.; and Moses wrote all the words of the Lord." And having offered sacrifice, "he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people, and they said, All that the Lord hath said we will do, and be obedient."—Verse 7.

This reading of the written law was not to be done this once and no more. We read (in Deut. xxxi. 7, &c.)—"Moses called unto Joshua, and gave him a charge; and Moses wrote this law, and delivered it unto the priests, the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and unto all the elders of Israel. And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles, when all Israel is come to appear before the Lord thy God in the place which He shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing. Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn and fear the Lord your God, and observe to do all the words of this law: and that their children, which have not known anything, may hear and learn to fear the Lord your God as long as ye live in the land, whither ye go over Jordan to possess it."

The history informs us that Joshua obeyed the directions given by Moses (Jos. viii. 30, &c.)—"Then Joshua built an altar unto the Lord God of Israel in Mount Ebal, as Moses, the servant of the Lord, commanded the children of Israel, as it is written in the book of the law of Moses, &c. And he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote in the presence of the children of Israel. And all Israel, and their elders, and officers, and their judges, stood on this side of the ark and on that side, &c. And afterwards he read all the words of the law, the blessings and the cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law. There was not a word of all that Moses commanded which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel, with the women and the little ones, and the strangers that were conversant among them."

Hence it is abundantly evident that, at the setting up of the Jewish dispensation, the written Word was the depository of God's revelation. It, and it alone, contained all that the people were to believe and to do. It will be found that there is equally conclusive evidence that it continued to be so to the end of that dispensation. Moses, looking forward to the time when the people would desire to have a king set over them, gives this direction (Deut. xvii. 18)—"And it shall be, when he shall sit upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book, out of that which is before the priests, the Levites. And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life, that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them," &c. We find King David thus charging his son Solomon (1 Kings ii. 3)—"Keep the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest and whithersoever thou turnest thyself."

Had the kings of Israel and Judah continued to be guided by what was written in the law of Moses, the state of the nation would have been very different from that which appears in their history; but the book of the law was not consulted—it was kept out of sight; at length it was lost, until, by God's help, it was found in the time of Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 11)—"And when Shaphan the scribe read it before the king, he rent his clothes, and said, Great is the wrath of the Lord that is kindled against us, because our fathers have not hearkened unto the words of this book, to do according to all that is written concerning us." This book was acknowledged to be the rule by which they ought to have been guided.

Looking farther into their history, the captivity will be seen to have been brought as the judgment of God upon the people, for having transgressed the law which he gave them; and when, in his undeserved mercy, they were brought back to their land, they will be found acknowledging the written law to be the rule to which they should refer. We read (Neh. viii.)—"And all the people gathered themselves together as one man into the street that was before the water-gate, and they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded to Israel; and Ezra the priest brought the law before the congregation, both of men and women, and all that could hear with understanding, upon the first day of the seventh month; and he read therein before the street that was before the water-gate, from the morning until mid-day, before the men and the women, and those that could understand; and the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the law; and Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit of wood, which they had made for the purpose; and Ezra opened the book in the sight of all the people; so they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the meaning." No one can read the history of the children of Israel and not see that, without doubt, under the Jewish dispensation, even though there was a hierarchy especially appointed of God, his written Word was still his ordained storehouse of truth, to be appealed to and received both by priests and people, and the appointed guide by adhering to which his people were to be kept in the right way, both of practice and faith. As the Apostle James said (Acts xv. 21)—"For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath-day."

The question, then, presents itself—Was a change introduced when our Lord brought in his gracious dispensation?

The first word we hear from the lips of our Lord, when entering on his ministry, was (Mat. iv. 4), "It is written," giving his sanction to the authority of the written Word. One of the first acts we hear recorded of him was to go into the synagogue on the Sabbath-day, and to stand up to read (Luke iv. 17)—"And there was delivered unto him the book of the Prophet Isaiah; and when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written, 'The spirit of the Lord is upon me,' &c.; and he began to say unto them, 'This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears.'" Again (Luke x. 26)—"A certain lawyer stood up and tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? He said unto him, What is written in the law? how readest thou?" Luke xvi. 29—"Abraham said unto him, They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them; and he said, Nay, Father Abraham, but if one went unto them from the dead they will repent; and he said unto them, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." John v. 39, &c.—We have our Lord saying to the unbelieving Jews, "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me; for had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me, for he wrote of me; but if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" Mark vii. 5, &c.—"The Pharisees and Scribes asked him, Why walk not thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwashed hands? He answered and said unto them, Well hath Isaias prophesied of you hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me; howbeit in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men"—"making the Word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered." Our Lord uniformly pointed out the error of those who thought to serve God according to the tradition or commandments of men, whilst he gave the whole sanction of his authority to God's Word preserved in writing, saying, "What is written?"

It may be well to notice one text, the only one that sounds as if by it our Lord gave his authority to another depository of truth besides the Scriptures (and which is often quoted for that purpose), when he condemned the man who should refuse to hear the Church—Mat. xviii. 5. If that text is examined it will appear that the matter to be referred to the Church was not a matter of God's revelation, either as to faith or practice, but a matter in dispute between man and man—"If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone. If he shall hear thee thou hast gained thy brother; but if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them tell it to the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican." The Church (whoever may be intended by that title) is to be the umpire to decide a matter in dispute between brethren. This is consistent with what St. Paul says (1 Cor. vi. 2.)—"If the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?" There is not a text than can be quoted in which our Lord sends the inquirer after God's revealed mind and will to any company of living men for information—in which he says to him who asks, ', What shall I do to inherit eternal life? what shall I do to be saved?" "Hear the Church;" but he has said, "Search the Scriptures"—"they have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them."

Nor were things altered when the Lord had ascended into the heavens, having first desired his disciples to "go and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things which he had commanded them, and promising to be with them always to the end of the world."

The Apostle John, at the end of his Gospel, says—"Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, and that believing ye might have life through his name." The Apostle Paul says that he was not taught by man, but by the Lord Jesus Christ. He, then, if any man, might appeal solely to his own inspiration and expect everything he said to be received upon his authority, yet he is found always magnifying the Scriptures. When making his defence before Felix (Acts xxiv. 14), he says—"I worship the God of my fathers, believing all things that are written in the law and in the prophets." And before Festus and King Agrippa (Chap. xxvi. 22)—"I continue unto this day witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come." In Rom. iv., when he would prove the doctrine of justification by faith, he says—"What saith the Scripture?" Rom. xv. 4.—"Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we, through patience and comfort of the Scripture, might have hope," &c. 2 Tim. iii. 14—"Continue in the things which thou hast learned, and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them; and that from a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works."

We trust that the mass of Scriptural evidence to which we have above referred may lead our readers, whether Roman Catholics or Protestants, to the saving conviction, that the Holy Scriptures are intended, by that God under whose inspiration they were written, and by whose providence they have been preserved, to contain and to present to man that revelation of his will the knowledge of which must lead to their salvation and to his glory; and that it was intended that the instruction of his Church and people should be carried on through the means of the Bible; and we hope that some, at least, may be led by it to value "THE BOOK" more than they have ever done—to refer to it as conclusive authority on all points of religion—and, like the noble Bereans of old, "Search the Scriptures daily whether these things are so."

WHAT TRADITION TELLS US OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY—No. II.

JUSTIN MARTYR, TATIAN, ATHENAGORAS, THEOPHILUS, IRENÆUS.

In our September number we laid before our readers all the passages we could find in the New Testament where the name of the Blessed Virgin is mentioned; and as none of our Roman Catholic correspondents have been able to point out that we have omitted any, we may take for granted that our list was complete. We found, then, that the whole number of those passages was very much less than we should have expected; that several of them are exactly such as the writers would have inserted, if it had been their express object to prevent future ages from carrying their veneration of the mother of our Lord to excess; and that nowhere in the New Testament does there occur an instance of the sacred writers either addressing prayers to the Blessed Virgin themselves, or of their exhorting their converts to implore her intercession. And we called your attention to the fact that her name is not once mentioned in any of the twenty-one apostolic epistles. We do not know in the least how this fact is to be accounted for, if we are to suppose that the sacred writers regarded the Blessed Virgin (as Romish authorities do now) as "their only confidence," "the entire ground of their hope." Certain it is that Roman Catholic bishops nowadays don't think it right to write long letters to their flocks without bringing in the Virgin's name. (Since our last remarks were published, for example, a pastoral was issued to the Roman Catholics of Dublin, half of which was taken up with her praises.) We gave insertion to a letter in which a correspondent furnished us with explanations, given by Roman Catholic divines, of the silence of the sacred writers concerning her; but we leave it to our readers to say whether there was one satisfactory explanation among the whole of them.

We went on then, in the October number, to examine what tradition tells us of the Blessed Virgin. We went through all the genuine remains of what are called the Apostolic Fathers, and we found that the earliest uninspired Christian writers said just as little (or less) about her than the apostles and evangelists themselves. Her name is certainly not found incessantly on their lips.

We are now come to the middle of the second century—more than one hundred years after the death of our Lord. We pointed out to you, in our last article, that a tradition is but of little value if it cannot be traced nearer than a hundred years to the source whence it claims to be derived. For example, Dean Swift is not dead much more than a hundred years, and was one of the most popular men in Dublin in his day; and yet a very moderately-sized sheet of paper would contain all the traditions that could be collected in Dublin now about the dean; and if any one of these traditions were to ascribe to the dean opinions inconsistent with what we know of him through his published writings, no man of sense would attach the least credit to it.

However, though we acknowledge that the value of tradition becomes less and less the farther we go from the fountain head, we believe that it will be very useful to continue our examination of what the early Christians wrote concerning the Blessed Virgin; and, accordingly, we purpose to continue the subject in this and in some future articles: for we shall be enabled to judge, if the worship of the Blessed Virgin was not handed down by tradition, how it did take its origin; and we shall find reason to believe that Mr. Newman is quite right in maintaining that the Roman Catholic doctrine was not handed down, in its present form, by tradition, but that it was developed, in the course of time, by Christian writers. The hint dropped by one was taken up and expanded by another—what was in one man's mouth a mere rhetorical flourish, became in another's a dry statement of facts—until, at last, doctrines assumed a form which would astonish no one more than some of the very writers whose sayings are cited in support of them.

We shall give our readers the means of judging whether this be not so with regard to the doctrine of the worship of the Virgin. And while we intend, in the course of these articles, to lay before our Roman Catholic readers all the passages from the Fathers which the most eminent divines of their church have ever urged in defence of this practice, it will be satisfactory to them to know, that if the result of the examination be to convince them that this practice cannot be traced to any apostolic tradition, still they will not have contradicted anything which their church has decided. The first work published by Mr. Newman, on joining the Roman Catholic communion, in effect, gives up tradition as a ground for Romish doctrine, and claims for the church the power of making discoveries in the Christian religion, and of developing doctrines which the Christians of the apostles' days knew nothing about. And since these views of Mr. Newman's have never been condemned by Roman Catholic authorities, but he is, on the contrary, in high favour with the dignitaries of his new church, our readers are safe in concluding that there will be nothing heretical in their believing that the worship of the Blessed Virgin was unknown to the apostles and their converts, however it may have been developed since, some way or other.

The first author whose writings we shall examine in this article is JUSTIN MARTYR. He was born in Palestine, of heathen parents—became well informed in the Grecian philosophy—was converted to Christianity when of mature age, and then wrote in its defence—was one of the most learned of the very early Christian writers, and eventually suffered martyrdom about the year, A.D., 165. The writings of Justin, which are still extant, are of considerable extent, and contain some important information as to the Church of his time. In particular, he gives some interesting details as to the public services of the Church, and as to the manner in which the sacraments of baptism and of the eucharist were then celebrated. But in no one of his works is there the slightest trace of prayers addressed either to the Blessed Virgin or to any other saint, whether for direct assistance or for intercession.

As it is part of our plan, however, to furnish you not only with all that can be urged from the Fathers in defence of prayers to the Blessed Virgin, but with any passages we can find where she is extolled, and her praises dwelt upon by the Fathers, we give the only passage of this nature we can find in Justin's writings, only remarking that a Roman Catholic writer of the present day would scarcely have said so little in the course of 240 folio pages. Justin, then, in commenting on the fact that our Saviour was born of a virgin, was led to remark how fit it was that, as it was by means of a woman (namely, by Eve's eating the forbidden fruit) that sin entered into the world, so likewise the instrumentality of a woman should be employed in the plan for our redemption, that so disobedience might be destroyed in the same manner in which it was introduced into the world—

"For Eve being a virgin, and incorrupt, having received the word from the serpent, brought forth transgression and death: but Mary the Virgin having received faith and joy (on the angel Gabriel announcing to her the glad tidings, that the Spirit of the Lord should come upon her, and the power of the Highest overshadow her), answered, Be it unto me according to thy word. And of her was born he of whom we have shown that so many Scriptures have spoken: he by whom God destroys the serpent, and angels and men resembling (the serpent), but works a rescue from death for such as repent of evil and believe on him."

This is the strongest passage in all Justin in praise of the Blessed Virgin; and you will observe, that the notion of offering prayers to her is not once suggested by it, and that nothing is said of her except what Protestants are ready to admit. It is scarcely necessary to remark, that in this parallel between Eve and the Virgin Mary, Justin merely institutes a comparison suggested by his own ingenuity, and that he does not pretend to be communicating any doctrine not contained in Scripture, handed down to him by his predecessors. Justin merely makes the remarks which his own reason suggested on the facts contained in Scripture; but he does not pretend to be adding any facts of his own to those already recorded in the Bible. This passage from Justin, although it has no doctrinal importance, is interesting in an historical point of view, because this comparison which Justin suggested, between Eve and the Virgin Mary, was one which greatly pleased some of the succeeding Fathers; and we shall see how some of them improved on it.

The folio volume in which the Benedictine editors published the works of Justin Martyr contains besides writings in defence of Christianity, composed by TATIAN, by ATHENAGORAS, and by THEOPHILUS, who all likewise lived in the second century. We shall not weary you by going separately through each of them; but will cut the matter short by telling you at once, of all three, that there is not a word of the Blessed Virgin in any one of them. Not but that there were opportunities, when any one whose mind had been in the habit of dwelling on the thoughts of the Virgin would not have been silent about her. For instance, Tatian compares the habits of the females celebrated by the Grecian poets with those of the Christian virgins. But these ancient Christian writers not only do not (as Romanists do now) make out opportunities of speaking of the Virgin, whatever be the subject in hand, but they are silent about her, even when a natural opportunity for speaking about her presents itself.

We shall conclude this article with an examination of those parts of the writings of IRENÆUS which bear on our subject. This eminent Christian writer was born in Asia Minor and was one of the most eminent bishops of Gaul at the latter part of the second century. Much of his writings has been lost; and his principal work (against heresies) has only come down to us in a Latin translation, merely fragments of the original Greek having been preserved. There has been enough left, however, to enable us to pronounce with sufficient certainty on the doctrine taught by Irenæus, and to gather this, at least, from his total silence on the subject, that no prayers were in his time offered by orthodox Christians to the Blessed Virgin or to any other of the saints; for nothing of the kind is to be found in any of his writings which have reached us. Of passages in his works where the Virgin's name occurs, there are only two or three remarkable enough to be worth quoting—

"When Mary was hastening to the admirable miracle of the wine, and wishing, before the time, to participate in the compendious* draught, the Lord, repelling her unseasonable haste, said—Woman, what have I to do with thee?"—Adversus Hæreses iii. 18.

It is plain that, in this passage, Irenæus speaks of the haste with which our Lord's mother urged him to the performance of the miracle of the change of water into wine as something censurable, and that he did not conceive it necessary to maintain that she was free from all tincture of sin or error.

In the other two passages to which we allude, Irenæus takes up the comparison which Justin had instituted, between the Virgin Mary and Eve, only adding of his own some further speculation as to the happy meeting of the two in Paradise. The following are the passages. To avoid all cavil we adopt the translation of Messrs. Berington and Kirk, whose work is the storehouse from which modern Romish controversialists draw their citations from the Fathers—

"As Eve having Adam for a husband, but being still a virgin, becoming disobedient, became the cause of death both to herself and to the whole human race; so also Mary, having her predestined husband, but being nevertheless a virgin, being obedient, became the cause of salvation both to herself and to the whole human race. And thus the knot of Eve's disobedience was untied through Mary's obedience; for what the virgin Eve tied through unbelief, the Virgin Mary unloosed through faith.—Adv. Hæreses iii. 33.

"As she (Eve), through the discourse of a (fallen) angel, was seduced, so as to flee from God, having transgressed his word; so Mary, through the discourse of a (good) angel, was evangelised so as to bear God, being obedient to his word. And if Eve disobeyed God, yet Mary was persuaded to obey God, that the Virgin Mary might become the advocate of the virgin Eve. And as the human race was bound to death through a virgin, it is saved through a virgin, the scales being equally balanced—virginal disobedience by virginal obedience."—Adv. Hæreses v. 19.

The only correction we have to make in the preceding translation is in the word translated advocate, which, there is every reason to believe, should rather be translated consoler or comforter. The original Greek is lost, as mentioned above; but there is little reason to doubt that the word employed must have been a derivative of παρακλέω, that being the word for which the Latin "advocare" is a constant equivalent. For example, Tertullian (Cont. Marcion iv. 14) translates the words "to comfort those that mourn" (Isaiah lxi. 3)—"advocare lugentes." And, if this be so, the passage would simply refer to the consolation which Eve would find in seeing the damage repaired which had been caused by her sin, and in meeting with her whose seed had bruised the serpent's head.

But let us waive this point; let us suppose that "advocate" is the exact translation of the word; and let us grant, moreover, that Irenæus was in possession of authentic information that the Virgin in heaven pleads for Eve: does it follow that she can hear our prayers, addressed to her while we are on earth? If we had a brother in a distant country, and even if we believed that he was likely to pray for us, we should have no right to pray to him to offer up his supplication on our behalf; and we find, in point of fact, that whatever be the sense of this rhetorical passage, and whether or not

* In this obscure expression Irenæus alludes to a former remark of his, that the ordinary operations of nature, whereby the water which falls from heaven is transmuted by successive changes, first, to the sap of the vine, then to the juice of the grape, and so to wine, were, in the miracle of the change of water into wine, compressed into a compendious form; the same thing being done in a few minutes which, in the ordinary course of nature, requires a whole year.

he thought the Virgin's advocacy likely to benefit Eve, there is no trace of Irenæus, or any of his contemporaries, asking her intercession for himself.

But it is most important of all to observe, that in these two passages Irenæus does not pretend to deliver a tradition. We can see plainly that the invocation of the Virgin grew in the church—that it was not handed down. We have seen Justin first draw a comparison between the injury caused the world by the instrumentality of Eve and the benefits derived through that of Mary: we have now seen Irenæus take up the same comparison, and embellish it with some rhetorical remarks of his own. But he does not pretend to be in possession of any new facts not contained in the Scriptures; and, notwithstanding the exalted tone of a few sentences in a large work, he never once alludes to any custom among Christians of asking the Virgin's intercession.

We shall have to go down to much later writers before we shall succeed in discovering any trace of such prayers; and when we do at length come to them, we shall find that it is not in tradition that they take their origin. When one writer ventures to speculate on the dignity to which the Virgin is exalted, and the degree of favour which she probably enjoys, another adds something of his own, and conjectures much as to the value of her intercession; then another prays that God may hear the prayers which he trusts she is offering for him; until at length petitions are directly addressed to her, requesting her intercession or her assistance, notwithstanding that there is confessedly no command, either of Scripture or of the Church, that we should offer such prayers, and though there is no promise that God will make such petitions known to her.

Whatever be the value of these speculations, we hope, in these articles, by tracing exactly what each writer had learned from his predecessor, to make it appear that they originated in the private judgment of persons more or less eminent in the Church, and not either from Scripture or tradition.

We cannot, however, take leave of Irenæus without noticing the illustration he affords how Roman Catholics (while they treat the authority of Fathers as decisive when it makes for them) feel no scruple in rejecting their statements when they do not approve of them. For want of any better passage in the writings of the early Fathers, Roman Catholics are very fond of putting forward Irenæus's comparison between the Blessed Virgin and Eve, as if it were sufficient to connect with the times of the apostles the adoration of the Blessed Virgin practised in the fifth century. And, yet, we have shown that there is not only no mention in this passage of any practice of invoking the Virgin Mary in the time of Irenæus, but that, also, the whole passage expresses merely the writer's own views, and not any tradition which he had received from his predecessors. But how Roman Catholic advocates would have triumphed if Irenæus had stated, that he had heard, from those who had heard the apostles speak, that the Church ought to offer prayers through the mediation of the Virgin. And, yet, they reject, without ceremony, statements which he does put forward on this very authority. For example, Irenæus tells us that he had received it from those who had heard it from the very hearers of the apostles, that our Lord lived on this earth to old age, or, as he explains it, to about fifty years of age. One would suppose that this was a point in which tradition was not likely to go wrong; and, yet, the Benedictine editor, very properly, absolutely refuses belief to this tradition of Irenæus, and prefers the received opinion that our Saviour suffered about the thirty-fourth year of his age. He tells us, that "the reasons which Irenæus gives for his opinion are very weak, and that the argument is not better than the rest, that the saint had received this statement from his predecessors; for that we do not know who those predecessors were, nor whether they might not have been mistaken, and that one of them (Papias), whom Irenæus names, was a man of but feeble judgment."

Again, Irenæus strongly maintains the doctrine of the Millenarians, that our Saviour is hereafter to reign on earth for 1,000 years; and about twenty pages from the comparison between Mary and Eve, he tells us (see CATHOLIC LAYMAN for October, p. 109, note 1), on the authority of those who had heard it from John, the disciple of our Lord, that Jesus had used the following words:—"The days shall come in which there shall be vines, each vine having ten thousand shoots, and each shoot ten thousand branches, and each branch ten thousand twigs, and each twig ten thousand clusters, and each cluster ten thousand grapes, and each grape shall produce twenty-five measures of wine; and it shall come to pass that when any of the saints shall take a cluster, another cluster shall exclaim, I am a better cluster, take me and with me bless God. . . . . And when Judas the traitor asked the Lord, How shall such creatures be made? the Lord replied, They shall see who shall come in those days."

Notwithstanding this the Benedictine editor has no hesitation in rejecting the Millenarian doctrines, and pronounces them blemishes which the saint contracted from too great veneration for his seniors We quite agree with the learned Roman Catholic in believing that our Lord never spoke the words here imputed to him, nor any like them; and we infer that Irenæus lived too long after our Saviour's death to be implicitly believed as authority for ascribing any doctrine to our Lord or his apostles of which the Scriptures are silent. And it is thereby demonstrated, on the admission of Roman Catholics themselves, that we are not warranted in concluding that our Lord or his disciples taught a particular doctrine, because that doctrine was maintained by a canonized saint of the Church, not even though that Father should assert it to have been derived by direct tradition from one of the apostles, and not even though he should have written less than a hundred years after that apostle's death. We shall know, therefore, how far we are constrained to admit statements of writers who lived at a greater distance from the apostles, and who do not pretend that the doctrines delivered were derived in a direct line from them.

RULE OF FAITH.

FOLLOWING the method which we proposed to ourselves in discussing the question of the Rule of Faith, we shall now proceed to the examination of the arguments by which Roman Catholics endeavour to prove that Scripture, or the written Word, is insufficient without the aid of Tradition, or the unwritten Word. Before, however, entering on this examination, we desire to make a few remarks supplementary to those which we have already put forward on the Protestant side of the question.

That Holy Scripture comprises all things necessary to salvation, both as regards faith and morals, is proved by the very nature of its contents. With respect to the objects of our faith, it tells us of the existence and providential government of God; of his justice, wisdom, holiness, and power. It tells us, that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him may not perish, but may have life everlasting."—John iii. 16. In Scripture, and in it alone, is contained all that we know of the life and death of our Redeemer. There is not one saying or one miracle of his, innumerable as they were (John xxi. 25), preserved in any authentic record but the canonical Books of the New Testament (1). The Scripture also reveals to us the existence of the third person of the blessed Trinity, and the part which he sustains in the great work of man's redemption. The duties which we owe to the Eternal Father, the Eternal Son, and the Eternal Spirit, respectively, are all clearly laid down in Scripture, and nowhere else. Again, with respect to morals, all the great principles by which man, in his individual and social capacity, should be guided, are simply and clearly defined. There is, indeed, no formal and elaborate system of ethics; but there are—what, in a practical point of view, is infinitely more valuable—living examples, principles exemplified in action, which appeal to the hearts and consciences of every single-minded reader of the Bible.

When from the internal evidence afforded by Scripture itself we turn to the testimony of the primitive Church, the grand truth of the sufficiency of the written Word again meets us. We have already reviewed in detail some of the passages of the early Fathers bearing upon this point, and they might easily have been multiplied. As the result of the whole investigation, it appears "that there never yet was any Catholic Father that did affirm in terms, or in full or equivalent sense, that the Scriptures are defective in the recording anything necessary to salvation, but they all unanimously taught the contrary" (2). The alleged instances contravening this assertion we shall presently consider.

Another important decision of the early Catholic Church, on this matter of the sufficiency of Scripture, is preserved to us in the creeds, or summaries of faith, which were then drawn up, and were looked upon as embodying all the vital doctrines of Christianity. Now, in these creeds there is not a tittle contained which is not either directly, or by necessary consequence, derived from Scripture. Roman Catholics are fond of appealing to Jerome and Augustine as patrons of Tradition. Now, let us hear what these Fathers say respecting the Apostles' Creed, which is nothing more than an epitome of the New Testament doctrines. Jerome says—"The symbol of our faith and hope which was delivered by the Apostles, is not written in paper and ink, but in the fleshly tables of our hearts. After the confession of the Trinity, and of the unity of the Church, the whole, or every sacrament [i. e., mystery] of the Christian religion is concluded with the resurrection of the flesh" (3). Augustine says—"It [the Creed] is short in words, but great in sacraments. It confirms all men with the perfection of believing. . . . . Whatsoever was prefigured in the patriarchs, declared in the Scriptures, foretold in the prophets—of God who was not begotten, of the Son of God who is the only begotten of God, or of the Holy Spirit, &c.—the whole of this the Creed briefly contains in itself" (4). Again, he says—"It is the Rule of Faith—the short, the certain rule—which the Apostles comprehended in twelve sentences, that the believers might hold the Catholic unity, and convince the heretical pravity—the comprehension and perfection of our faith."(5) The men who penned these passages could hardly have believed the imperfection and insufficiency of the written Word, of which the Creed is but a brief outline. The same may be said of Pope Leo the Great, who thus writes—"The short and perfect confession of the Catholic symbol is consigned in so many sentences of the twelve apostles, is so furnished with celestial ammunition, that all the opinions of heretics may be cut off with that sword alone"(6).

Again, the opinion of the ancients, as to the sufficiency of Holy Scripture, is expressed by the very term which they employed to designate the genuine works of the inspired writers, scil, the canonical Scriptures. The word canon (κανὼν) properly signifies a line or rule, and is sometimes applied to the tongue of a balance. Thus, then, the canonical books form the Divine rule, by which we ascertain whether we are walking in the straight paths of God's commandments; the standard by which we conform ourselves to the Divine will; the test by which we examine ourselves whether we are in the faith (7).

Nay, more, the very enemies and persecutors of primitive Christianity bear testimony to the fact, that the Scriptures were then universally recognised as the sole depository of its essential truths. It was against the doctrines contained in Scripture that the Pagan adversaries of our religion directed their assaults, conceiving that if they overthrew them, no others remained in reserve. The Emperor Diocletian thought that if he could succeed in destroying the books of the Christians, the victory of heathenism would be complete, believing justly that they were the ark in which the whole of the new religion was deposited.

Lastly, so irresistible is the evidence in support of the position that Scripture contains all things necessary to salvation, that Bellarmine himself is forced to admit it, whilst he reserves for tradition the more recondite doctrines which were suited to the more perfect—"They [the Apostles] preached not to the people all things, but those which were necessary to them, or profitable, but other things they delivered apart to the more perfect."—De Verb. Dei. iv. c. 11. (8)

Moreover, against the Roman Catholic Rule of Faith—Scripture and Tradition, considered as co-ordinate

We are not concerned with the error (as it is now generally considered) pervading all the above quotations—namely, that the Apostles themselves composed the creed called by their name. It may, however, furnish an additional illustration of the uncertainty of oral Tradition.

(7) This rule, Chrysostom observes, admits neither addition nor subtraction, otherwise its character as a rule is destroyed. ὁ κανὼν οὔτε πρόσθεσιν οὔτε ἀφαίρεσιν δέχεται, ἐπεὶ τὸ κανὼν εἶναι ἀπόλλυσι. — Chrysost. Hom. xii. in Phil. iii.

(8) This distinction refers to the famous Roman Catholic theory of the Disciplina Arcani—viz., that the Apostles, in addition to the truths which they publicly preached and committed to writing, communicated to their successors a number of unwritten doctrines, which were to be kept secret from the uninitiated Jews and Gentiles, and from the catechumens of the Church. This theory, which is really borrowed from heathen philosophy (in which the common, or exoteric doctrines were distinguished from the more recondite, or esoteric), was adopted by the Church of Rome in later times, in order to account for the perplexing fact of the silence of ecclesiastical antiquity respecting the peculiar doctrines of her creed. These doctrines, we are told, were really held since the days of the Apostles; but were kept secret, as hidden mysteries, not to be divulged to any but such as were initiated and duly prepared to receive them. The great expounder of this celebrated theory was Scholastrate, librarian of the Vaticae, whose work on the subject appeared in 1685. It is also worth observing, that a sect of ancient heretics (Valentinians) held a doctrine precisely similar to the Roman Catholic theory just described. They maintained, as we learn from Irenæus (c. Hær. Lib. i. c. 25), that "Jesus in mystery spake to his Disciples and Apostles some things in secret and apart, and enjoined them to transmit those things to them that were worthy." And we learn further, from Augustine (Tract 97. in Johan. t. iii. 738) that in support of this doctrine the heretics quoted John xvi. 12, the very text made use of, for the same purpose, by Bellarmine and all other Roman Catholic theologians. Tertullian likewise notices (de Præscr. Hæret. c. 25) the theory that the Apostles kept back some of the truths revealed to them, and did not impart them alike to all Christians. He condemns it in the most pointed manner, applies to it the name of madness (dementia), and regards it as a pure invention of the Gnostics, devised for the purpose of throwing an air of mysterious grandeur around their monstrous fictions, and supported by the grossest misrepresentations of Scripture. He informs us (1. c. cap. 23) that their scriptural proof was based on 1 Tim. vi. 20, the very passage which the Rhemish translators employ to prove that "the whole doctrine of Christianity was given unto the holy bishops to keep, and not to laymen." These striking resemblances between modern Romanism and ancient Gnosticism are well deserving of the serious attention of every reflecting Roman Catholic.

and independent sources of doctrinal truths—we found a number of objections to lie, arising from the inherent imperfections of tradition as a vehicle for transmitting doctrines; from the analogy of the Old Testament Scriptures; from the discouragement given, in the New Testament, to the attempt made by the Pharisees to put their traditions on a level with the written Word, &c. We must now add this very important consideration, that whilst in theory the Church of Rome makes Tradition a Rule of Faith only equal to Scripture, in practice she raises it far above Scripture; or, to speak more truly, makes Tradition the sole rule. For she represents (as we shall presently see) the written Word, not merely as requiring explanation—which in many places it certainly does—but as being so ambiguous and perplexed as to be a sealed book to the majority of Christians. The unwritten Word, on the contrary, she considers as containing (besides many new doctrines) fully and clearly what the written Word contains imperfectly and obscurely. On these principles it is very natural and reasonable that the imperfect and obscure should give way to the perfect and the clear, and that Scripture should become, as it has been made, the vassal of Tradition. Such a conclusion, however, causes Protestants to revolt from the premises from which it logically follows.

We have now to consider what the Roman Catholics themselves have to say in defence of the Rule of Faith promulgated by the Council of Trent. In order not to be misled by arguments irrelevant to the subject, we must again request the attention of our readers to the sole point at issue—viz., whether articles of faith, not contained expressly or implicitly in the New Testament Scriptures, were promulgated by our Lord, or his divinely-commissioned messengers; and have been, as such, preserved either in the writings of the early Fathers, or in the Acts of General Councils, or in any other trustworthy documents; or else have been transmitted to us by the living stream of Church Tradition.

We ask, then, first of all, do any such Traditions exist, and what proof have we of their genuineness? If we adopt, as a test of the latter, the famous criterion proposed by Vincentius of Lerins—"that which has been received at all times, in all places, and by all persons"—then it is certain they do not exist. It is, we repeat, undeniably certain that, with the exception of the doctrines contained in the canonical books of the Bible, there is not a single instance of an essential doctrine that can pretend to a clear, universal recognition by all ages and all churches. Indeed, modern Roman Catholic controversialists have given up the application of this test, and inform us that Vincentius' rule has been misunderstood; for that, while it is quite certain that whatever has been always, everywhere, and by all received, is Catholic truth, the converse is not true—viz., that nothing can be received as a Catholic verity which does not fulfil these conditions (9). Other tests of Apostolic Traditions have been proposed by Bellarmine and his followers, which either ultimately resolve themselves into that of Vincentius, or else are plainly insufficient for the proposed end. Thus, Bellarmine's fourth criterion (De Verb. Dei, iv. 9) is to the effect, that when the doctors of the Church, either assembled in Council or writing it in their books, affirm something to have descended from Apostolical authority, it is to be held as such (10). As an instance of the first kind, he mentions the worship of images, which was decreed by the Deutero-Nicene Council (A.D. 787)—a decree, it must be observed, in support of which no Father of the first three centuries could be quoted; which contradicted the decree of another General Council, that of Constantinople (A.D. 754); and which was directly opposed to the opinions of many Fathers of the Church, including the explicit injunction of Pope Gregory the Great (11). Bossuet, again, knowing the impracticability of tracing the Traditions of his Church to the source from which they are said to come, has ingeniously converted the very uncertainty of their origin into an argument for their Apostolical origin. He says (Exposit. de la Doctr., &c., ch. xviii)—"A most certain mark that a doctrine comes from the Apostles is, when all Christian Churches embrace it, without its being in the power of any one to show where it had a beginning" (12). Now, with respect to the latter part of this criterion, it is enough to say, that as we do know the beginning of all the doctrines recorded in the New Testament; and as this very knowledge is a sufficient ground for our receiving them; so our admitted ignorance of the source of the so-called Apostolical Traditions, is a sufficient reason for our refusing to receive them as such. The former part of Bossuet's criterion—namely, that "all Christian Churches embrace them"—is a petitio principii; for it refers to things which all Protestant Churches reject, and many of which have never been received by the Eastern Church.

If, then, the ablest advocates of the Church of Rome are unable to direct us to a single safe, not to say infallible, criterion (other than the records of Scripture), by which we may be able to distinguish genuine Apostolical Traditions from those which pretend to be such, what are we to think of the Tridentine decree which anathematizes those who presume to question the Divine origin of the Traditions which that Church adopts? Does the modern Church of Rome profess to know more upon the subject than the ancient Catholic Church, in the age of Tertullian and Augustine? Yet neither of these Fathers was acquainted with an infallible rule for distinguishing the true from the false. Tertullian admits that mere custom sometimes attached to a practice the authority of an Apostolical Tradition (13). Augustine maintained that the communicating of infants was an Apostolical Tradition, in which opinion, however, he is followed neither by Roman Catholics nor Protestants. It is unnecessary to enumerate in detail the various opinions and practices which, in different ages of the Church's history, have passed, more or less generally, for Apostolical Traditions, and which were subsequently suffered to fall into oblivion. The inference from the whole is, however, as inevitable as it is important—namely, first, that even were the existence of Apostolical Traditions subject to no doubt, they must be useless to us, as we have no means of knowing them when we find them; and, secondly, that it is most dangerous to accept, as articles of faith, any dogmas which rest solely on so precarious a basis as Tradition, in any of its forms.

Let us, however, consider in detail the arguments adduced by Roman Catholic theologians in proof of their Rule of Faith—Scripture, with Tradition as a supplement and interpreter.

I. First, then, they urge that the unwritten Word of God existed before the written Word, and that the Church, to which the unwritten Word was committed, is more ancient, more visible, and more apparent than Scripture. It was not, they truly observe, till some years after the ascension that even the first of the Gospels was written, whilst many years elapsed before the Apostolical writings were all complete. During this period, the inspired Gospel missionaries preached, the Church existed, and in her living, oral teaching the religion of the Gospel was embodied. Why, then, it is urged, should the mere fact of committing some of the doctrines, so promulgated and so preserved, to writing, supersede the authority of the unwritten Tradition and oral teaching of the Church, which existed before a word of Scripture was written (14)? Now, we do not deny that the unwritten Word was prior, in point of time, to the written, and so was the first Rule of Christianity. As nothing was recorded, so far as we know, during the life of our Saviour, the doctrines which he taught were, during that period, so many Divine Traditions. In fact, the history of our Lord's life and teaching could not have been written during his life-time, because that history was not yet finished. The great scheme of salvation which he came to work out was not complete till after his resurrection, his ascension, and the descent of the Holy Ghost. Again, it was not necessary for some time after his ascension, whilst the eye-witnesses of his miracles and hearers of his discourses were still alive, and, above all, whilst the Church enjoyed the actual presence of his divinely-commissioned disciples, to call in the aid of writing in support of oral Tradition: so that the doctrines which he taught remained for some time Divine Traditions. However, before a sufficient interval had elapsed to cause the purity of the original deposit to be impaired by the detrimental influence inseparable from unwritten Tradition, the Evangelists were specially commissioned and supernaturally empowered (in addition to their other extraordinary gifts) to place upon permanent record whatever it seemed fit to the Holy Spirit to perpetuate. Soit was also with respect to the other New Testament writings. The Gospel was first preached by the Apostles to the various churches, and afterwards, upon such occasions as the Divine Spirit saw fit to avail himself of, the Acts, the Apostolical Epistles, and the Apocalypse were penned, under the direction of that Spirit, embracing so much of doctrine, of moral teaching, and of fact as He saw would be necessary and sufficient for the faith and edification of the universal Church (15), in all future ages. Meanwhile, the doctrines which they taught were so many Apostolical Traditions. Henceforward, by the manifest appointment of God himself, his written Word, which we hold to be identical with these Divine and Apostolical Traditions, in all things essential to salvation, became the Rule of Faith. Scripture, then, does not supersede Divine and Apostolical Tradition, but is itself that Tradition, preserved in the only form upon which we may safely rely. And the inference, that because the Church is more ancient than Scripture, therefore Scripture depends upon the Church, obviously rests upon a false assumption—namely, that the authority of Scripture, as such, is grounded solely on the fact of its being written; whereas it is wholly derived from its being the Word of God. The writing of the Word is not an essential condition of its existence, though it is a very useful means, if not a necessary condition, of its continued preservation and diffusion. St. Paul, doubtless, calls the Church "the pillar and ground of the truth" (1 Tim. iii. 15); but the Church itself is based upon the Word of God, preached by Christ's appointed ministers—"Built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone" (Eph. ii. 20): whence, as we have already seen, Irenæus calls the Gospel the pillar and foundation of the Church (16). The Church is, therefore, posterior to the Word, though not to the writing of the Word. This Word committed, by the wisdom of God, to writing, has been consigned by Him to the custody of the Church, which is charged with the ministerial duty of preaching the same; but as it has been well remarked (17), it is as preposterous to affirm that Scripture owes its authority to the Church as it would be to say that a royal writ depends for its validity on the keeper of the great seal; or that the power of the monarch is derived from the herald who proclaims his accession to the throne. And lastly, as to the assertion that the Church is, at least was in early times, more visible than Scripture, surely, though this were granted, it would not in any way follow that the Scripture derives its authority from the Church. The following illustration has been employed (18) to show the real amount of the dependence of Scripture upon the Church in the respect under consideration:—A sign upon a road shows a traveller the way to a city; the sign is more visible than the city, but it does not make the city; and if it were destroyed, the city would still remain; and when the traveller arrives at the city, the city proves itself to be the place indicated by the sign, and so proves the credibility of the sign. Thus the Christian Church, it is true, directs us to Scripture, but she does not make Scripture, nor give authority to it; but, on the contrary, Scripture gives authority to the Church, and proves the truth of her testimony concerning it.

But though, as we have said, the written Word of God became, after the completion of the New Testament Scriptures, the Rule of Faith, yet it is no part of the doctrine maintained by Church of England Protestants that the Church's functions, in regard to the Word of God, were thenceforth entirely abrogated. She became "a witness and keeper of Holy Writ" (Art. xx.), just as the Jewish Church was the depositary of the oracles of God under the elder dispensation.—Rom. iii. 2. The teaching of the Catholic Church, in respect to all the essentials of salvation, was thenceforward limited, as

(9) "Ostendimus hunc et non alium sensum esse objecti canonis, nempe illud quidem esse Catholicum quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus retentum est; ast non e converso, ita ut nihil admitti debeat uti fidei dogma Ecclesiæ Catholicæ quod non semper nec ubique neque ab omnibus fuerit admissum."—Perrone, Loc. Theol., Part II. sec. ii. cap ii. It was quite necessary that so stringent a criterion should be abandoned, when such doctrines as Communion in one kind and Transubstantiation were elevated to the rank of articles of faith.

(10) Augustine's opinion respecting the authority of a General Council to determine articles of faith differs very essentially from that of Bellarmine. In support of the much-disputed term ὁμοούσιος, the Catholics urged the authority of the Council of Nice, which adopted it; whilst, on the other hand, the Arians relied on the Council of Ariminum, which rejected it. Augustine, however, thus expresses himself on the subject—"Neither should I allege the Council of Nice, nor you that of Ariminum, prejudging, as it were, the question. I am not bound by the authority of the one, nor you by that of the other. By the authority of Scripture witnesses, not peculiar to either of us, but common to both, let fact contend against fact, cause against cause, reason against reason."—(Sed nunc nec ego Nicænum, nec tu debes Arimineuse, tanquam præjudicaturus, proferre concilium. Nec ego hujus auctoritate, nec tu illius detineris: Scripturarum auctoritatibus, non quorumque propriis, sed utrisque communibus testibus, res cum re, causa cum causa, ratio cum ratione, concertet.—August, c. Maximin. Arian., lib. iii c. 14.) This is identical with the doctrine laid down by the Church of England in her twentieth Article—"Things ordained in them [General Councils] as necessary to salvation have neither strength nor authority, unless it may be declared that they are taken out of Holy Scripture."

(11) In the ninth epistle of the seventh book (al. Lib. ix. Ep. cv.) of his Epistles, addressed to Serenus, Bishop of Marseilles, he advises that images should be retained, but that the people should be prohibited from worshipping them. (Tua ergo fraternitas et illas (sc. imagines) servare, sed ab earum adoratu prohibere debuit.)

(12) This criterion of Bossuet's agrees with Bellarmine's third (De verb. Dei, iv. 9), and both are taken from Augustine (Contr. Donat. Lib. iv. c. 22)—"Quod universa tenet Ecclesia nec Conciliis institutum, sed semper retentum est, non nisi auctoritate apostolica traditum rectissime creditur." Now, without discussing the soundness of this test, even in the fourth century, we may fairly ask, can it be safely transferred to the nineteenth?

(13) "Si legem [sc. Scripturarum] nusquam reperio, sequitur ut traditio consuetudine morum hunc dederit, habituram quandoque apostoli auctoritatem ex interpretatione rationis."—Tertull. de Corona Militis, cap. iv.

(14) "Jesus Christ having laid the foundation of his Church by preaching, the unwritten Word was consequently the first rule of Christianity; and when the writings of the New Testament were added to it, its authority was not forfeited on that account."—Bossuet, Exposition de la Doctrine, &c., ch. xviii. The word "added" involves a petitio principii, as it implies that a necessary part, at least, of God's Word, as delivered by Christ and his Apostles, was not recorded in the New Testament. Now, this cannot be taken for granted in arguing with those who invariably deny it.

(15) Not merely the laity, or uninitiated part of the Church, as Bellarmine maintains—rather inconsistently, it is true, inasmuch as the laity are not competent to read the Scriptures.

that of the Jewish Church had been, in the minutest particulars, to the points contained in the written Word. She was entrusted with no secret, reserved doctrines, to be orally committed to an initiated few, and by them to be communicated to the many, in suitable proportions, according to particular times and circumstances. This notion, really borrowed, as we have before said, from Paganism (19), was introduced into Christianity by the priestly caste, in times long posterior to the purer ages of Christianity. The duties of the Church, in respect to the Word of God, we repeat, were not superseded, but only restricted and defined, when that Word was committed to writing. Her proper business then was to testify to the fact that such and such documents were written by men universally or generally reputed to be inspired for that purpose; to preserve inviolate the sacred deposit committed to her care; and faithfully to preach and maintain the doctrines contained therein (20). Nay, more, when the title-deeds of man's salvation were thus formally drawn up, and the terms of the new covenant placed upon eternal record, safe from the influences of time and change, the value of the independent, contemporary testimony of the Catholic Church (during the age of her purity, and whilst the teaching of the Apostolic missionaries was still fresh in the memories of men) to the great doctrine contained in the charter of man's redemption did not all at once cease. On the contrary, there were two cases in which the living Tradition of the Apostolic Churches was then appealed to as an authoritative exponent of Gospel doctrine. One was when copies of the New Testament Scriptures, or of some portions of them, were not, from some cause or other, to be obtained (21). In this case the oral testimony of these whose evidence might be relied on, as to the contents of the written documents, was unavoidably resorted to: just as, in the absence of a deed which is known to exist, but which cannot be directly consulted, trustworthy collateral evidence, as to its contents, might be admitted; subject, however, to the correction of the original document, whenever it might be produced. The second case in which Tradition was appealed to in the early Church was, when the Catholics disputed with heretics, who denied the authenticity of the Church Scriptures, maintaining the superior authority of their own Tradition. In this case the Catholics met them on their own ground, and opposed to the asserted Tradition of the sectaries the genuine Tradition of the Apostolic Church of highest eminence and most unimpeachable succession. But it is surely needless to remark that neither of these cases finds its parallel in the controversy before us; for, blessed be God, the written Word, in its integrity, is now accessible to all who wish to obtain it; and Roman Catholics, as well as Protestants, regard the canonical Scriptures as the Word of God.

A BIT OF A SERMON.

MR. EDITOR,—I am a young man, lately come from a country town were I was trying to earn an honest livelihood by taking short-hand notes for the ——— Chronicle, of lively scenes at petty sessions, speeches at agricultural meetings, and the like, which I am now so quick at doing that I thought I might, perhaps, better myself by coming to Dublin, where I have now been three weeks looking for employment. The other evening, sauntering about the town with nothing to do, having applied in vain to the principal newspaper offices (which, alas I were all pretty well provided already with reporters of all kinds), I was led out of curiosity to drop into —— Church, where I found a well-known controversial preacher in the middle of a very animated sermon. I had never been in the way of hearing a controversial sermon before; and being a stranger, there was no chance of my being reported as a heretic for listening to what I heard. Instinctively I pulled out my note-book and pencil, and took down verbatim what I heard. I was too late for the reverend gentleman's text, and I suppose lost the first half, at least, of his discourse, but what I did hear I venture to send you, hoping that you may; in return, either give me something to do in the way of my business, or recommend me to some of your friends, some of whom may, perhaps, have been present at the sermon, and therefore able to judge of the correctness of my note of it. I could not help being struck with the earnestness and strong common sense of the reverend gentleman, and shall not fail to go to hear him again.

Your obedient servant,

TERENCE MULVANNY.

[EDITOR—The reporter does not state the name of the reverend preacher, but probably many of our readers will be at no loss to guess at it. The report, we have no doubt, is a correct one, and is verbatim as follows]:—

"What is the use of his having reason if he does not use it?

"When I was in Connaught I said to the people, 'Boys, people see queer things when dust and flies get into their eyes. Would it not be a grand thing to shut our eyes, and then the dirt and flies would not get in? They said to me, 'Oh, sir, we would not like that at all.' I said, 'A man nourishing himself will eat and drink too much. What do you think if you would pay somebody for eating and drinking for you, and keep your mouths shut? When I was young I used to run and leap, and get falls, and sometimes hurt myself very much. Would it not be better not to walk or leap, and then you would not endanger your life? Honest, sensible men said to me they would not like that at all. And here, will sensible men let others learn for them, and hear for them, and read for them, and not read, and hear, and learn for themselves? Roman Catholics say their Church is the Catholic Church. How can a part be a whole? Surely the Roman Church is only a part of Christians. Now, I go to a Roman Catholic, and ask him to point out any prayer in the Church of England service that is wrong,—that is not according to Scripture. He cannot. But bring your book to me, and ask me, 'Can I find any prayer that is not according to Scripture? and I will prove that there are. You call the Virgin Mary, 'refuge of sinners, our life and hope.' Christ is that. That is contrary to Scripture. I grant that the whole Church of Christ—that is, the Catholic Church—could not teach error; and therefore the Roman Catholic Church is not the Catholic Church. The whole Catholic Church could not embrace, as necessary to salvation, that which only began some centuries ago; whereas the Roman Catholic Church does that from head to members: therefore the Roman Catholic Church is not the Catholic Church, is only a corrupt branch, if a branch at all, of the universal Church. I do not believe it to be the Catholic Church; because it was not always, it is not now, nor ever will be in every place, and there are many branches of the Catholic Church now in the world with as much pretensions as the Church of Rome. There is the Greek Church, the Abyssinian Church, the Syrian Church, and there are Churches in the valleys of the Alps that all protest against the pretensions of the Church of Rome just as we do.

"But, my dear brethren, whether we openly belong or not to the Catholic Church, it does not follow, if we do, that we shall be saved. But if we belong to Christ Jesus by a living faith and by a living love, and if our confidence is placed in him, if there is truth in God's Holy Word, we 'shall not perish, but have eternal life.' When a man came to St. Paul and said, "What shall I do to be saved?' He did not say, 'Believe in the supremacy of the Pope of Rome.' There was no Pope at Rome, or no Church at Rome at that time. Did he send him to the Virgin Mary, and say, 'Believe in Mary?" No, he did not. Did he say, 'Do penance for your sins?' No. What did he say? The question was, 'What must I do to be saved?' Was it a mere man answered him? No, an inspired Apostle. 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.' Is that the Roman Catholic doctrine? No, it is the Holy Ghost's doctrine. What is it? Is it this—You cannot be saved unless you believe in transubstantiation? They not only say this, but they swear it—Unless you believe in transubstantion, unless you believe in the seven sacraments, unless you embrace the doctrines of the Church of Rome, you cannot be saved. The Roman Catholic bishop swears this—'I, N. N., do, at this present, freely profess and sincerely hold this true Catholic faith, without which no one can be saved, and I promise most constantly to retain and confess the same, entire and inviolate, with God's assistance, to the end of my life.' This is the oath at the end of the twelve novel articles of the Church of Rome. Blessed be God, that is not true. That is the Roman Catholic doctrine. It is not the Catholic doctrine, it is not God's doctrine, it is not Christ's doctrine. Christ's doctrine is, 'He that believeth on the Son of God hath everlasting life,' shall not be condemned, 'shall not come into condemnation.' 'There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus.' 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature.' Who said that? Christ. What else did he say? 'He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved.' 'Oh,' says the Church of Rome, 'not at all. If he does not believe in the supremacy of the Pope, if he does not believe in every article in the Roman Catholic creed, he cannot be saved.' Ah, my friends, that is man's doctrine; but give me the Judge, the Master, the Lord, the great God, who says—'My sheep hear my voice and I know them, and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any one pluck them out of my hand.'

"Oh, my countrymen, come and use the reason that God has given you. We are determined, with God's blessing, to maintain the truth; and be it known unto you, that as Rome has come and made, I grant you, a manly assault on England, we will stand against that assault, even unto the death. Let her summon her mightiest weapons—reason, and antiquity, and Scripture, and history; we have the same well-pointed, burnished weapons in our arsenal, and we will present our breasts to the front of the fight; and if she can produce the strongest reason, and the clearest Scripture, and the most ancient testimony, may God give her the day. If the Church of Rome be more according to reason, and Scripture, and ancient truth, may she sweep off the face of the earth every vestige of error on it. And if we be more according to reason, and Scripture, and antiquity than her, may God grant us the day. It is the interest of every man that God's truth should prevail and that man's reason should be free. I am open, I trust, to correction. If you give me reason for believing any thing, I will believe it. If a man proves to me that Mahomedanism is true, I will become a Mahomedan; if a man proves to me that the Jews are right, I will become a Jew; if a man proves to me that the heathens are right, I will become a heathen. As I said in starting, if a man proves to me that two and two make five, I will believe it; but he must prove it. To believe it without proof is only the act of a fool, just as too many of our Roman Catholics do. I will show you why you are forbidden to pry into anything. You will see one particular newspaper in general circulation. Why so? Because it supports its own side. Why, an honest man would read both sides. You will see books on their table all of one side; they will not read the other side at all, and yet they call themselves free. Then, again, look at the Church of Rome: how is it maintained now? The Pope of Rome would not allow a Protestant church inside the walls of Rome; he had all the schools, the colleges, the churches; he had all the cardinals, the bishops, the vicars, the monks and nuns, all to his heart's content, a very happy, blessed people; he was going about pouring his blessing upon them; candles lighting, great and wonderful things doing. How did the people of Rome act? They were sick of him; they cast him out of Rome; they obliged him to put on a servant's livery, and escape from Rome, they were so sick and disgusted with what is called the Vicar of Jesus Christ. The Roman Catholic people themselves were so disgusted, so sick of him who pretends to be the Vicar of Jesus Christ—'our Lord God, the Pope,' as they call him—that he was obliged to run away at the back of a coach. And how is he kept there now? By fraternity, liberty, equality? No; by cavalry, infantry, artillery. The Pope is maintained as the head of the Roman Catholic Church, how? By cavalry, infantry, artillery. The Pope is kept in Rome, how? By the decrees of councils, by preaching, by praying, by penance? No. What else? Cavalry, infantry, and artillery. Now, is that the way the Lord Jesus Christ rules as head of the Church? Is he upheld by cavalry, infantry, artillery? No; when Peter, in a passion, cut off the ear of the servant of the high priest with a sword, our Lord said—'Put up thy sword into its sheath, for they that take the sword shall perish by the sword.' And yet the Pope took every Italian sword; and when he could not get Italian swords he drew other swords, he drew the swords of ten thousand of the French soldiers, and now he is kept up by cavalry, infantry, artillery. That is the way that your head of the Church, or Vicar of Jesus Christ, proves that the Roman Catholic Church is the Catholic Church; not by argument—that failed; not by history—that failed; not by praying to the Virgin—that failed, but by the thunder of the cannon, and the point of the bayonet, and the edge of the sword, and the strength of the French arm; whereas the weapon of our warfare is truth, and it must prevail. Look at heretical England. Go to Liverpool, and the large counties of England. A soldier is a curiosity; in London a soldier is a curiosity; and you must go to the Horse Guards to see their broad, long swords and terrible cuirasses. But go to France and Roman Catholic countries, and you will see hundreds of swords, and lances, and bayonets all bestirring, to keep the rickety body together; and does this look like the Church of Christ? 'Go ye,' said our Lord, 'make disciples of all nations.' How? Baptizing them; that was the way—'teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.' With the point of the sword? No. With what else? With the tongue speaking, with the pen writing, and with the life living. That is the mark of the Church of Christ.

"Oh, may God grant that our people may know Christ to be the Prince of Peace, and not an earthly warrior; may they wield the sword of the Spirit, the Word of God, and not carnal weapons; may they look to Christ, and not to the strength of man, that we cannot depend on; and may God give us his blessing now and for ever."

(19) Roman Catholics attempt to support their doctrine of the Disciplina Arcani by the authority of Clement of Alexandria; but he lends no sanction to it, as the present Bishop of Lincoln has unanswerably shown.

(20) "With respect to the New Testament, the primitive Church of Christ exercised a fourfold office—first, that of a contemporary witness to its genuineness and authenticity; next, that of a guardian of its integrity; next, that of a herald, by public reading and interpretation of it in her religious assemblies, and by diffusion of copies of it into all parts of the world; and, finally, that of a judge, by vindicating its Divine character, and by distinguishing it from all suppositious writings claiming to be inspired, and by visiting their authors with severe spiritual penalties."—Wordsworth I. c. p. 20.

(21) The cost of materials and transcription rendered copies of the Sacred Books very scarce and valuable. They were usually preserved in the places set apart for worship, under the custody of the clergy. Under such circumstances, we can easily imagine cases in which it would be impossible, or very difficult, to appeal directly to the written Word.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-street. Communications from Mr. Collette, Philalethes, and others, have been received, but necessarily postponed for want of room.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber.

We beg those kind friends by whose subscriptions and contributions we have been supported during the past year, to remember that the subscriptions for the ensuing year are payable IN ADVANCE, and may be forwarded to Mr. Curry, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin, by Post-office orders, or postage stamps. Those who wish the paper to be continued should do so without delay.

We beg also to remind our readers that it is our intention to supply such of them as have preserved the CATHOLIC LAYMAN with a title-page and index for the year 1852, free of expense. A few back numbers, to complete sets, may still be had, on application to the publisher; price threepence each.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1852.

Some months ago (in our May number) we called the attention of our readers to the alleged miracles at Rimini, in Italy; and having stated, from Roman Catholic authorities, the evidence on which they claim the assent of the faithful to their authenticity, we concluded with a question which we hoped that some of our intelligent Roman Catholic correspondents would have enabled us to answer—

"Do the Roman Catholics of Ireland believe these stories upon such evidence? Do they put these miracles, and the proof of these miracles, on an equality with the miracles of our Blessed Saviour, and the proofs of those miracles? If not, can they help acknowledging that these miracles are tricks and impositions? And if so, can they account for the fact, that while these accounts are circulated far and wide among the Irish people in the 'Catholic Directory,' on the authority of the Bishop of Rimini himself, not one of the bishops or priests of Ireland, by whose subscriptions that 'Directory' is circulated (and who are so zealous in preserving the laity from all that is dangerous to their faith and morals in the enlightened and profitable education of the Queen's Colleges), should ever have raised their voices to warn Catholics from believing the delusions which are sought to be spread among them, on the authority of the Bishop of Rimini and his confederates? Truly, the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland are called upon, in such a case, to vindicate their common sense and judgment from the imputation of believing or submitting to such manifest impostures, and we shall rejoice to hear that they do so."

We had hoped that Mr. Aylmer, Mr. Warner Christian Search, or some other of our educated correspondents, would have come forward either to defend or to repudiate these alleged miracles. One thing is plain, that they are either genuine miracles, worked by the mighty power of God, or vile impostures, invented by the knavery of men. A neutral or unimportant matter none can allege them to be; and taking place in the present day, in the heart of Italy, they must either confirm or shake the faith of thousands in the Church of Rome, for whose benefit they were, doubtless, effected, whether they be genuine or whether they be not. A more important inquiry we can scarcely propose to any inquirer after religious truth, and we again call the attention of our correspondents to it.

Our attention was recalled to the above subject by a friend placing in our hands a number of "The Catholic Guardian," published Feb. 1, 1852, in which the writer gravely attempts to prove the truth of transubstantiation by referring to the extraordinary miracles which authors of the first character (?) assert to have been wrought in support of it. The following extract is a sample of them:—

"Nicholas Serrarius relates, that when the Wickliffites first began to attack this dogma of the faith, in 1408, the following miracle took place:—
